STERN v. JUDSON. (L. A. 2,721.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 23, 1912.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 419*)—CONSTRUCTIVE SERVICE—AFFIDAVIT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

An affidavit for an order for publication of summons against one not found within the state, reciting use of due diligence to find defendant, requires issuance of the order, if the affidavit is sufficient in form, but neither the affidavit, nor an order for publication based thereon, is conclusive that such diligence was used; the question being open as between the parties on a direct attack on the judgment obtained on such service, on the ground that the service was procured on a false affidavit.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 461*)—PUBLICATION SERVICE—AFFIDAVIT FOR—DILIGENCE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to sustain findings that plaintiff, in a former action, did not use bona fide diligence to ascertain the whereabouts or address of defendant therein, notwithstanding the recital of such diligence in an affidavit for publication service.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 892-895; Dec. Dig. § 461.*]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Bordwell, Judge. Action by S. Stern against W. B. Judson. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Haas, Garrett & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Sharp & Rech, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

LORIGAN, J. On June 29, 1904, the appellant, Judson, commenced an action, entitled W. B. Judson v. C. S. Patrick et al., against this plaintiff and 17 other parties to quiet his alleged title to various parcels of land in Los Angeles county, including lots 15 and 16 of the New York tract, averring in his complaint that he was the owner in fee thereof, and that defendants had no estate or interest therein. Service of summons was by publication; the order of the court therefor being based on the verified complaint in said action and an affidavit of plaintiff, made and filed therein, in which he stated that he had examined "the great register of the city and county of Los Angeles, * * * the tax roll for several years last past, * * * and did not find the addresses therein of any" of 12 of the defendants in said action (mentioning them), including the present plaintiff; that he had made "numerous inquiries as to the residence of each and every of the above-named defendants from * * * Julius Lyons, Esq., A. H. Judson, the county tax collector, auditor, and county recorder, * * * also W. R. Jones, H. A. Greenwald, and A. G. Strain," all of Los Angeles county, "and also numerous other people who would be likely to know the whereabouts of the above-named defendants, and each and every of them replied that they did not know the address or addresses of any of said above-named defendants, * * * wherefore affiant says that after using due diligence and making numerous inquiries and search for the place of the residence of each and every of said defendants * * * that said defendants cannot be found within the state of California, or personally served with process therein;" that summons had been issued, and return thereon made by the sheriff of Los Angeles county that he could not find any of the defendants within the county of Los Angeles. An order for publication was made on this affidavit, publication had, the default of the defendants entered, and judgment thereafter entered on January 25, 1905, in favor of plaintiff, Judson, in that action, as prayed for in his complaint.

In December, 1907, this action was brought by the present plaintiff for a decree setting aside the said judgment of Judson v. Patrick et al., in so far as it affected the title or interest of plaintiff to lots 15 and 16 in the New York tract included in the said judgment, on the ground that said judgment was procured through fraud on the part of appellant, and was void as against this plaintiff. In support of this claim, it was alleged: That since 1888 plaintiff had been and now was the owner of said lots 15 and 16. That the only claim said Judson ever had to said property was under a tax deed issued on a sale of said property for delinquent taxes for the year 1891, which deed was void. That said Judson, as plaintiff in the action of Judson v. Patrick et al., at the time he filed his complaint therein, had no right, title, or interest in said lots, and that said statement in his verified complaint that he was the owner of said property was false, and known by him at that time to be false. That the statement contained in the affidavit of said Judson for the order of publication of summons, that he, Judson, had inquired of the county tax collector, who replied that he did not know the address of the plaintiff herein, was false, and known to be false by Judson at the time said affidavit was made by him. That said affidavit was false and fraudulent, in that said Judson did not use due diligence in attempting to ascertain the address or whereabouts of plaintiff in this: That he was then well acquainted and had business dealings with his grantor under the tax deed, Julia Rodgers, and her husband, Ralph Rodgers, from whom the present plaintiff had purchased the said real estate, and by the exercise of reasonable diligence could have ascertained by inquiry of them the whereabouts and address of this plaintiff. That plaintiff herein was never served personally with summons in said action, and had no knowledge whatsoever of said action or judgment until about February 1, 1907. In praying that said judgment be set aside, plaintiff offered to pay the defendant, Judson, the amount necessary to redeem the tax sale above referred to.

On the trial of the action the court found: That for more than 20 years last past plaintiff herein had resided continuously in the city and county of San Francisco. That on March 18, 1891, plaintiff was the owner of said lots 15 and 16 of the New York tract, on which date the tax collector of said county sold said property to one J. N. Rodgers (known as Julia A. N. Rodgers) for delinquent state and county taxes for the year ending June 30, 1891, and on June 20, 1904, said tax collector made her tax deeds therefor. That on or about June 1, 1904, said J. N. Rodgers had conveyed said lots to the defendant herein, Judson. That said Rodgers had no title or interest in said property, other than what she acquired under said tax deeds, and that said tax deeds were null and void. That the allegation in the verified complaint of the defendant herein, as plaintiff in said action of Judson v. Patrick et al., that he was the owner of said lots in fee was false and untrue. That he did not have any title or interest therein. That at the time of the filing of said complaint he did not have actual knowledge that he had no right or title therein, and was not guilty of intentional fraud in bringing and prosecuting said action. That the affidavit filed by him for the purpose of procuring an order for the publication of summons and service thereunder was false and untrue in this: That he did not use due, reasonable, or bona fide diligence, or make reasonable efforts, to ascertain the address or whereabouts of the plaintiff herein at or before the making and filing of said affidavit.

The court further found in several other findings that it was not true, as stated in said affidavit, that Judson had made numerous inquiries and searches for the place of residence of plaintiff; nor was it true that plaintiff could not be found within the state of California; but, on the contrary, if Judson had made due, reasonable, or proper inquiries, or used due diligence, and had made numerous or proper inquiries or search for the place of residence or whereabouts of plaintiff, as was reasonably and properly required of him, he would have learned and ascertained the residence or whereabouts of the plaintiff.

It was specially found by the court that the said lots involved in said judgment had been assessed to the plaintiff for 15 years last past, and, with the exception of the taxes for the year ending June 30, 1891, he had paid all the taxes assessed thereon; that at the time Judson filed his affidavit in the action of Judson v. Patrick et al., and for a long time prior thereto, there was and had been on file in the tax collector's office of the county of Los Angeles a letter from plaintiff herein in reference to taxes assessed against the property involved here; that said letter was open to public inspection upon proper request therefor; and that said letter gave the address of plaintiff herein; that Judson did not make such inquiry of the tax collector as was reasonably and properly required of him, and was guilty of gross negligence amounting to fraud in failing to make such reasonable and proper inquiry of the said tax collector of the address or whereabouts of the plaintiff.

As conclusions of law, the court found that Judson committed and was guilty of fraud against plaintiff herein and the court in making and filing his affidavit in said action of Judson v. Patrick et al., and in securing an order for publication of summons in said action, and through procuring judgment thereon in said action against plaintiff herein based on said publication of summons; that on payment of $14.12, the amount required to redeem said property from said tax sale, for the use of Judson, the plaintiff have a decree canceling and setting aside the judgment rendered in favor of Judson, in as far as it affected the plaintiff herein, or his title or interest in said lots 15 and 16 of said New York tract. Judgment was entered accordingly, and defendant moved for a new trial, which being denied, he appeals alone therefrom.

No question is made on this appeal but that the findings as made sufficiently sustain the judgment. The sole point presented is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the court on the matter of the due diligence exercised by the appellant to ascertain the whereabouts or address of the respondent when he commenced the action of Judson v. Patrick et al. and made the affidavit for an order for the publication of summons. The claim of appellant is that the finding in this respect is not sustained by the evidence, but that it shows the utmost good faith on his part in trying to ascertain such whereabouts. Whether it does or not is the main point in controversy in this appeal.

It appears therefrom that prior to 1887, and continuously thereafter, respondent resided in the city of San Francisco, where, until the great fire of 1906, he conducted a barber shop, called the Metropolitan Barber Shop. In 1887 one Ralph Rodgers was the owner of a large tract of land in Los Angeles county, near the town of Garvanza, which he plotted into lots and blocks as a subdivision to said town, to be known as the New York tract. In that year he placed the tract on the market, disposing of the lots by auction and lottery, principally the latter, held in the town of Garvanza. An auction was also had in San Francisco, and the respondent acquired his lots thereat in 1887, and procured a written agreement for the sale thereof, signed by Ralph Rodgers. Rodgers thereafter transferred all his interest in the tract to one Newton, who conveyed it to one Childress as trustee, and in 1888 the latter made the deed to respondent. It was understood by the appellant that Childress, while describing himself in the deeds made to respondent and various others simply as "trustee," was in fact, while the conveyances did not disclose it, acting as such for the benefit of Ralph Rodgers. These matters were all known to appellant several years before he acquired the deed from Julia N. Rodgers, wife of Ralph Rodgers, to the lots involved here, and at the time he brought his action against respondent and others, except that he did not know that an auction had been held in San Francisco, or that the contract of sale to respondent had been signed by Ralph Rodgers.

Appellant had acquired a familiarity with the records and matters pertaining to the tax collector, assessor, and recorder's offices, and in 1902 had entered into a contract with Julia N. Rodgers, wife of said Ralph Rodgers, to clear up the title to property in and about Garvanza and in the New York tract, to which she made claim, and with that end in view had made an abstract from the records of the entire town of Garvanza and the New York tract, embracing some thousand titles, including that of respondent. Appellant himself had acquired title to some 30 or 40 lots in the New York tract. The general locality in which respondent's lots were located was unimproved, and there were no houses in the immediate vicinity thereof. While acting for Mrs. Rodgers in endeavoring to clear up her title to the property claimed by her, which embraced property acquired by her through tax sales, and with a view of making the necessary affidavits respecting service of notice of application for tax deeds under the tax system then prevailing, the appellant made some search or inquiry as to the address or whereabouts of respondent and other tax delinquents. These were made within two years before bringing the suit to quiet title, though some were made about the time it was brought. As to the nature and character of these inquiries, appellant testified that he examined the great register of Los Angeles county, the index to the tax rolls for several years, and the city directory of the city of Los Angeles, and inquired of people living out in Garvanza—people who had lived there several years, and who might possibly know any of the old-timers who had lived there before appellant's time. As to the old-timers, he only mentioned three, and none of these are mentioned by name in the affidavit for publication. What particular advantage they had of possessing knowledge of the whereabouts of respondent, the evidence of the appellant does not disclose. Nor is it apparent how appellant expected to ascertain the whereabouts of respondent from the great register, tax rolls, or city directory, as he testified that, while making these inquiries, he did not suppose that respondent was a resident of the county. As to the inquiries made by him of the persons actually mentioned in his affidavit, he inquired of W. R. Jones; but all that appears respecting Jones is that he lived in Los Angeles city. There is nothing in the testimony to indicate how he could expect any enlightenment whatever of the whereabouts of respondent from Jones, or why he should inquire of him rather than any other resident of Los Angeles city. He asked H. Greenwald and H. G. Strain. Greenwald was a collector in Los Angeles, and appellant had often heard him speak of old residents of Los Angeles, and for that reason he made the inquiry of him. Strain was likewise an old resident of the same county. He inquired of him for that reason. Whereabouts in the county Greenwald or Strain resided when his inquiries were made, appellant did not know; nor did he know at the time of the trial. A. H. Judson, since deceased, was the father of appellant, and Julius Lyons was the attorney for appellant in the suit to quiet title involved here. How either of these two was in a position to enlighten appellant on the subject of the whereabouts of respondent is not shown; and, while appellant states in his affidavit and testified on the trial that he had made numerous inquiries of other people likely to know the whereabouts of respondent, aside from the persons above referred to, no person was specifically mentioned by name on the trial as embraced within that number.

In addition appellant testified, as he stated in his affidavit, that he inquired of the tax collector the address of the respondent, and was informed by him that he did not know. As far as this inquiry is concerned, it appears that when appellant visited the tax collector's office he had a list of names respecting six or seven pieces of property in the New York tract which he wanted to take out deeds for—apparently deeds under tax sales—and asked the tax collector if he knew any of those parties, or where he could find out about them, or be referred to any one who might know them, and received a negative answer from the tax collector. This was all the inquiry made at that time, and this was the manner of making it. When appellant made his inquiries, he knew of the deed to respondent for these lots, and that thereafter he continued to be the record owner thereof; that they had always been assessed in his name; and that every year, with the exception of the year 1891, the taxes were being paid on them by some one, and, of course, presumably by the respondent, who was the owner, and to whom they were assessed. In making his inquiry of the tax collector, appellant did not inform him that the property was assessed to the respondent, whose whereabouts he was seeking to ascertain, nor call the officer's attention to the assessment to respondent as it stood upon the assessment roll. He merely made the general inquiry as to the several parties on his list, and contented himself with the response he got.

Now it appears that for the years 1902 and 1903, at the time appellant made his visit to the tax collector's office, there appeared upon the assessment of the property to respondent for each of these years, or was written across the face thereof, certain numbers, which had reference to correspondence or letters on file in the tax collector's office in relation to the taxes assessed against this property, and that if the appellant, instead of making a general inquiry directed simply to the whereabouts of respondent, among others, had called the attention of the tax collector to the fact that the property was assessed to the respondent, the tax collector would have referred to the letters indicated by the numbers on the assessment, and endeavored to ascertain therefrom the address of the respondent. The figures indicated the existence of such correspondence at the time appellant was making his general inquiry, and the evidence showed that respondent had always, in the matter of taxes upon these lots, written to the tax collector to ascertain the amount of his taxes, and upon receipt of an answer had forwarded it by letter to him.

Aside from this, it appears that Ralph Rodgers, with whom appellant was well acquainted, had a book containing a record of the sales made by him in the New York tract, including that to respondent, which would have shown that these lots were sold to the respondent in San Francisco at the auction sale held there, and that he could and would so have informed appellant, had he made an inquiry of him. Appellant understood long before his suit against respondent to quiet title that Ralph Rodgers had subdivided this tract, placed it upon the market, and sold the lots at auction and otherwise, and that in making the deeds to the parties Childress was acting simply as his trustee. Appellant had on several occasions written Childress to ascertain the residence or whereabouts of grantees in deeds made by him, and was told by Childress that he did not know of them, as he was simply a trustee in making the conveyances. Childress did not state for whom he was acting as trustee; but it appears to have been generally understood in the neighborhood, where a great many controversies existed between Rodgers, his wife, and his creditors, respecting the lands located in the New York tract and in Garvanza, that he was trustee for Rodgers, and appellant so understood. Possessing this information, in the exercise of the most ordinary diligence, he should have made inquiry of Rodgers. The only reason assigned by him for failing to do so in this instance was that, owing to some litigation, there existed an ill feeling between them. While this might have been an excuse for failure to make a personal inquiry, it afforded no reasonable excuse on the part of the appellant for failing to make the inquiry at all. He could readily have sent some third party to have made it, just as he had done in other instances he mentioned; and if he had done so he would have received the information which Rodgers possessed.

Again, it further appears that the deed of these lots to respondent was filed at the request of Wells Fargo & Co. Appellant testified that in examining the deed to respondent he did not discover this; but in the exercise of due diligence he could have and should have discovered it. It was there plain enough. The fact that the deed was filed for record by Wells Fargo & Co. would have disclosed to appellant, if he had been ordinarily careful in examining it, a source from which he might, and in all probability would, have discovered from whence and by whom the deed had been sent through the company for recordation, and hence have been put in the way of ascertaining the location of the respondent.

[1] The law permits, under some circumstances, a plaintiff to procure an order for the publication of summons where the defendant in the action, after the exercise of due diligence on the part of the plaintiff, cannot be found within the state, and the fact is so made to appear by affidavit by or on behalf of the plaintiff. Such an affidavit is always ex parte, and the court, when it is sufficient in form, must accept and act upon it and grant the order. But in proceeding to avail himself of this statutory mode for constructive service of summons, a plaintiff must, in fact, have exercised due diligence. A mere formal compliance with the provisions of the statute, or a statement to that effect in his affidavit, will not suffice; nor will an order for publication based upon such an affidavit, or a judgment following a service by publication thereon, be conclusive of the fact that such diligence was exercised. The question is open as between the parties under a direct attack on the ground of fraud on the part of plaintiff in procuring the judgment, which is the attack made here. When a false affidavit is presented to the court for the purpose of obtaining an order for the service of summons by publication, this, of itself, is an act of fraud, both upon the court which was induced to make the order thereon, and equally a fraud upon the defendant in the action; and any judgment based thereon will be set aside in an action by the defendant constructively served against the plaintiff claiming the benefit of the judgment thus fraudulently procured, and where no rights of innocent third parties claiming under the judgment are involved.

[2] Here the evidence fully warranted the court in concluding that the investigation which the appellant claims to have made to ascertain the whereabouts of a number of persons against whom he contemplated suit, including this respondent, was a mere perfunctory one, amounting to no more than a mere form of investigation, which of itself would indicate lack of good faith in making it. When, in addition, there is taken into consideration that there were sources from which he could obtain information, if his inquiry had been pursued with ordinary care and candor, as the law requires he shall exercise, and other sources of which he had knowledge, or should have had, from which the residence and whereabouts of the defendant might have been ascertained, there can be no question but that the findings of the court that the appellant had not used due, reasonable, or bona fide diligence to ascertain the whereabouts or address of respondent, and that his statements in the affidavit that he had were false and untrue, are sufficiently sustained by the evidence.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

POLLETT v. DUDEN et al. (S. F. 6,103.)

Rehearing Denied Oct. 26, 1912.)

Where a testatrix disposed of a portion of her estate and directed that the remainder should be converted into cash and apportioned, appropriated, and paid out to different legatees in different percentages, the legatees named did not constitute a class, in the sense that on the death of one of them, who was related by blood to the deceased, his share would be ratably divided among the other parties thereto, rather than pass, under the statutes of distribution and descent, to his lineal descendants, who were legal heirs of the testatrix.

2. WILLS (§ 863*)—CONSTRUCTION—EFFECT OF DEATH OF RESIDUARY LEGATEE.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Laura E. Kunkler, deceased. From a decree of distribution entered, Marie Kunkler Pollett appeals. Affirmed.

S. Bloom, of San Francisco (Costello & Costello, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. W. C. Graves, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. By her olographic will Laura E. Kunkler, after disposing of certain articles of personal property to designated legatees, directed that all of the remainder of her estate should be converted into cash, and after the payment of her debts the money remaining should be "apportioned, appropriated and paid out as follows." Then followed the names of 14 legatees, to each of whom she left a named percentage of the moneys; to one 15 per cent., to another 5 per cent., to another 10, to another 4, to another 2, and finally "ten per cent. to some worthy charity"—the total aggregating 100 per cent., and thus making a disposition of her whole estate. A codicil to her will, also admitted to probate, provided: "At my death I wish my nephew Eugene L. Duden receive but five ($5.00) dollars from my estate. He will know the reason why. This is my last wish. My other heirs will see that this is carried out." Three legatees named in the will, who were strangers in blood to the testatrix, died prior to her death. Another legatee, a niece, also died prior to the death of the deceased, leaving no lineal descendants. The attempted legacy of 10 per cent. to "some worthy charity" is admittedly void. As to all of these legacies, the court, upon distribution, declared that they were undisposed of by the will and belonged to the heirs at law. Civ. Code, §§ 1343, 1386. Eugene L. Duden, named in the codicil, had been left a legacy of 10 per cent. This was revoked by the codicil, and the court decreed that this fell also in the residuum undisposed of by will.

[1] Certain legatees related by blood to the deceased died prior to her death, leaving lineal descendants. The court decreed distribution of their legacies, amounting in the aggregate to 8 per cent. of the whole, under section 1310 of the Civil Code, to their lineal descendants. The appellant, one of the legatees, insists that this distribution is erroneous; that all of the legatees constitute a class as residuary legatees; and that all the legacies which have failed by reason of death, revocation, or other cause belong to, and should be ratably distributed amongst, the remainder of the class. Herein appellant argues that a construction resulting in testacy is to be preferred to one producing intestacy in whole or in part; that the testatrix's intent is to govern, and that her intent clearly was to dispose of all her property to and amongst the named legatees; that they therefore constitute a class; that significance attaches to her use of the words "apportioned, appropriated and paid out"; and, finally, that the language of the second codicil, above quoted, revoking the 10 per cent. legacy to her nephew Eugene, sets at rest "any possible doubt as to the foregoing conclusions." The argument upon this proposition will suffer, if stated in any other words than those of appellant's attorney, and it is therefore quoted in extenso: "Now, at the time when this codicil was written by the testatrix herself, Clarence E. Duden, the brother of testatrix and the father of Eugene, was living, and was known to the testatrix to be living, and said Clarence was an heir at law of the testatrix. Eugene, the son of Clarence, was therefore not a technical heir at law of the testatrix by reason of the fact that his father, Clarence, was living. And when the testatrix in this codicil speaks of her other heirs, it is evident that she used the word 'heir' in the colloquial sense and not technically, and that she regarded Eugene as one of her 'heirs,' according to the common usage of the term as meaning simply the legatees under the will, her beneficiaries, and by 'other heirs' the residuary legatees 'other' than Eugene. Now, it is further evident that if Clarence, the brother of deceased, and one of her technical heirs at law at the time of making the will and codicils, should at any time after making the second codicil have died before decedent, how could the other heirs at law, technically so called, prevent Eugene from succeeding, as an heir at law of deceased, by right of representation in lieu of his father, Clarence, being the child of a deceased brother, who was an heir at law, unless it was the intention of testatrix in this will that the residuary legatees should take the whole residuum, to the exclusion of her heirs at law? Unless this construction is given to the will, how would it be possible for the 'other heirs' to 'see that this is carried out,' namely, Eugene prevented from succeeding to a greater portion of the estate than $5? The only way in which Eugene could by every possibility be shut off from succeeding as an heir would be by the construction given to this will by the appellant, namely, that the surviving legatees named in the residuary clause shall take all lapsed, void, and revoked legacies 'in proportion' or pro rata."

We cannot, however, agree with appellant as to the conclusiveness of the argument here presented. Nor is it as plain to this court as it seems to be to appellant that this language creates a bequest by necessary implication. To the mind of the court, the testatrix disposed of her property by 14 different legacies to 14 different legatees. These legatees constituted a "class" only in the sense that it may be said as to any will that all legatees are in a class, as separated from the rest of the world, or as separated from other legatees in other wills. In no other sense, and in no legal sense at all, were these legacies a gift to a class; nor were the legatees a class. So plain we take this proposition to be that we hesitate even to quote authority upon the proposition, but in quoting it is certainly enough to set forth the following from Jarman on Wills (6th Ed.) p. 432: "A gift to several named persons is not a gift to a class, unless words of contingency are added, as where the gift is to A., B., C., and D., 'if living'; and a gift to several named persons, without more, is not a gift to a class, even if they stand in a common relationship to the testator, as where the gift is to my sons A. and B., and to my daughter C.; and if a testator, after a gift to children, proceeds to name them, and he specifies their number, as by giving to the five children of A., this is a designation personorum, and is a bequest to those who are named, or to the five in existence at the time of the will, and the shares of any who dies before the testator lapse." See, also, Estate of Hittell, 141 Cal. 432, 75 Pac. 53, and Estate of Murphy, 157 Cal. 63, 106 Pac. 230, 137 Am. St. Rep. 110.

[2] The court's decree of distribution was correct in holding that the legacies to the strangers in blood, who predeceased the testatrix, became a part of the undisposed residuum of the estate and went to the heirs at law. Estate of Sutor, 139 Cal. 87, 72 Pac. 827. Equally sound was the court's conclusion as to the relatives who died leaving lineal descendants. The case is simply one where, as was said in the Estate of Hit- tell, supra, the decedent did not anticipate every contingency and changed condition.

The decree appealed from is affirmed.

FIXTURES ($ 15*) — STORE FRONTS — "TRADE FIXTURES."

Heavy plate glass windows and marble installed by a tenant as the front of a store building cannot be regarded as "trade fixtures" which he was entitled to remove, where removal exposed the interior of the building, though it was accomplished without wrenching nails, breaking beams, or weakening the building.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by Victoria Alden against C. E. Mayfield. From a judgment for defendant and from an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

W. U. Goodman, of Fairfield, for appellant. T. T. C. Gregory, of Fairfield, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff sued to recover damages for injury to her freehold and for an injunction to restrain threatened future damages. The specific charge of damages was that the defendant "between midnight of the 28th day of May and daylight of the 28th day of May, wrongfully and unlawfully cut down, tore out, and removed the heavy plate glass and stone front of a brick building belonging to plaintiff and replaced the same with a cheap temporary structure with great damage to said property and the said plaintiff in the sum of $1,000." Defendant admitted the taking down and removal of the plate glass and the marble stone front, but alleged that while tenant of the building he placed the plate glass and marble in the building; that the windows and marble were owned by him "and were placed there by him for the purpose of trade, ornament, and convenience only, and were trade fixtures, and not an integral part of the said store or premises, and could be and were removed without any injury to the premises." The court found in accordance with this averment of the answer. It further found that defendant threatened to remove fixtures which were part of the freehold, and as a conclusion of law declared that plaintiff was entitled to an injunction restraining defendant from injuring the freehold; but by its judgment withheld the injunction and gave judgment for defendant for costs. From this judgment, and from the order denying her motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

It is to be noted that the answer does not base the right of removal upon any agreement between the landlord and tenant, and the court does not find that the removal was by virtue of any such agreement. Wherefore, all of respondent's argument based upon section 1013 of the Civil Code is meaningless. The pleadings and the findings are to the effect that the property removed was the tenant's property, was affixed to the freehold for the purpose of trade, ornament, and convenience, and had not become an integral part of the store or premises. This is a finding under section 1019 of the Civil Code, which permits such removals under the indicated circumstances. The questions presented are, first, whether the plate glass and marbles so removed belonged to the defendant, and whether, if they so belonged to the defendant, they were attached to the freehold in such manner as to justify his removal of them. That they were attached by screws is uncontradicted. That the plate glass windows and the marble formed the front of the store occupied by defendant is equally without controversy. Their removal necessarily, and against any evidence to the contrary, was the removal not of a fixture but of a portion of the building itself—the very front of the store. By such removal the building itself ceased to be an inclosure, and was open to intruders and the elements. The testimony of the contractor who placed the windows and marbles in place, to the effect that "they were so attached that the removal could be effected without injury to the premises," could only mean that they were so attached that in the process of removal the rest of the building would not be weakened or injured. If the evidence meant anything else, it was contrary to the manifest physical facts, and can have no weight; for it is futile to say that the removal of the plate glass and marble front of a store is not an injury to the building itself, and so to the freehold. But construing this evidence to mean only that the process of removal did not, by the wrenching of nails, or the breaking of beams or the weakening of the structure, injure the building, it must be said that the evidence does not support the finding, for it is not and cannot be disputed that by the removal the building was injured and its value impaired. Nor is respondent's position strengthened by calling this store front of marble and glass trade fixtures or trade ornaments to attract patronage. They were not trade fixtures nor trade ornaments. They constituted a part and an important part of the building itself. Concededly a beautiful store front of plate glass and marble may be expected to exercise a trade attraction superior to unkempt windows and dirty wood, but the plate glass and stone front do not for this reason suffer conversion from their true character as part of the building, into a mere trade ornament.

The famous dome of Tiffany glass in Marshall Field's Chicago establishment undoubtedly exercises by its beauty a trade attraction. But one would not therefore acquiesce in the proposition that the tenant could remove the dome as a trade fixture and ornament. The same is true here. Under the very language of section 1019 of the Civil Code the plate glass and marble had become an integral part of the premises by their use and by the very manner in which they were affixed. They were so affixed by screws and by these screws made a part of the store front. Section 660, Civil Code, declares that: "A thing is deemed to be affixed to land when it is permanently attached to what is thus permanent on the land, as by means of cement, plaster, nails, bolts or screws." It is useless to discuss so plain a proposition, or to do more than to cite, amongst the many authorities bearing upon it, McNally v. Connolly, 70 Cal. 3, 11 Pac. 320; Hendy v. Dinkerhoff, 57 Cal. 6; Lavenson v. Standard Soap Co., 80 Cal. 245, 22 Pac. 184, 13 Am. St. Rep. 147.

Upon the question of ownership, it is made to appear that defendant as tenant desired to make certain changes in the building. On account of the cost of these changes, he was allowed by plaintiff $175, or, in other words, plaintiff bore $175 of the cost of these changes upon her premises. Defendant testifies that the plate glass windows and the marbles were his, and that the $175 was not applied in whole or in part to their cost or to their placement. In this, however, he is contradicted by statements in his own handwriting presented to his landlord, where for several months he deducted $20 from the rent on account of these very changes in the store front.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Unconditional acceptance by a landlord of moneys as rent accruing after possession should have been surrendered under notice to quit is strong evidence of waiver of the notice, but not conclusive; intent to waive being an essential element.

Department 2. Appeals from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by Victoria Alden against C. E. Mayfield. From the judgment and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals, and defendant appeals from a judgment for plaintiff on a cross-complaint. Reversed and remanded.

T. T. C. Gregory, of Fairfield, for appellant. W. U. Goodman, of Fairfield, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff sued in ejectment to recover possession of certain property, which possession was withheld by defendant after service upon him of 30 days' notice to quit. In separate counts and causes of action plaintiff sought to recover, besides the possession of the property, damages for its detention and the value of the rents and profits. Sullivan v. Davis, 4 Cal. 291; Johnson v. Visher, 96 Cal. 310, 31 Pac. 106.

The admitted facts are that Victoria Alden, plaintiff, was the owner of a store in Suisun which the defendant had been occupying under a tenancy from month to month, paying therefor a rental value of $65 a month. In June, 1908, there was served upon the defendant a notice of an increase of rent from $65 a month to $100 a month. This increase in rent was never paid by defendant, but defendant continued in possession, paying $65 a month and contending that the notice of an increase of rent was waived by R. C. Haile, agent of the plaintiff, duly authorized to make such waiver. Haile resided in Suisun, Mrs. Alden, his mother, resided in Oakland, and Haile managed her property. By direction to Haile the rent was to be deposited each month in a local bank to the credit of plaintiff. In the latter part of March, 1910, Mrs. Alden was at her bank in Suisun, and discovered that the defendant had been paying, not $100 a month, but $65 a month. She sought and had an interview with him at the bank, in which interview she demanded the payment of the back rent. Defendant refused to acknowledge the indebtedness, saying that her son Richard had declared that the rent should remain without increase. Mrs. Alden then informed him that Mr. Haile had no authority to reduce the rent, and, upon the defendant's offer to pay $100 a month if he could secure a lease for a term of years, Mrs. Alden answered that she declined to have anything further to do with him, and would not let him remain longer in possession of the property under any circumstances. Mrs. Alden then immediately consulted her attorney, and upon May 2, 1910, served upon defendant a formal notice to quit and surrender possession upon the last day of May, 1910. Civ. Code, § 827. The complaint alleged that the defendant "refused on the 1st day of June, 1910, to deliver up said possession of the said premises to said plaintiff and continues in possession of same without the consent and against the will and wish of plaintiff; that said defendant now withholds the possession of said premises from the said plaintiff." This allegation is not denied by the answer. But, notwithstanding his failure to deny, defendant undertakes to plead a waiver of the notice to quit, and does so by averring that, under the terms of the lease, he was to deposit the rental upon the first of each and every month in a local bank to the credit of plaintiff; that all sums paid as rental have been so deposited; that on or about June 1, 1910, and on or about the first of each succeeding month, defendant has deposited a like sum in like manner; that "R. C. Haile, agent of plaintiff as aforesaid, is duly authorized to draw from the bank any money on deposit there to the credit of plaintiff; that said R. C. Haile knew that the notice to quit had been served as therein alleged ever since on or about April 12, 1910, and with full knowledge of the breach thereof and that defendant was in possession of the said premises contrary to the said notice, accepted the said sum deposited as the rent for June and with full knowledge thereof has accepted a like sum on or about the 1st of each and every succeeding month."

[1] Appeal No. 1914. The foregoing outlines the important issues presented upon this appeal, which is taken by the plaintiff from the judgment and from the order denying her motion for a new trial. The court's findings were in favor of the defendant as to the agency of Haile and his waiver of the increase in rent to $100 a month, which was to go into effect upon the 31st day of July, 1908. The waiver it is found was an oral waiver. Upon the waiver of the notice to quit and surrender possession the findings follow the allegations of the answer.

Appellant attacks these findings as being unsupported. The first to invite consideration are those which find that Haile, the duly authorized agent of plaintiff, waived the increase of rent from $65 to $100 a month. Without reviewing the evidence, it is enough to say that there is sufficient to establish the agency and the power of Haile to make this waiver. It is true that the notification was in writing, and that the waiver was by parol agreement. Civ. Code, § 1698. But it sufficiently appears from the unconditional acceptance by the agent of the lesser amount of rent that the oral agreement became executed and therefore binding. It is argued that Mrs. Alden knew nothing of this purported waiver, and this is doubtless true. Yet she had clothed her son as her agent, actual or ostensible, with sufficient power to make the waiver, and she is bound by his conduct in so doing. True it is, also, that Haile, who at the trial was dead, had denied by verified answer that he had ever agreed to such a waiver. True it is that in other respects the evidence upon the matter is sharply conflicting, but, as has been said, there is sufficient to support the finding of the court in this regard.

[2] The same, however, cannot be said of the finding of the waiver of the notice to quit. All the facts and all the circumstances demonstrate that there was no waiver, and that the defendant never honestly believed that there was a waiver. Those facts and circumstances are the following: He knew, and so testifies, that in March, 1910, Mrs. Alden insisted upon the payment of the back rent and refused to accept his explanation that her son had waived it, then telling him in terms that her son had no authority so to do. He knew, and so testifies, that, because of this difference and of other grievances which Mrs. Alden entertained against him, she refused and to him declared that she refused to allow him longer to occupy her premises upon any terms. He knew that the notice to quit was thereafter promptly served upon him. He knew who Mrs. Alden's attorney was and consulted that attorney, seeking a way out of his difficulties, and was by this attorney informed that he, the attorney, had sole charge of the matter, and that Haile had nothing further to do with the property. He was by this attorney informed that the notice to quit would be enforced, and that he would be expected to deliver possession upon the 1st of June following. In his answer he even admits that he was withholding possession without the consent and against the will of the plaintiff, but seeks to justify that holding because of an asserted waiver by the agent of plaintiff. And in what did that waiver consist? His tenancy terminated with the beginning of June 1st. Yet upon June 1st he deposits with the bank not even the $100 a month rental insisted upon by Mrs. Alden, but $65. He did this without notice to Mrs. Alden, her attorney or to Haile. This action in ejectment was begun the day after. Nothing could more clearly evince a refusal to waive the terms of the notice, or a refusal to accept rent, than the commencement of this action, and yet it is contended and found, because this amount was thus slipped into the bank and by the bank placed to the credit of the plaintiff, that she had waived her right to enforce the termination of the tenancy. To this point the contention is so preposterous as not to merit discussion. But it is said that the tenant continued month by month so to deposit the $65, and that Haile must have known of this, and that, therefore, Haile's acceptance and use of the money constitutes the waiver, though admittedly Haile's principal, the plaintiff herein, knew nothing about it. The difficulty with this argument is that the defendant was informed before the deposit of money, both by the principal and by her attorney, that Haile no longer had anything to do with the matter, and we repeat that defendant's endeavor under those circumstances to re-establish the relationship of tenancy with the landlord who had repudiated him and terminated the tenancy was but a shallow bit of subterfuge and trickery.

[3] In this connection it should be added that, doubtless on the theory that Haile's agency and his power to waive the terms of the notice to quit had been established, the court improperly refused to allow plaintiff to testify that only at the trial had she for the first time discovered that defendant had so deposited the money, that such deposits were without her authority, and that she instructed the bank to return them.

[4-6] Still further in this connection, it is to be noted that the defendant does not deny, as it was incumbent upon him to deny, the allegation that he was holding over against the will and consent of the plaintiff. This he admits and the admission under the circumstances is a pregnant one. It amounts to an admission that he knew there was no waiver and no continuation of the tenancy so far as plaintiff was concerned. The testimony as to the receipt of the rents amounts to no more than this. The plaintiff owned other pieces of property, and had other tenants thereon. One and all they were instructed to deposit their rents when due to her credit in the local bank. The local bank received these deposits and credited them to the account of plaintiff. Not having received positive instructions from the plaintiff to the contrary, they received the deposits made by defendant on and after June 1st, entered them in a bank book, and credited them to the account of plaintiff. It does not appear except inferentially, and because of the fact that Haile had possession of the bank book from time to time, that even Haile knew that defendant was depositing moneys for rent, and it certainly does not appear that Haile ever knew that defendant was claiming that he (Haile) had assented to a continuation of the tenancy and to a waiver of the notice to quit. The unconditional acceptance by a landlord of moneys as rent, which rent has accrued after the time the tenant should have surrendered possession, will constitute strong evidence of the landlord's waiver of his notice to quit. 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 402. But waiver always rests upon intent. Waiver is the intentional relinquishment of a known right after knowledge of the facts. Silva v. Campbell, 84 Cal. 422, 24 Pac. 316. Therefore the evidence, so far from establishing a waiver, with all that a waiver implies—a meeting of minds and the intentional forbearance to enforce a right—clearly establishes that there was no waiver, but only an effort by defendant surreptitiously to do something which might in some way advantage him and enable him the longer to hold possession. This is made manifest from the fact that defendant was not prepared to leave the building, had no other location or store in which to move his goods, and was desirous of remaining where he was until he could secure other accommodations. The finding in this respect being unsupported, it follows that the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial. And it is ordered accordingly.

Judgment in 1944.

Appeal No. 1940. Besides answering plaintiff's complaint, defendant cross-complained and presented as grounds of cross-complaint the disturbance of his quiet possession and the injury to his business occasioned by the acts of Haile, agent of plaintiff, while defendant was occupying the premises as the tenant of plaintiff. In particular the cross-complaint charged that: "Within the last year, and both before and after June 1, 1910, the said R. C. Haile, agent as aforesaid, entered the said premises and threatened to immediately remove defendant and his said stock of merchandise from the premises. Said R. C. Haile on all of these occasions told the defendant that he owed many thousands of dollars back rent and requested its payment, and demanded possession of the premises on behalf of plaintiff and as her agent and said that the said plaintiff was entitled to the possession thereof. The said R. C. Haile, agent as aforesaid, on all of these many occasions talked in a loud and threatening manner. On one of the said occasions it was necessary for the defendant to eject the said Haile from the said premises on account of the great disturbance he was creating."

[7, 8] The court found in accordance with the allegation last above quoted, and further found that "the quiet enjoyment and possession of defendant was molested and disturbed to such an extent that he concluded to sell and did sell his said stock at a great sacrifice and at more than $3,127.59 below its real worth and cost and suffered a loss thereby including prospective benefits of more than $7,691.22." Further findings of the court are identical with those just considered in the previous appeal, and are to the effect that the tenancy was continued after June 1st, through the waiver of the notice to quit. The court's unexplained conclusion of law from these findings is that the plaintiff take nothing by his cross-complaint, and judgment upon the cross-complaint was entered accordingly. From that judgment cross-complainant and defendant Mayfield appeals upon the judgment roll alone, and urges, with justice, that the tenant under a tenancy from month to month is as much entitled to damages for an illegal interference with his tenancy as is any other tenant. This is true. Heilbron v. Centerville & Kingsburg Irr. Ditch Co., 76 Cal. 8, 17 Pac. 932; Dwyer v. Carroll, 86 Cal. 298, 24 Pac. 1015; McDowell v. Hyman, 117 Cal. 67, 48 Pac. 984. And in proper cases damages may be predicated upon a loss of prospective profit. Lambert v. Haskell, 80 Cal. 611, 22 Pac. 327; Civ. Code, § 3300; Hawthorne v. Siegel, 88 Cal. 159, 25 Pac. 1114, 22 Am. St. Rep. 291.

[9] Appellant next contends upon the authority of such cases as Overacre v. Blake, 82 Cal. 77, 22 Pac. 979, that this appeal presents a case where the findings are unattacked and are sufficient to support a judgment in his favor, but that the conclusions of law are erroneously drawn from the findings; that, since the findings establish that the judgment should be in his favor, this court will reverse the judgment upon appeal, with directions to the court below to enter a correct judgment upon the findings. In many cases, indeed it may be said that ordinarily, such would be the ruling and direction of this court. But not so here, nor in any case where to do so would be to countenance a grave injustice. In this case, as in the preceding appeal, the whole superstructure rests upon the finding of the continuation of defendant's tenancy after June 1st. That finding, as we have said and discussed, is unsupported, and upon direct appeal the case in which that finding has been made has been reversed. To grant appellant's request in the present instance would be to countenance a judgment based upon this unsupported finding and cast the plaintiff in damages in the sum of over $7,000, for no dollar of which the record shows her justly liable. Under the plenary powers vested in this court by section 53 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it will order a judgment only in a proper case and order a new trial where the action seems to demand it. Certainly this is such an occasion; for, in addition to what has already been said, the allegation of the cross-complaint and the finding of the court thereon still further negative the idea that Haile could have waived or could have believed that he had waived the notice to quit, or could in any other way have recognized the continuance of the tenancy, since the finding is that before and after June 1st he was repeatedly threatening to remove defendant and his stock of merchandise from the premises and demanding possession of the premises—conduct absolutely foreign to any notion of a waiver and a renewal of tenancy.

Wherefore the judgment here appealed from is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Norton, Judge.

Action by Fanny Fieg against Emanuel Gjurich. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 160 Cal. 331, 116 Pac. 745.

Jacobs & Flack and A. H. Carpenter, both of Stockton, for appellant. Chas. Light, of Stockton (Percy S. Webster, of Stockton, of counsel), for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This action was brought by Fanny Fieg for the setting aside of a conveyance of real property on the ground of fraud. The court gave judgment in her favor. From it defendant appeals, and also prosecutes an appeal from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The findings, which are amply supported by the evidence, are to the effect that for 10 years prior to the delivery of the deed from plaintiff to defendant the parties to this action, although unmarried, had cohabited and lived together, on the premises owned by the plaintiff, as husband and wife; that they had there conducted a saloon, defendant acting for plaintiff and transacting nearly all of the business of the place for her; that she reposed an especial confidence and trust in defendant, and was in all things influenced and controlled by him; that Fanny Fieg was an old woman, infirm in health, and particularly susceptible to the influence of defendant for those reasons; that defendant corresponded with a special agent of the Treasury Department of the United States, informing him that uncanceled revenue stamps could be found upon plaintiff's premises, and that through his efforts revenue officers visited the place, and, assisted by defendant, there found uncanceled revenue stamps; and that plaintiff did not know of the existence of such stamps on the premises before they were found by the revenue officers. There are further findings, reciting the means by which defendant worked upon the fears of the aged plaintiff until she executed a deed conveying all of her property to him. It is not necessary to recite all of these findings, but among them are the following: "That beginning about two weeks immediately preceding said 27th day of November, 1907, said defendant at different times during said two weeks told said plaintiff that said revenue officers were about to and would again visit her said premises, and they would arrest said plaintiff for having in her possession said uncanceled stamps, and also for having in her possession certain confederate bills; that immediately preceding said 27th day of November, 1907, said defendant held in his hand and showed said plaintiff a letter, which he said that he had just received from the said revenue officers; that in and by said letter he was informed and notified that the said revenue officers were coming to her said premises, and that said revenue officers would then and there arrest said plaintiff, and that said revenue officers would proceed to and would confiscate all of her said property, and that she would be imprisoned in the state's prison from five to ten years; that said defendant then and there informed said plaintiff that there was but one way of saving her property from said threatened confiscation and loss, and that was by conveying the whole of her said property to him (defendant); that he (defendant) would save and hold all of her said property for her."

We are at a loss to know why appellant contends that such representations, shown to have been false, were not sufficient to constitute fraud and to support the judgment. The whole record shows a most despicable and carefully planned swindle by which the old woman was deprived of her property. Appellant's principal contention seems to be that, the land having been conveyed to defeat the government, it may not be recovered by the grantor. In this behalf he cites such cases as Hills v. Sherwood, 48 Cal. 386, and Sexey v. Adkinson, 34 Cal. 346, 91 Am. Dec. 698, which hold that a conveyance, made for the purpose of defrauding creditors, is good as against all the world except creditors. But such cases have no application here. The rule announced by those cases applies to persons in pari delicto; but where one acts under the influence and domination of another standing in a relation of trust and confidence, and the conveyance is obtained by means of that very relation, equity will always cancel the deed. 6 Cyc. 317, and cases there cited.

No other questions raised by appellant require special comment.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; N. A. Hawkins, Judge.

Action by C. Perkins against Theodore Blauth and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, Theodore Blauth, Charles F. Silva, and C. M. Goethe appeal. Modified and affirmed.

P. S. Driver and Devlin & Devlin, all of Sacramento, and Charles W. Thomas and Charles W. Thomas, Jr., both of Woodland, for appellants. Arthur C. Huston and Harry L. Huston, both of Woodland, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff sued defendants for damages in tort for injuries caused to his land. It is charged that the defendants cut a ditch some 60 feet wide and 12 feet deep through the bank of the Sacramento river and through a large levee constructed about 150 feet back from the river margin, to permit the passage of a dredger; that, after so excavating and cutting the bank, the defendants failed to erect a suitable dam or other fill sufficient to prevent the water of the Sacramento river from flowing through the ditch or canal thus dug and upon plaintiff's land; that, by reason of its negligence in this respect, the waters of the Sacramento river did flow through this canal upon plaintiff's land, inundating the same, carrying large deposits of sand, destroying fences, removing the soil, and injuring it in the amount sued for. The defendants were Blauth, Goethe and Silva, trustees of reclamation district No. 785, Ashley, the surveyor and engineer of the district, and the Bay & River Dredging Company, which cut the canal. The reclamation district was not made a party to the action, and a nonjoinder was set up by defendants' answer. It was proven at the trial that the defendants Blauth, Goethe, and Silva were acting in their official capacity as trustees of the reclamation district. A nonsuit was granted as to the Bay & River Dredging Company, and as to Ashley, the surveyor and engineer of the district. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff against the defendants Blauth, Goethe, and Silva. From the judgment which followed and from the order denying their motion for a new trial these defendants appeal.

[1] 1. The complaint sufficiently states a cause of action. While the complaint alleges that at all times therein mentioned plaintiff was the owner of the property, it is contended that it does not allege that he was the owner and in possession at the time of the commencement of the action, and it is argued that for all that appears to the contrary at the time of the commencement of the action plaintiff may have sold the property, and with it his right to damages for its injury. All, however, the plaintiff is required to show in this regard is his right of action at the time of the commencement of the suit.

[2] The answer tendered issue on the question of ownership by denying that plaintiff was at any time or at all the owner or in possession of the property. The ownership thus becoming an issue, evidence was introduced thereon, and the case was tried upon the theory of the issue thus joined. This sufficiently cured any defect that it may be conceived existed in the complaint.

[3] It is next urged that the complaint does not aver that the cutting of the canal, and the failure to erect the dam was done without plaintiff's consent. But we are not advised of any rule of pleading which requires a declaration from plaintiff that an unlawful trespass was committed without his acquiescence. There is no presumption that a plaintiff consents to an unwarranted invasion of his personal rights or rights of property.

[4] For the third objection to the sufficiency of the complaint, appellants argue that it is not averred that any work was negligently done, and that no facts are alleged from which negligence can be imputed. In this connection it is said that there is no averment that no dam or obstruction to the water of the river was erected, but only that no sufficient dam or other obstruction was erected. It is, of course, not necessary to aver in terms that an act was negligently done to state a cause of action in tort. Says Cooley (2 Elements of Torts, p. 19): "One may become liable in an action as for tort either (1) by actually doing to the prejudice of another something he has no legal right to do; (2) by doing something he may rightfully do, but wrongfully or negligently doing it by such means, or at such time, or in such manner, that another is injured; (3) by neglecting to do something which he ought to do, whereby another suffers injury." The allegations of the complaint taken together amount to this: That the defendants cut a canal through the natural bank of the Sacramento river. After cutting the canal, it failed to take proper precautions to prevent the waters of the river from flooding plaintiff's land; that the waters of the river did in fact flood plaintiff's land to his injury. The complaint was therefore sufficient to pass a general demurrer.

[5] 2. Notwithstanding the fact that Blauth, Goethe, and Silva were acting as trustees of the reclamation district, they were responsible to plaintiff for the injury occasioned to his property by the negligent performance of their duty. The argument of appellants against this proposition is that the reclamation district entered into a contract with the Dredging Company to do the dredging work; that the part which the defendants took was solely in their official capacity as trustees of the district. If the work was negligently performed, the legal responsibility rests upon the district alone. But, if a tortious act has been committed by an agent acting under authority of his principal, the fact that the principal thus becomes liable does not, of course, exonerate the agent from liability. It may be conceded that a liability was cast upon the principal. Hopkins v. Clemson College, 221 U. S. 636, 31 Sup. Ct. 654, 55 L. Ed. 890, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 243. But this fact in and of itself does not relieve from liability the agents of the reclamation district who permitted or committed the wrong. Appellants rely upon that class of cases which hold that, under circumstances where discretion is vested in public officers, those officers are not responsible for mistakes of judgment when they have honestly, though mistakenly, exercised their discretion. The doctrine is thus stated by Chief Justice Taney in Kendall v. Stokes, 3 How. 98, 11 L. Ed. 506: "A public officer is not liable to an action if he falls into error in a case where the act to be done is not merely a ministerial one, but is one in relation to which it is his duty to exercise judgment and discretion, even though an individual may suffer by his mistake." It is an unwarranted extension of this rule to seek to apply it to the exoneration of an officer for an act which would have been proper if performed by him with due care, but which has resulted in injury to another because of the performance by him without due care. Green v. Swift, 47 Cal. 536 (upon which appellants rely), was an action for damages brought by a property owner for injuries to his land because of the act of the commissioners of the state appointed under authority to rectify the channel of the American river. In so doing they forced the waters of the river upon the land of plaintiff to its injury and destruction. A bare majority of the court rendered the decision in this case. It was said that "there is no question that the work as done by the defendants was in point of execution done with proper care and skill." The reasoning of the opinion proceeds with the declaration that the work itself having been done with proper care and skill defendants are not responsible "for injuries to others resulting from the work itself," and it concludes that such damages belong to that class known as damnum absque injuria; the implication being that the state had the power to order the work done as a public convenience or necessity, and that the property owner whose lands were injured or destroyed in the process of the work was not entitled to redress under the constitutional provision forbidding the damaging or taking of private property for public use. The soundness of the conclusion in this case is open to grave question, in view of the later decision of the Supreme Court above cited. Hopkins v. Clemson College, 221 U. S. 636, 31 Sup. Ct. 654, 55 L. Ed. 890, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 243. The same may be said of De Baker v. Railway Co., 106 Cal. 257, 39 Pac. 610, 46 Am. St. Rep. 237, which cites Green v. Swift as authority to the proposition that the agents in the performance of work of public character are exempted from liability for any direct or consequential damages to third persons which may arise from their execution of the work, provided they execute it with due care and according to the adopted plan. But, giving to these cases all the weight as authority for which appellants contend, still it is apparent that they do not measure up to the contention which is advanced in this case. In this case the gravamen of the charge is that these agents did not exercise due care. In 47 Cal. and in 106 Cal., 39 Pac., 46 Am. St. Rep., it is expressly admitted that responsibility attaches to the agent if he has failed to exercise such care. Ballerino v. Mason, 83 Cal. 447, 23 Pac. 530, was an action against the assessor for damages; it being alleged that as assessor he "willfully and against law" assessed plaintiff's property at too large a sum. This court quoted the language of Chief Justice Taney as above given, held the complaint to be insufficient to charge that the assessor acted maliciously with intent to wrong or injure the owner, and declared that, in the absence of such averment, it must be assumed that the assessor simply erred in his judgment, and for such a mere error of judgment he was not responsible. To the same effect, under very similar circumstances, arose the case of Gridley School District v. Stout, 134 Cal. 592, 66 Pac. 785.

[6] The principles to be deduced from the decisions in this state are that municipal corporations are not liable for dereliction or remissness of municipal officers or agents in the performance of public or governmental functions of the city, or in the performance of duties imposed upon those officers which are prescribed and limited by express law; and, when an injury results from the wrongful act or omission of a municipal officer charged with duty prescribed and limited by law, the doctrine of respondeat superior is inapplicable. The officer is not treated as the agent or servant of the corporation in the performance of such duty, but is held to be the servant and agent of and controlled by the law, and, while for his tortious acts he will be held responsible, the municipality will not. Sievers v. San Francisco, 115 Cal. 648, 47 Pac. 687, 56 Am. St. Rep. 153. Upon the other hand, if the act is one commanded by the municipality itself, if inherently wrong, the municipality and the agent who performed will both be liable. Brownell v. Fisher, 57 Cal. 150; De Baker v. Railway Co., 106 Cal. 257, 39 Pac. 610, 46 Am. St. Rep. 237.

[7] If the injury results, however, not from the wrongful plan or character of the work, but from the negligent or improper manner in which it is performed, the one so negligently acting will always be responsible, and the public corporation may or may not be responsible, depending upon the relationship which it may sustain to that agent. Conniff v. San Francisco, 67 Cal. 45, 7 Pac. 41; De Baker v. Railway Co., supra; Denning v. State, 123 Cal. 316, 55 Pac. 1000; Melvin v. State, 121 Cal. 16, 53 Pac. 416.

[8] One important principle, however, is to be noted in this connection. Wherever the injury complained of is the taking or damaging of private property for public use without compensation then under the guarantee of the federal Constitution against such invasion of the private rights of property, neither the state itself nor any of its agencies or mandatories may claim exemption from liability. Amendment Const. U. S. art. 5; Hopkins v. Clemson College, supra. The case presented against these defendants is precisely that of Brownell v. Fisher, supra, and Bellegarde v. S. F. Bridge Co., 90 Cal. 180, 27 Pac. 20. In the Brownell Case the defendants, as here, were the trustees of a swamp land district, and for the trespass charged against them they urged that they were acting as trustees of the district, were authorized by the district to perform the acts which were done, wherefore the district was responsible for the damages occasioned by their acts, and not the defendants. In Bellegarde v. S. F. Bridge Co., the street contractor sued for damages urged as a defense that he had not been guilty of negligence in the performance of the work, but that the acts resulting in the injuries were justifiable and unavoidable in the prosecution of the lawful work authorized by the city and county of San Francisco. In both instances, to these asserted defenses, the answer of this court was the same, that regardless of the responsibility of the principals the agents were unquestionably responsible for the negligent performance of their duties.

[9] 3. The evidence established the negligence of the defendants in their failure to construct a suitable dam or fill to prevent the entrance into the cut or canal of the river water. The evidence showed that entering from the river the dredger made a cut 50 or 60 feet in width up to the levee, through the levee and along the side of respondent's ranch. Thereafter a small fill or dam was made between the excavation in the levee and the channel of the river. This fill was 4 feet below the natural bank of the river, and but 12 or 14 feet wide on top. Nothing further was done to obstruct the flow of the river or to protect the lands of the respondent. Thus, while theretofore respondent's lands had been protected by a levee situated from 100 to 150 feet from the natural bank, which levee was 20 to 50 feet on its base and about 8 feet above the natural surface of the ground, the condition left by these defendants was a canal 50 or 60 feet wide cut 12 feet below the natural surface and dammed to prevent the intruding waters to a height not even level with the natural surface, but 4 feet below. It is in evidence that this fill or dam gave way, with the resulting overflow of the respondent's lands while the water in the river was below its natural bank. There was a sand-bar near to the mouth of this canal, and the sand from this bar, by reason of the depth of the cut, was drawn through it and deposited in great quantities upon plaintiff's land.

[10] Many subordinate questions in the case as to whether the sand was actually deposited through the cut or through breaks in the levee in front of plaintiff's place, which afterwards occurred, were all submitted to the jury under conflicting evidence, and their findings are conclusive upon this court.

[11, 12] 4. The Bay & River Dredging Company was not an independent contractor, and the court was correct in instructing the jury to this effect. In cases where the nature of the contract between the parties establishing their relationship is in dispute, and the evidence thereon conflicting, the question of employé or independent contractor may properly be left to the jury under appropriate instructions from the court. But where the evidence is not conflicting and the contract between the parties is without dispute, the question of dependent or independent contractual relationship is one of law for the court. Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 78 Pac. 337. Such was the case here. The contract in terms was between the reclamation district and the Bay & River Dredging Company, but it provided that the dredger of the company should be at a place to be indicated by the trustees of the district by a given date "and from that time shall be under the direction and supervision of the said trustees, * * * and shall do the work of cutting itself from the Sacramento river into said district where and in the manner to be indicated by the said trustees, their superintendent or engineer. * * * After entering said district the said dredger 'Mogul' is to fill in a dam in the canal where the front of the levee has been cut and repair the same in such manner as may be indicated by said trustees, their superintendent, or engineer." Enough has thus been quoted to show how entirely foreign the facts and the contract in this case are to those appearing in Teller v. Bay & River Dredging Co., 151 Cal. 209, 90 Pac. 942, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 267, 12 Ann. Cas. 779, upon which appellants rely. In the Teller Case it was sought to charge responsibility upon the Frankenheimers, farmers, inexperienced in dredging work, who simply employed a dredger to dig a ditch upon their land and who exercised no control over the dredger or its operations other than to indicate the location of the ditch. It was held that the dredging company was responsible as an independent contractor and not the farmers. But, under the contract in the present case, the trustees, not only in fact directed what should be done and how it should be done, but the very right of direction and control was reserved to them by the contract, even the right of control in the specific matter of repairing the cut in the levee made by the dredger.

[13] 5. Defendants' argument that the damages were caused by an extraordinary flood, an act of God, to prevent the consequences of which the exercise of ordinary care would not avail, is not supported by the evidence. The evidence establishes that while there was a high flood, indeed it may be said an exceptional flood, the dam in the canal went out before the river was even bank full, and that it was by reason of the inadequacy and insufficiency of this dam that sand in injurious quantities was drawn through the cut and cast upon plaintiff's land.

[14] 6. To prove damages, evidence of the difference in the market value of the land before and after the injuries complained of was admitted. No objection was made to this evidence, but, after the witnesses had left the stand and the case was closed, defendants moved to strike out all the testimony. The motion was properly denied. People v. Samario, 84 Cal. 484, 24 Pac. 283.

[15] 7. The court instructed the jury fully and even elaborately, and the instructions were quite as favorable to the defendants upon all points as the law and the evidence warranted. Hedged about by the limitations which the court was careful to point out, to the effect that the jury could only award damages for the detriment or injury to the land which they found was caused by the negligent act of defendants, and that, if other causes contributed to the injury, defendants were not responsible, it was not error to instruct the jury that the difference in the market value of the land before and after the damage was the measure of defendants' liability. If, as appellants contend, there was no permanent injury to the land, or if the land could have been cleared of its sand and cured of its other injuries, and if respondent could have been reimbursed for all his losses for an amount much less than the damages awarded, it would have been permissible for appellants, in mitigation of the damages claimed by plaintiff, so to have established by evidence. They did not undertake to do so, or at least did not do so to the satisfaction of the jury, and appellants are therefore in no position here to complain.

[16] 8. The court erred in allowing interest upon the jury's award from the date of the injury. The damages were unliquidated until assessed by the jury, and only after judgment upon such assessment did legal interest run. Brady v. Wilcoxson, 44 Cal. 239; Hewes v. Germain Fruit Co., 106 Cal. 441, 39 Pac. 853; Ferrea v. Chabot, 121 Cal. 233, 53 Pac. 689, 1092.

The judgment is therefore modified by striking out the allowance of interest. In all other respects the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed. Respondent will recover costs upon this appeal.

1. INSURANCE (§ 580*)—DESTRUCTION OF PERSONALTY PENDING ADMINISTRATION—RIGHT OF LEGATEE TO INSURANCE MONEY.

Where the executrix, to whom personalty was bequeathed, procured a fire policy thereon, and the property was destroyed by fire during administration, the insurance money took the place of the personalty destroyed, and passed to her.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 500*)—MANAGEMENT OF ESTATE—SPECULATION—COMPENSATION.

Where an executrix, empowered by will to sell real estate when a fair price might be obtained therefor satisfactory to all, sold real estate of which she was co-owner, and exercised the same judgment with respect to the estate's interest as she did toward her own, and her two brothers, who were co-owners with her, coincided with her views, and she acted with fidelity and prudence, she was entitled to commissions on the sale, as against the objection that she speculated with the property of the estate.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Proceedings for the distribution of the estate of Margaret Robl, deceased. From a decree of distribution, the parties aggrieved appeal. Affirmed.

R. F. Mogan, of San Francisco, for appellant. Percy E. Towne, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. [1] 1. By this appeal it is sought to modify a decree of distribution which gave to Catherine E. Robl the insurance collected on furniture which had been specifically bequeathed to her and had been burned during administration. Catherine E. Robl, to whom the furniture had been bequeathed, was also the executrix of the estate. The insurance was under a policy payable to the executrix, and $712.50 was collected upon the insurance policy after the destruction of the furniture. Title to the furniture vested in the legatee at the death of the testatrix. There would be no equity in depriving the legatee of the insurance indemnity, and in giving it to the estate, to which it did not belong. If, as implied, the executrix improperly charged insurance premiums to the estate, that is a matter for adjustment in her account, but is not before this court. It is well settled, in cases such as this, that the insurance money takes the place of the personal property destroyed. Wyman v. Wyman, 26 N. Y. 253; Haxall v. Shippen, 37 Va. 536, 34 Am. Dec. 745; Culbertson v. Cox, 29 Minn. 309, 13 N. W. 177, 43 Am. Rep. 204; Parry v. Ashley, 3 Simons, 97; Durant v. Friend, 11 Eng. Law & Eq. 2.

[2] 2. Under the assertion that the executrix was "speculating" with the property of the estate, it is contended that the court erred in allowing her commissions on the sale of real estate; the fact being that, because of the great conflagration of 1906, the real property was sold thereafter for a less price than could have been obtained before. The language of the will provided that the property "may be sold when a fair price may be obtained therefor satisfactory to all." The executrix herself was co-owner of the property in question. She exercised the same judgment and adopted the same policy with respect to the estate's interest in the property as she did toward her own. Her two brothers, who were co-owners with her and the estate in the property, coincided with her views. It is shown that the executrix acted with fidelity, and with that degree of prudence and diligence which one of ordinary judgment would be expected to bestow upon his own affairs of like nature. Indeed, more than this, it is shown that it was the very judgment which she did exercise in her own affairs of the same nature, and this fills the requirement of an executor's duty. In re Moore, 96 Cal. 522, 31 Pac. 584.

The decree appealed from is therefore affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by James P. Massie against A. Chatom. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William H. Jordan, of San Francisco, W. H. Hatton, of Modesto, J. E. Foulds and Frank Shay, both of San Francisco, J. W. Hawkins, of Modesto, and Jordan, Rowe & Brann, of San Francisco, for appellant. P. H. Griffin, of Modesto, and Olney, Pringle & Mannon, J. M. Mannon, Jr., Page, McCutchen, Knight & Olney, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought to enforce the payment of two promissory notes, each for $4,000, which notes were given by defendant to plaintiff. Plaintiff is a real estate agent, and was the agent of plaintiff for the sale of the latter's ranch. Defendant, a farmer and the owner of the ranch, entered into a written contract with plaintiff, agreeing to pay him a commission for his services in "introducing a purchaser and effecting a sale" of defendant's Lakeview ranch. Plaintiff brought to defendant as intending purchasers Louis Bartlett and George J. G. Marsily. In conversation it developed that Bartlett and Marsily were not themselves financially able to purchase the ranch, but desired an option upon it, hoping to interest European investors and through them to secure the funds to make the purchase. In the negotiations had between plaintiff, defendant, and these prospective purchasers the discussion turned upon the price at which defendant would sell his ranch. A price of $12.50 per acre and $1,000 added was agreed upon. By the time the discussion had reached this point the hour had grown late, and it was agreed to postpone further negotiations until the next day. Before separating, and solely to avoid discussion upon the question of price when the negotiations were again resumed, a preliminary memorandum was drawn up by Bartlett at plaintiff's suggestion. This memorandum is as follows: "San Francisco, Dec. 23rd, 1904. It is hereby agreed that the Chatom ranch in Stanislaus Co., consisting of about eight thousand acres, is this day sold to George J. G. Marsily and Louis Bartlett for the sum of twelve and 50/100 dollars ($12.50) per acre and the further sum of one thousand dollars, payable $10,000 when the title to said property has been found to be good and merchantable, thirty thousand dollars July first, 1905, balance in two annual payments of equal size, due respectively July 1, 1906, and July 1, 1907. Seller to assume the commission of J. P. Massie. A. Chatom. George J. G. Marsily. Louis Bartlett. J. P. Massie." No copies or duplicates were made of this memorandum which was taken by Chatom, by him entrusted to plaintiff, and by the plaintiff produced at the trial. On the following day the same persons met at Bartlett's office in San Francisco pursuant to agreement. Their conversation and negotiations resulted in an option contract in which Chatom acknowledged the receipt of $500 on account of the purchase price of his ranch, and granted Bartlett and Marsily 90 days within which to make further payment. Provision was made for the furnishing of abstracts by Chatom, to be examined by Bartlett and Marsily, and for partial payments of the purchase price at times stated. There was nothing, however, in the option which made it obligatory in any way upon Bartlett and Marsily or either of them to purchase the ranch. After this option agreement was signed, Massie took Chatom into an adjoining room, and asked him to sign the two promissory notes here in suit, representing $8,000 commission on the sale of the ranch. Chatom declined to sign the notes on the ground that the commission had not been earned. He asked Bartlett's advice whether to sign or not and Bartlett declined to advise him. Massie then told Chatom that he need have no hesitation about signing the notes, that he would never have to pay them unless the sale went through. In reliance upon this statement Chatom signed the notes. The $500 paid by Bartlett and Marsily for the option was immediately given by Chatom to Massie, and this $500 explains the payment of $500 indorsed upon one of these notes. In February, 1905, Bartlett notified Chatom that he and his associate would proceed no further under their contract, and the option thus lapsed. Following defendant's refusal to pay the promissory notes, this action was brought. The findings follow the statement of facts above set forth, and judgment was given in favor of defendant under his defense of want of consideration. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The evidence not only supports the findings of the court, but it is overwhelmingly in favor of those findings, the evidence of Bartlett, Marsily, and Chatom, the real parties to the option agreement and to the agreement preceding the option agreement, being all to the same effect. Thus they are all agreed that the contract of December 23d, above quoted, was never meant or understood to be a completed contract of purchase and sale, or anything more than a memorandum of the selling price of the ranch, which memorandum was to obviate the necessity of further discussion upon that subject when they resumed the next day their negotiations as to terms. Moreover, it appears from the testimony of all of them that it was distinctly understood that Bartlett and Marsily, not having the financial ability so to do, could not and would not engage to purchase the ranch, but did desire to secure an option upon it in the hope of interesting European capital in the purchase. It is further in evidence that the suggestion as to the memorandum of December 23d, came from Mr. Massie himself.

[1, 2] Appellant's propositions upon appeal may be thus summarized. He contends first that he fulfilled all the conditions of his agency so as to entitle him to the agreed commissions, namely, that he produced a purchaser willing and able to purchase the property, who entered into a contract of purchase with the owner satisfactory to the owner himself; and, second, that the defense of no consideration of the promissory notes is not in truth a defense of no consideration, but is an unwarranted effort by parol to vary the terms of a written contract. Neither of these positions, however, is well taken. The duties of a real estate agent under such a contract as the one under consideration are well settled in this state and well defined by such cases as Gunn v. Bank of California, 99 Cal. 349, 33 Pac. 1105, and Mattingly v. Pennie, 105 Cal. 514, 39 Pac. 200, 45 Am. St. Rep. 87. In the former case it is said: "The contract of the broker is to negotiate a sale; that is, to procure a valid contract, to purchase, which can be enforced by the vendor if his title is perfect, or, if he does not procure such contract to bring the vendor and the proposed purchaser together, that the vendor may secure such a contract, unless he is willing to trust to an oral agreement." In the latter case it is said: "The readiness and willingness of a person to purchase the property can be shown only by an offer on his part to purchase; and unless he has actually entered into a contract binding him to purchase, or has offered to the vendor, and not merely to the broker, to enter into such contract, he cannot be considered a purchaser." Appellant insists that the contract of December 23d, and the contract of December 24th, each and both were valid, enforceable contracts of purchase, as well as valid, enforceable contracts of sale, and that, therefore, he had performed all of his duties and was not obliged to wait for his compensation until the actual consummation of the sale. The premises being granted, the conclusion is irresistible. But the difficulty is that the findings of the court are wholly against him. Conceding that in its terms the contract of December 23d, is sufficiently explicit as a contract of purchase and sale under such authorities as Preble v. Abrahams, 88 Cal. 245, 26 Pac. 99, 22 Am. St. Rep. 301, and King-Keystone Oil Co. v. S. F. Brick Co., 148 Cal. 87, 82 Pac. 849, the answer to this is that by the testimony of all the parties to it it was not intended to be a contract of sale, but a mere memorandum of price, to be used in future negotiations. To this the vendor upon the one hand and the vendees upon the other are in full accord. The result, therefore, is that, if the contract in terms is more than such a memorandum, it is the result of the mutual mistake of the parties, and neither could in honesty have gone before a court to enforce it according to its terms. It would have at once been subject to reformation because of the mutual mistake.

[3, 4] And in this case these facts were susceptible of proof by parol, since the mistake was mutual, and also because the rule excluding parol evidence which tends to vary or contradict a written contract applies only in actions between parties thereto or their privies. Marsily was in no sense a party to this contract. Code Civ. Proc., 1856; Dunn v. Price, 112 Cal. 46, 44 Pac. 354; Bickerdike v. State, 144 Cal. 681, 78 Pac. 270. With far less force does the argument of appellant apply to the option contract of December 24th. From its terms this was a unilateral contract of sale. It was a mere option to Bartlett and Marsily to purchase within a limited time upon agreed terms, without attempting in any way to bind them to make the purchase.

Up to this point it appears that appellant did not secure a purchaser who did enter or was willing to enter into a contract with the defendant for the purchase of the land. The utmost that he did was to secure for defendant persons who took from plaintiff an option to purchase, not enforceable against the intending vendees. Up to this point, therefore, the consideration for the notes had wholly failed. It may be conceded, without deciding the question, that, if the option had been exercised and the purchase under it completed, plaintiff would have been in a position to enforce the collection of the promissory notes as representing his commissions on the sale. But with the lapsing of the option all consideration for the promissory notes failed utterly. There is no parallelism between the case thus presented and that of Carver v. San Joaquin Cigar Co., 16 Cal. App. 572, 118 Pac. 91, upon which appellant relies. In the latter case full recognition is made of the indisputable legal proposition that oral evidence is admissible to impeach the consideration of a promissory note, and, as has been said, the evidence in this case establishes a total failure of consideration. But it is held, and properly held, by the Court of Appeal that a valid consideration for the promissory note there in suit was established by a showing of a pre-existing indebtedness and the effort really made was to avoid the obligation of the note, not for failure of consideration, but because of the breach of a contemporaneous oral agreement totally at variance with the terms of the note itself.

No other matters call for special consideration.

For the reasons given, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. EDWARDS. (Cr. 1,736.)

1. JURY (§ 135*) — CRIMINAL CASES — "PEREMPTORY CHALLENGE" — EXAMINATION OF JURORS—RIGHT TO.

Under Pen. Code, § 1067, which defines "peremptory challenge" as an objection to a juror for which no reason need be given, under sections 1081, 1082, providing for the examination of witnesses on challenge to jurors, and under sections 1087, 1088, which provide for peremptory challenges after challenges for cause, the accused is not entitled to examine a juror upon his voir dire to determine whether a peremptory challenge should be used upon him.

2. JURY (§ 103*)—CRIMINAL CASES—QUALIFICATIONS—OPINION AS TO GUILT.

It was not error in a criminal case to overrule accused's challenge to a juror, though he stated on his voir dire that he had talked with other persons, not witnesses, about the merits of the case, and that from what he had heard and read that he had formed an opinion as to accused's guilt, and that the opinion was so fixed that it would require evidence to remove it, where he stated that the opinion was founded entirely upon public rumor, and that, notwithstanding such opinion, he could and would set aside the opinion and act entirely upon the evidence; the trial court's decision upon his conflicting statements being conclusive.

3. RAPE (§ 59*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for rape upon a girl under 16 years old, an instruction that the jury should consider the fact that she made no outcry and concealed the offense for several days was properly refused, since those facts were immaterial.

SHAW, J. The appeal is from the judgment, and from the order denying a new trial.

Defendant was charged, upon information, with the crime of rape upon a girl then under the age of 16 years.

[1] 1. It is claimed that the court erred in refusing to allow defendant's counsel to examine a juror upon the voir dire, for the purpose of determining whether or not a peremptory challenge should be used upon him. The records of the cases appealed to this court, in which rulings made while impaneling a jury have been involved, indicate that there is an increasing tendency to prolong the proceedings inordinately by allowing counsel on either side to indulge in tedious examinations of jurors, apparently with no definite purpose or object in view, but with the hope of eliciting something indicating the advisability of a peremptory challenge, and that the supposed privilege of doing this has been greatly abused. Remarks in some of the decisions in this state upon this subject are apparently conflicting. It may be that this has led trial courts to give counsel great latitude, rather than risk prejudicial error by confining the examination to reasonable limits. We deem it important, therefore, to review the subject and declare the rule, so that the trial courts may confidently follow it.

The Penal Code divides challenges into two kinds: (1) To the panel; (2) to an individual juror. Section 1055. The latter kind is again divided into two classes, namely, peremptory challenges and challenges for cause. Section 1067. A peremptory challenge is defined as "an objection to a juror for which no reason need be given, but upon which the court must excuse him." Section 1069. This definition shows that no issue of fact can possibly arise with regard to the reasons for such challenge. In sections from 1071 to 1078, inclusive, the Penal Code defines the several kinds of challenges for cause, and prescribes the mode of forming issues of fact as to the grounds upon which they may be predicated. It then proceeds to provide the manner of trying such issue, as follows:

"Sec. 1081. Upon the trial of a challenge to an individual juror, the juror challenged may be examined as a witness to prove or disprove the challenge, and must answer every question pertinent to the issue.

Sec. 1082. Other witnesses may be examined on either side, and the rules of evidence applicable to the trial of other issues govern the admission or exclusion of evidence on the trial of the challenge."

These provisions and those relating to the formation of such issues seem to assume that the challenge for cause and the denial of the fact asserted as the foundation thereof should precede the examination of a juror. In practice, however, it usually saves time and promotes justice to allow the party to first elicit the facts by questioning the juror, and this course is generally followed. People v. Reynolds, 16 Cal. 131. There is no other provision for the examination of jurors, either to prepare for or to prove the basis for a challenge to an individual juror. It is clear that the foregoing sections do not relate to or authorize the examination of a juror for the purpose of enabling the parties intelligently to determine whether or not to make a peremptory challenge. This is shown, not only by the language of the sections mentioned and quoted, which provide only for questions pertinent to the issue, but also by the succeeding sections, relating to the order of challenges. Thus section 1087 declares that they must be taken "in the following order, including in each challenge all the causes of challenge belonging to the same class: 1. To the panel; 2. To an individual juror, for a general disqualification [see section 1072]; 3. To an individual juror for an implied bias; 4. To an individual juror for an actual bias." Section 1088 then declares that "if all challenges on both sides are disallowed, either party, first the people and then the defendant, may take a peremptory challenge, unless the parties' peremptory challenges are exhausted." It is thus clearly shown that the law contemplates that all the challenges for cause, including the examination of jurors preparatory thereto and upon the trial thereof, shall be disposed of before any peremptory challenges are in order. The conclusion is that there is no statutory authority for the examination of jurors solely for the purpose of a peremptory challenge, or for the allowance of questions which do not tend to prove some fact material to a challenge for cause.

There is no real necessity for giving either party this privilege. It tends to encourage inquiries into matters wholly collateral to the case in hand. The field of inquiry upon subjects properly involved, in the endeavor to ascertain whether the juror is free from actual or implied bias, is so broad that it will give each party ample opportunity to obtain information concerning the advisability of making peremptory challenges to the respective jurors. Turning now to the previous decisions of this court, we find that in Watson v. Whitney, 23 Cal. 379, and People v. Soy, 57 Cal. 102, there are remarks to the effect that a party has a right to question a juror for the sole purpose of deciding whether or not to exercise a peremptory challenge upon him. But, as is pointed out in People v. Hamilton, 62 Cal. 382, the questions in each of those cases were allowable, because they tended to elicit facts constituting grounds for a challenge for cause, and the remarks relating to peremptory challenges were obiter dictum. In the last-mentioned case (People v. Hamilton) the court carefully reconsidered the question, and, in effect, overruled the two previous cases. After referring to the provisions for inquiry concerning challenges for cause, the court, in the Hamilton Case, says: "After giving the opportunity thus to ascertain the existence or non-existence of implied or actual bias, the Penal Code accords to a defendant on trial for an offense punishable with death 20 peremptory challenges. These he exercises at his own volition. The state cannot say he ought not to challenge peremptorily a particular juror. No issue is raised upon the result of the trial of which his right depends. As no issue can be made or tried, to which the question, intended simply to enable a defendant to make up his mind whether he will challenge peremptorily, can apply, it would follow, if appellant is right, that the trial court can place no limit upon the questions which defendant may choose to ask. While, therefore, a defendant may, when the opportunity to interpose a peremptory challenge arises, have the benefit of any information acquired during the trial of a challenge for implied or actual bias, he cannot embark in a general exploration for the sole purpose of satisfying himself whether it will be safe to be tried by a juror against whom no legal objections can be urged."

This decision may be said to establish the law in this state on the subject. It was cited with approval in People v. Plyler, 126 Cal. 381, 58 Pac. 904, and it was approved and followed by this court in People v. Brittan, 118 Cal. 412, 50 Pac. 664, and by the District Court of Appeal in People v. Trask, 7 Cal. App. 105, 93 Pac. 891. Some remarks of the court in the opinion in People v. Helm, 152 Cal. 546, 93 Pac. 99, appear to have occasioned some doubt of the authority of the previous decisions. There, the defendant being on trial for the murder of one Hayes, it was ascertained that he had previously been subjected to a preliminary examination on a charge of murdering one Jackson. A juror stated he had an opinion as to his guilt or innocence in the Jackson case. The court refused to allow the defendant to ask the juror if he believed that the defendant was guilty of the murder of Jackson. This court held that this ruling was error, saying that the question was proper, because an affirmative answer would be relevant to the question of actual bias of the juror against the defendant, and for the additional reason that it would enable the defendant to decide whether or not to excuse him peremptorily. It will be observed that the question rejected was obviously proper as to actual bias, and that the second reason given in the opinion was unnecessary to the decision. The case is, in that respect, parallel with the cases of Watson v. Whitney and People v. Soy, supra, which were overruled in the Hamilton Case. In the Helm Case the court's attention was not called to the previous decisions in the Hamilton and Brittan Cases. The remark concerning peremptory challenges must, under these circumstances, be regarded as obiter, and the case is not authority on the question. The court below was correct in refusing to allow the examination to proceed for the sole purpose of exercising peremptory challenges thereon.

[2] 2. The juror McIntyre stated that he had talked with other persons, not witnesses, about the merits of the case, and that from what he had read and heard he had formed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant; that the opinion was so fixed that it would require evidence to remove it, and that it was founded entirely upon public rumor and what he had read; and that, notwithstanding such opinion, he could and would, if sworn as a juror in the case, set aside the opinion and act entirely upon the evidence as introduced, and act fairly and impartially as a juror upon the evidence given. This qualified him as a juror, under section 1076 of the Penal Code. The fact that some parts of his examination contained statements by him inconsistent with the above statement merely raised a conflict of evidence as to his state of mind. Upon such conflict the decision of the trial court is conclusive. People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 11, 112 Pac. 720, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1193; People v. Riggins, 159 Cal. 117, 112 Pac. 862; People v. Ryan, 152 Cal. 371, 92 Pac. 853.

It is suggested that it does not affirmatively appear from the juror's testimony that the persons to whom he talked about the case were not witnesses. On this point he was asked, "Have you talked it over with any witnesses in the case?" His answer was: "Not that I know of; I don't know any of the witnesses; no." The trial court might reasonably have understood that the last word, "No," was intended as a positive denial. Furthermore, he stated positively, in answer to other questions, that his opinion was founded entirely upon public rumor and what he had read. It is not claimed that he had read anything except public journals. The decision of the trial court upon this question of fact is, upon the authorities above cited, conclusive. The juror appeared to be fair and impartial in all other respects. The challenge was properly denied.

[3] 3. The court correctly refused the instruction asked by defendant, to the effect that the jury should consider the fact that the victim had made no outcry, and had concealed the act of sexual intercourse for several days after it was committed. This was not a case of rape committed by force or violence, but a voluntary act of sexual intercourse to which the girl had, in fact, consented, and which constitutes rape solely because the statute makes her incapable of giving a legal consent because of her tender years. In such cases the fact that the victim makes no outcry or complaint is immaterial. People v. Jacobs, 16 Cal. App. 478, 117 Pac. 615; People v. Howard, 143 Cal. 324, 76 Pac. 1116.

Other rulings denying challenges, refusing instructions, and admitting or rejecting evidence are complained of; but they are of no substantial importance, and we are satisfied that the defendant was not prejudiced thereby. We do not deem any of these points of sufficient merit or general importance to justify further mention. The evidence of the defendant's guilt was clear, and we see no ground for reversing the judgment or order.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

INGLIN et al. v. SNIDER et al., Board of Supervisors of Yolo County (LAUGENOUR et al., Interveners). (Sac. No. 1,950.)

1. DRAINS (§ 50*)—RECLAMATION DISTRICTS—EXCLUSION OF TERRITORY—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Under Pol. Code, § 3481, authorizing owners of land who desire to have the same set off from a reclamation district to file a petition as required by section 3446, authorizing petitions for formation of reclamation districts, and to show to the board of supervisors that the land sought to be excluded is capable of an independent reclamation, and section 3449, providing that, where it is shown that any land has been improperly included in a proposed district the board must reform the district, the board of supervisors creating a reclamation district may in their discretion refuse to exclude land therefrom on finding that the district as originally formed will protect, though not completely reclaim, all the land, and that the whole work of reclamation may be pursued more economically by adhering to the original plan, or where to exclude land from a district will make the work of protection of the lands less effective.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. § 62; Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

2. DRAINS (§ 50*)—RECLAMATION DISTRICTS—“RECLAMATION.”

The word “reclamation” in Pol. Code, § 3481, providing that owners desiring to have their lands set off from a reclamation district must show to the board of supervisors that the land sought to be excluded is capable of an independent reclamation, means practical protection from probable dangers, and does not mean absolute protection from all dangers, and where a district may properly be classed, under the evidence, as one in which the land has been reclaimed, owners are not entitled to relief under the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. § 62; Dec. Dig. § 50.*]

3. MANDAMUS (§ 90*)—RIGHT TO RELIEF—DISCRETION.

Where the evidence was conflicting on the issue of whether land in a reclamation district was capable of independent reclamation, within Pol. Code, § 3481, and the board accepted the view that the land was not capable of independent reclamation, the owners of the land were not entitled to compel the board by mandamus to exclude the land from the district, and create an independent reclamation district.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 196, 204; Dec. Dig. § 90.*]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

Petition for mandamus by M. Inglin and another, as executrices of D. N. Hershey, deceased, against Eli Snider and others, constituting the board of supervisors of the county of Yolo, in which T. F. Laugenour and others intervened. From a judgment denying relief, petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

E. A. Bridgford and W. W. Davidson, both of San Francisco (Hudson Grant, of Woodland, and Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants. A. C. & H. L. Huston and Charles W. Thomas, all of Woodland, for respondents. Charles W. Thomas, of Woodland, for intervening respondents.

MELVIN, J. Petitioners are the owners of land within reclamation district No. 730. Shortly after the first assessment list was returned to the district, these petitioners filed with the board of supervisors of Yolo county a petition asking that their lands be organized into an independent reclamation district. This petition having been denied by the board of supervisors, the petitioners applied to the superior court for a writ of mandate requiring the supervisors to hear and determine their petition. A demurrer having been sustained to the petition for a writ of mandate, an appeal was taken to this court, and it was here determined that the pleading was sufficient. Inglin v. Hopkin, 156 Cal. 484, 105 Pac. 582. Subsequently, upon a petition filed long after that considered in Inglin v. Hopkin, but altogether similar to it, the board of supervisors, after a hearing, denied the prayer of petitioners on July 12, 1910. Whereupon they applied to the superior court of Yolo county for a writ of mandamus directing the board to set aside its order, and to make another order approving the plan of separation of petitioners' lands from the district. The court gave judgment denying the prayer of the petition for mandate, and from such judgment this appeal is taken.

The position of the petitioners is that their showing before the board of supervisors established without contradiction their right to have their property cut off from Reclamation District No. 730, and that, therefore, they are entitled to a writ of mandate enforcing their wish in that regard. The court below, however, determined that there was a substantial conflict in the evidence given on the hearing before the supervisors, and that it was therefore powerless to interfere with the legal discretion of the board duly exercised and based upon evidence addressed to that body. Appellant contends that when the owners of a compact body of land within a reclamation district, in which the lands have not been reclaimed, desire to have their property set off from such district, they need only demonstrate that such segregation is possible, and thereupon it is made the duty of the board of supervisors to grant their request, without reference to the effect of such action on the remaining lands in the district or the cost of independent reclamation of the tract thus sought to be set aside. They insist that without conflict the evidence demonstrates two propositions. The first of these is that the lands of reclamation district No. 730 had not been reclaimed when petitioners sought to secede from it, and the second is that, having demonstrated the fact that their land may be independently reclaimed, they are entitled, of right, to withdraw their property from the district.

[1] Even if we concede the first of these postulates, it would not necessarily follow that the board of supervisors would be compelled to permit petitioners to separate their land from the old district. If the board of supervisors found that the old district, though not completely reclaimed, was somewhat protected, and the whole work of reclamation could be pursued more economically for all persons concerned by adhering to the original plans rather than by dismembering the district, then the board would be clothed with discretion to deny the requested segregation. The petitioners must, under the very terms of section 3481 of the Political Code, comply with section 3446 of the same Code. In other words, they stand in practically the same position before the board as those seeking to form a new district from lands not theretofore included in an old one, except that additionally they must “show to the board of supervisors that said body of lands is capable of an independent reclamation." Their petition would be subject to the provisions of section 3449 of the Political Code, which requires, among other things, that, "if it be shown that any land has been improperly included in or excepted from the proposed district, they must reform the district in such respects in their order." Now, if in the effort to organize district No. 730 these lands had been omitted from the petition, the supervisors in the exercise of their discretion might have reformed the district so as to include such lands; and it follows that a like discretion is vested in the board when an application is made under section 3481. If in the exercise of their discretion the supervisors should determine that the proposed excision of lands from a district already formed would increase the cost of reclamation to all parties concerned or make the work of protection of their lands less effective, they would have a perfect right to reject petitioners' application. In the case at bar there was a conflict of evidence regarding the question whether or not the lands in district No. 730 had been reclaimed before appellants made their request of the board of supervisors. It is true that the engineer of the district had named a large sum of money as being necessary for the purpose of completing the reclamation of the lands in the district. The great flood of 1909 had caused levees above district No. 730 to break and the waters to flow upon the lands of said district over the ridge at Knights Landing which at seasons of ordinary high water was of sufficient elevation to protect the district on its northerly side. It was in view of the extraordinary conditions which developed in 1909 that the plan of reclamation was amended to fortify the district against all possible future danger; but there was evidence which was sufficient to support a determination by the board of supervisors that at the time of the hearing the district was capable of protecting the lands situated therein from ordinary floods.

[2] The learned judge of the superior court who presided at the hearing of this case defined "reclamation" as "practical protection from probable dangers." This is an apt definition. The word cannot mean absolute protection from all dangers because such a thing is scarcely possible. If, therefore, the district could be properly classed under the evidence as one in which the land had been reclaimed, then petitioners are entitled to no relief under section 3481 of the Political Code.

[3] We cannot say that there was no conflict of evidence regarding the question whether or not the land of petitioners was capable of independent reclamation. Witnesses for petitioners testified that it was and at least one witness for the respondents said that it was not. Thereupon the board of supervisors inspected the premises. This was the taking of evidence (People v. Milner, 122 Cal. 182, 54 Pac. 833), and is sufficient in itself to destroy the contention that no conflict existed because, acting upon the evidence before it, the board of supervisors accepted the view that the lands of the petitioners were not capable of independent reclamation. We conclude, therefore, that the matter presented to the board of supervisors by petitioners having been decided upon sharply conflicting evidence, the superior court was justified, under familiar principles, in refusing to interfere with the action of the board.

The judgment is affirmed.

GIBBS et al. v. PETERSON. (S. F. 5,476.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 23, 1912. Rehearing Denied Oct. 23, 1912.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 743*)—RES JUDICATA—DECISION OF THE SUPREME COURT—CLAIM TO TIMBER.

A decision of the Supreme Court that a purchaser of standing timber on a described tract, with the right to remove the same within 10 years, and with the privilege of removal thereafter on paying a yearly rental and a half of the taxes on the land, acquired an absolute title to the timber, not forfeited by failure to remove within the 10 years, or failure to pay thereafter the annual rental and a half of the taxes, rendered in a suit by a grantee of a part of the tract brought after the expiration of the 10 years, is the law of the case in a subsequent suit between the parties involving their rights to the timber.

2. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*) — SALE OF STANDING TIMBER—CONTRACTS—FORFEITURE.

A purchaser of standing timber on an 800-acre tract, with the right to remove the same within 10 years, and with the privilege of removal thereafter on paying an annual rental and a half of the taxes on the land, performs his covenant as to the annual rental where he pays the entire sum to the vendor, who has sold a part of the tract to a third person, in the absence of any apportionment of the yearly rental between the vendor and the third person.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. §§ 6-12; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

3. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*) — SALE OF STANDING TIMBER—CONTRACTS—FORFEITURE.

A contract for the sale of standing timber for removal within 10 years, which provides that the purchaser failing to remove the timber within the 10 years will pay a yearly rental thereafter for the privilege of removal until the timber is removed, and will pay a half of the taxes on the land until the removal is completed, gives the purchaser an absolute title to the timber, but does not give him a right to perpetually maintain the timber on the land, and thereby render the land valueless as to the owner; but the court, at the suit of the owner at the expiration of the fixed period, will fix a time for the removal of the timber by the purchaser.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. §§ 6-12; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

4. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*) — SALE OF STANDING TIMBER — CONTRACTS — FORFEITURE.

Where the title of a purchaser of standing timber to the timber could not be forfeited by his failure to remove the same within a specified time, or by his failure to subsequently pay a yearly rental for the privilege of removal, and the land was valueless to the owner so long as the timber remained, the court, at the suit of the owner after the expiration of the fixed period, will grant relief analogous to the relief granted under Code Civ. Proc. § 752, in an action between joint tenants, or tenants in common, and will fix a time within which the purchaser shall remove the timber, and declare that if he does not do so the owner of the land may remove and sell the same at the expense and for the benefit of the purchaser, subject to reasonable compensation for loss of the use and occupation of the soil from the expiration of the period fixed for removal to the time of actual removal, subject to the right of the owner to the yearly rental after the expiration of the period as a condition of the purchaser's privilege to remove the timber.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by J. H. Gibbs and another against Andrew Peterson, who filed an answer and a cross-complaint. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Mannon & Mannon, of Ukiah, for appellant. McNab & Hirsch, of Ukiah, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by defendant from a decree enjoining him from cutting down or removing any timber growing or standing upon certain described land, and from interfering in any way with plaintiffs' peaceable possession thereof; said plaintiffs peaceable possession decreed to be the owners in possession and entitled to the possession of all of said timber. The action was one commenced on May 12, 1906, to obtain a permanent injunction enjoining the doing of any of said acts.

Demurrers were sustained to defendant's answer and cross-complaint, and, defendant declining to amend or appear at the trial, the trial court, after receiving evidence on the part of plaintiffs, found the facts to be as alleged in the complaint and gave judgment as already stated. The question presented by this appeal is whether the facts stated in the answer and cross-complaint were sufficient to show any defense to plaintiffs' action, or any foundation for relief against them.

Substantially these facts are as follows: Defendant, Peterson, is the owner of the 160 acres of land upon which he claimed the right to cut and remove the timber, subject to such rights therein as are possessed by plaintiffs under a certain instrument executed to them (and duly recorded on December 28, 1887) by C. Oppenlander and Gustav Hansen, the then owners thereof, purporting to convey to them "all the timber now standing, lying or being" on this land and other lands belonging to them, aggregating some 800 acres. This instrument, after providing that the vendors "do by these presents grant, bargain, sell, and convey unto the said parties of the second part * * * all the timber now standing, lying or being on" certain described land, was as follows, viz.: "And the parties of the first part promise and agree to and with the parties of the second part that they shall have a period of ten years in which to remove the timber from the above-described lands, and they do covenant and promise to allow and empower the parties of the second part, their agents and servants, to enter in and upon the real estate upon which the timber hereby conveyed is growing or situate as above described, to cut such timber, manufacture the same into lumber, and do all things upon such land which may be necessary for the purpose of manufacturing such timber into lumber and the removal thereof, as well as the right to make roads and build camps upon such lands, and also full ingress and egress have over such land for the removal of the timber hereby conveyed, and also such timber as the parties of the second part may acquire upon adjoining lands or lands in the vicinity of the lands of the parties of the first part as described herein. The parties of the second part hereby covenant and agree to and with the said parties of the first part, that if the timber is not removed from the above-described land within a period of ten years that they will pay a yearly rental to the parties of the first part of two hundred dollars a year thereafter for the privilege of removing such timber from the lands of the parties of the first part with the covenants and agreements of the parties of the first part herein to continue until all the timber is removed, and it is agreed between the parties hereto that all the privileges granted herein are to continue until such timber is removed, subject to the provisions of this agreement. It is further agreed by and between the parties hereto that each of the parties hereto are to pay one-half the taxes upon all of the foregoing described real estate that shall be covered with standing timber or upon which the timber is standing, that may be levied upon such land for state, county or municipal purposes during each and every year from the date hereof until all the timber is removed from such real estate. Dated Ukiah, Dec. 28th, 1887. C. Oppenlander, G. Hansen, Michael Ward, J. H. Gibbs."

Peterson acquired his title to the 160 acres on July 18, 1891, from C. Oppenlander, who had in the meantime acquired Hansen's interest; the deed reciting a consideration of $1,560, and expressly "excepting and reserving, however, for the benefit and use of a former grantee of mine, the standing and down timber on the hereinbefore granted land, and the privilege to work it up and to remove it from said land." Plaintiffs had actual notice of the acquirement of Hansen's interest by Oppenlander at the time thereof, and of the conveyance by Oppenlander to Peterson of the 160 acres ever since July 19, 1901. Plaintiffs have never removed any of the timber, or made any preparations to remove any of the timber, from defendant's land, and the same is still standing and growing thereon, largely increased by the natural growth thereof and greatly enhanced in value. The land is situate on the Albion river, a navigable stream, by which the timber could have always been conveyed to a profitable market, and also within five miles of a railroad station, from which said timber could have been conveyed to a profitable market. A reasonable time for the removal of such timber has long since elapsed. The whole of the land is covered by a dense growth of redwood, pine, and other timber, and cannot be used for any other profitable purpose while such timber remains thereon. Such land is comparatively level, and is fertile and very productive; and if the timber was removed all of the same would be valuable for agricultural purposes and fruit growing. Defendant has desired to use the same for such purposes for a long time, but has been prevented from so doing by reason of the presence of such timber. Plaintiffs have not paid any part of the taxes on such land for the years 1891 to 1896, both inclusive, and defendant has been compelled to pay all of the same in order to protect his interest therein from being sold for taxes. The reasonable value of the use and occupation of such land is $100 per month. Defendant has repeatedly demanded of plaintiffs that they pay him a rental for said lands and remove the timber therefrom; but plaintiffs have refused to do either.

By the prayer of his cross-complaint, defendant asked for judgment awarding him the sum of $8,700, the alleged value of the use and occupation of the land, and decreeing that plaintiffs had forfeited all their rights in the timber, "or that a future time shall be fixed by this court within which all of said timber shall be removed, and that proper compensation be fixed by the court to be paid to this defendant by plaintiffs herein for the further privilege of removing said timber," and for general relief.

Certain questions as to the proper construction and effect of the instrument executed by Oppenlander and Hansen to plaintiffs on December 28, 1887, were before this court on an appeal in an action to quiet title instituted by the defendant herein against the plaintiffs herein on July 19, 1901, several years after the expiration of the 10-year period prescribed in such instrument. This court then said:

"While there is much apparent conflict in the decisions as to the proper construction of a contract for the sale of standing trees to be removed, it is well settled that such a sale may be absolute, and the agreement to remove within a specified or reasonable time merely a covenant, in which case the timber remains the property of the purchaser, although not removed within the specified time. See 28 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 541; Holt v. Stratton Mills, 54 N. H. 109 [20 Am. Rep. 119]. The question in each case is as to what is the contract between the parties.

[1] "Here there is absolutely nothing in the terms of the agreement which can be construed as making the removal of the timber a condition precedent to the passing of title, or as causing delay in such removal beyond the period of 10 years from the date of the instrument, or failure to pay the rental reserved or one-half the taxes, to operate as a divesting of the title conveyed.

"The terms of the instrument literally signify an absolute conveyance of the timber; and there is nothing in the provisions relied upon by plaintiff to impair the force of the plain words of present grant. The provision to the effect that the vendees should have a period of 10 years in which to remove the timber that they had purchased must be read in connection with the provision to the effect that if it is not removed within 10 years the vendees 'will pay a yearly rental to the parties of the first part of $200 a year thereafter for the privilege of removing such timber,' etc. This provision, together with the provision for the payment by the vendees of one-half of all taxes that may be levied upon the land from the date of the agreement until all of the timber has been removed, both of which are mere covenants in no way affecting the title, must be held to express the agreement of the parties as to the effect of any failure of the vendee to remove the timber within the designated period of 10 years." See Peterson v. Gibbs, 147 Cal. 1, 6, 81 Pac. 121, 123, 109 Am. St. Rep. 107.

[2] It is clear that this expression of the view of this court constitutes the law of this case. The opinion shows that it appeared from the record in that case that the defendants there (plaintiffs here) had not commenced to remove any of the timber, and that their alleged derelictions were the same in kind as are alleged here; the only difference being that they had not continued so long. What was said in the opinion disposes of all questions raised as to the forfeiture by plaintiffs of any of their rights in regard to such timber, and determines that they are the absolute owners thereof, notwithstanding their failure to take any step to remove the same, and notwithstanding their failure to pay any of the taxes for the years 1891 to 1896. The same would be true as to the failure of plaintiffs to pay the $200 per annum specified in said instrument, if there has been any such failure. But we do not understand any such failure to be alleged in either answer or cross-complaint; the rental referred to therein obviously being the amount to which defendant deems himself entitled, independent of any provision of the instrument, as the reasonable value of the use and occupation of his land by plaintiffs' timber. In no event would defendant be entitled to receive the whole of said $200 per annum; he having acquired only a small portion of the entire land on account of which such payment was to be made. It does not appear that plaintiffs did not annually pay to Oppenlander the whole of said sum of $200 as provided in the instrument of December 28, 1887, and, in the absence of any apportionment of such sum by defendant and his grantor to the respective parcels of land, it would appear that plaintiffs by so paying the whole sum to defendant's grantor fully performed their covenant in this regard. See Dreyfus v. Hirt, 82 Cal. 621, 627, 23 Pac. 193. As to the taxes, it is further to be said, as was said in Peterson v. Gibbs, supra, that it was not alleged that any demand for reimbursement had ever been made on plaintiffs, and there was no allegation as to the amount of such taxes.

From what has been said, it seems clear that defendant was not warranted in proceeding on the theory that plaintiffs had lost all rights in the timber standing on his land, and that, notwithstanding the matters set up in his answer and cross-complaint, plaintiffs were entitled to a decree enjoining him from so doing. The effect of the former decision, which is the law of the case as between these parties, clearly is that no delay in the removal of the timber can operate as a forfeiture of plaintiffs' rights in regard thereto. Learned counsel for defendant expressly admit in their petition for a hearing in this court, after decision by the District Court of Appeal for the Third District, that plaintiffs are the owners of the timber which covers defendant's land. In view of the facts both as to the taxes and the stipulation for the payment of $200 annually, it is clear that the equitable rule invoked by defendant, that he who seeks equity must do equity, would not have warranted the trial court in refusing to enjoin the threatened appropriation by defendant of plaintiffs' property.

The only questions remaining are as to the right of defendant under his cross-complaint in regard to the matter of compensation for the use and occupation of his land by plaintiffs' timber, and the matter of requiring plaintiffs within a specified time to remove such timber from the land.

[3] It was said in the opinion in Peterson v. Gibbs, supra, that "it is true that the timber was sold in contemplation of its removal from the land, and that it was the understanding of all parties that it should be so removed." There can be no doubt that this is clearly shown by the instrument upon which plaintiffs rely as their source of title to the timber. And while, in view of the terms of that instrument, no forfeiture of plaintiffs' rights can be caused by any delay in the removal of the timber from the land, we are satisfied that any construction of such instrument that would give to plaintiffs the absolute right to perpetually maintain such timber on the land, upon the payment of the "yearly rental" of $200 and the payment of one-half of the taxes, would be unwarranted. No such question was involved in Peterson v. Gibbs, supra, and nothing said in the opinion therein can fairly be held to determine such a question. In the agreement between the parties, plaintiffs were expressly given "a period of ten years in which to remove the timber," subject to no other burden than that of the payment of one-half of the taxes on all land covered with standing timber until the timber was removed therefrom. The provision as to what should be the rights of the parties in the event that the timber was not removed within 10 years was manifestly inserted simply to protect the purchasers, in the event that the timber was not removed within such time, to preserve all their rights therein until it was removed, and to require the payment of $200 per annum by them until such removal was had; in other words, as said in the opinion in Peterson v. Gibbs, supra, "to express the agreement of the parties as to the effect of any failure of the vendee to remove the timber within the designated period of 10 years." Clearly it was not intended thereby to confer upon plaintiffs the right to perpetually maintain the timber upon the land, and thus render the land valueless to the vendors, as, in view of the allegations of the cross-complaint, would be the result of the exercise of such a right. What, then, is the situation between these parties, in the light of the cross-complaint? Plaintiffs are the owners of the timber standing and growing on defendant's land, having by reason of such ownership, it may be conceded, an interest in the real property. They are such owners, however, under an instrument clearly contemplating and intending the removal by them of such timber. While, under the terms of this instrument, there can be no forfeiture of their interest, the time expressly given by the instrument of conveyance during which they have the absolute right to maintain the timber on the land has long since expired. The land is valueless to its owner so long as the timber remains thereon, and would be valuable to him for agricultural and fruit-growing purposes if such timber were removed.

[4] Under these circumstances, we cannot doubt the power of a court of equity to grant such relief to defendant as is analogous in its result to the relief granted in an ordinary action for partition between "parceners, joint tenants, or tenants in common" (section 752, Code Civ. Proc.), to accomplish in some way a segregation and beneficial appropriation of the respective interests in the property to the respective owners. A suggestion of this nature is to be found in the opinion of the Supreme Court in Mississippi, in Butterfield Lumber Co. v. Guy, 92 Miss. 361, 46 South. 78, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1123, 131 Am. St. Rep. 540. We think there can be no question that such relief is proper under such circumstances as were made to appear by the cross-complaint in this case. A different question would, perhaps, be presented if it were not clear that it was the contemplation and intention of the parties to the instrument of December 28, 1887, that the timber would be removed from the land by the purchasers. As to that we express no opinion, as no such case is presented. We are simply determining the question presented by this particular contract, in the light of the decision already given as to its proper construction. Peterson v. Gibbs, supra. It is our conclusion that, assuming the facts to be as stated in the cross-complaint, the defendant was entitled to have the judgment fix a reasonable time within which plaintiffs shall remove their timber from defendant's land, and providing that if plaintiffs do not remove the same within said time the defendant may remove and sell the same at the expense and for the benefit of plaintiffs, accounting to them for the net proceeds thereof. The judgment should further provide that if the timber be not removed within the time specified by the court the defendant shall be entitled to retain from the proceeds of his sale of the timber such an amount as will reasonably compensate him for his loss of the use and occupation of the soil from the expiration of the period fixed by the court for such removal to the time of actual removal, such amount to be determined by the court. The judgment given should be interlocutory in its nature; the court retaining jurisdiction of the cause for the purpose of an accounting between the parties, in the event that plaintiffs fail to remove the timber within the specified time.

We are further of the opinion that, in view of the provisions of the instrument of December 28, 1887, defendant is not entitled to any compensation for the maintenance of the timber on the land prior to the expiration of such time as may be fixed by said judgment, except possibly such portion of the $200 per annum specified in such instrument as may fairly be apportioned to the land purchased by him from Oppenlander. As we have indicated, his right to this pro rata share does not appear to be involved in the case made by the cross-complaint. It must be assumed, in view of the want of allegation to the contrary, that plaintiffs have paid the $200 per annum to their grantors, as they were warranted in doing in the absence of an apportionment by such grantors and defendant, and notice to them thereof; and defendant's right, if any, to a portion of the amounts so paid is against Oppenlander, and not against plaintiffs here. As to any amounts remaining unpaid, if any such there are, it is clear that no apportionment could be made by the court in the absence, as parties, of the owners of the other land covered by the instrument of December 28, 1887.

Until the final determination of the issues presented by the cross-complaint, the plaintiffs should, of course, be protected against any interference by defendant with their timber, by a temporary injunction.

For the reasons stated, we are of the opinion that the demurrer to the cross-complaint should have been overruled.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the lower court to overrule the demurrer to defendant's cross-complaint, with leave to plaintiffs to answer the same, and to proceed thenceforth in a manner not inconsistent with the views herein expressed.

TAYLOR v. MORRIS et al. (L. A. 3,065.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 21, 1912.
Rehearing Denied Oct. 21, 1912.)

1. TRUSTS (§ 44*) — EXPRESS TRUSTS — EVIDENCE TO ESTABLISH — SUFFICIENCY.

In an action to quiet title, in which the administrator of plaintiff's mother intervened as defendant, evidence held to show that plaintiff held title to the property, in part, in trust for her mother.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 584*) — WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY.

The explanation of a transaction, given in a contemporaneous writing before any differences have arisen, is of more weight as evidence than a subsequent oral explanation at variance with the writing, given after differences have arisen.

3. TRUSTS (§ 43*) — EXPRESS TRUSTS — EVIDENCE TO ESTABLISH — PAROL EVIDENCE.

Parol evidence is admissible to prove that a deed, absolute in form, was made on a parol trust in favor of the grantor, since the statute of frauds cannot be used as a shield for fraud, and the repudiation of a parol trust is a fraud.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 62-65; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

4. STIPULATIONS (§ 18*) — CONCLUSIVENESS AND EFFECT — MATTERS CONCLUDED.

5. TRUSTS (§ 108*) — EXPRESS TRUSTS — EVIDENCE TO ESTABLISH — PAROL EVIDENCE.

While a constructive trust cannot be created by a grantee's naked promise after a conveyance, his admissions and declarations, showing that a trust relationship was created and existed contemporaneously with the conveyance, are competent evidence of the trust.

6. TRUSTS (§ 372*) — EVIDENCE TO ESTABLISH — ADMISSIONS BY TRUSTEE.

Where a trustee, at the time of purchasing land, had trust funds in her possession, and admitted and declared thereafter that such trust funds went into the purchase, she cannot repudiate her declarations by showing that the precise funds did not go into the purchase.

7. TRUSTS (§ 371*) — VARIANCE BETWEEN ALLEGATIONS AND PROOF — MATERIALITY.

In a suit to quiet title, where defendants pleaded that plaintiff's mother furnished plaintiff with $8,000 with which to purchase a two-thirds' interest in property, while the evidence showed that plaintiff had $8,000 of her mother's money, and, although not investing this precise fund in the land, she treated $8,000 of the purchase price as representing the trust fund, and admitted that the trust fund had been so invested, the variance could not have misled or injured plaintiff, and hence, under the express provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 469, was immaterial.

8. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 103*) — COMPUTATION OF PERIOD — TRUSTS — REPUDIATION BY TRUSTEE.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. R. Hervey, Judge.

Action by Jessie W. Taylor against Grace Morris and others, in which W. A. Snedaker, as administrator of Zerelda S. Wheeler, intervened as defendant. Judgment for the interveners, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Swanwick and Taylor O. Taylor, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Andrew Park, Flint, Gray & Barker, and Bowen, Allen, Van Dyke & Jutten, all of Los Angeles, for interveners and respondents.

HENSHAW, J. The heirs at law of Zerelda S. Wheeler, deceased, are her daughters, Jessie W. Taylor and Helen O. Morris, both married women. At the time of and some time prior to the institution of this action, Helen O. Morris was and had been an incompetent person. Frank M. Kelsey was appointed her guardian ad litem. Upon the death of Zerelda S. Wheeler, testate, Jessie W. Taylor was appointed administratrix with the will annexed of her mother's estate. Thereafter she instituted this action against Grace, Cleda, and Ethel Morris, daughters of her incompetent sister Helen, to quiet title to three separate pieces of property situated in the county of Los Angeles. The administrator of the estate of Zerelda S. Wheeler, deceased (Jessie Taylor having been relieved from her administrative duties), and the guardian ad litem of Helen O. Morris, incompetent, were permitted to intervene, and by intervention asserted an interest in the property growing out of the trust relations theretofore existing between Jessie W. Taylor and her mother. In brief, the averments of the intervention are that Zerelda S. Wheeler in her lifetime gave to her daughter Jessie, in trust, $8,000, which the daughter used in purchasing the properties to settle title to which the action was brought. In particular it is alleged that a certain piece of property, known as "the flats on Flower street," was purchased by Jessie W. Taylor for $12,000, $8,000 of which was trust money of the mother, and $4,000 of which was Mrs. Taylor's own; that this property had been sold by Mrs. Taylor for $26,000, $16,000 of which, under the trust, belonged to Mrs. Wheeler in her lifetime and to her estate after her death, and that with accrued interest upon this sum there was thus due to the estate of Mrs. Wheeler the sum of $22,000. The answer to this complaint by Mrs. Taylor was a denial of the receipt of the trust funds, or of any trust relationship and the plea of the statute of limitations. The court found in favor of plaintiff's title to two of the pieces of property in controversy. As to the third, the court found that the mother did advance to her daughter, Mrs. Taylor, $8,000, for the purpose "of purchasing a piece of property situate in the city of Los Angeles, being the same piece of property described in the complaint, which said property was known to the mother and daughter as 'the flats on Flower street.'" Further, the court found "that it was then and there orally agreed between said mother and daughter that the said mother should contribute said $8,000 in money and the daughter $4,000 in money, and that with the said aggregate amount of $12,000 that said daughter should purchase said property last described, taking the title thereto in the name of said daughter and holding the same in trust for her said mother to the extent of two-thirds thereof. In pursuance of said agreement and arrangement, the said Jessie W. Taylor did then and there, on or about the 7th day of February, 1902, purchase said property and took the title thereof in her own name, paying therefor with the money thus contributed; $8,000 in money belonging to her said mother and $4,000 in money of said daughter."

It was made to appear, and so found, that in March, 1894, the mother conveyed to the plaintiff a piece of property in trust for herself, which piece of property was known as the "Highland Villa." This Mrs. Taylor subsequently sold, receiving therefor $1,000 in cash and $7,000 in a note secured by a mortgage. This mortgage note she sold and assigned to the Southern California Savings Bank for its face value. Still further the court found: "On February 7, 1902, the flats were conveyed to plaintiff, and she paid therefor $12,000 in cash. No part of the money which plaintiff received from the savings bank upon the assignment of said mortgage was used in the purchase of the flats; but the court finds that the plaintiff considered and treated two-thirds of the money which she paid for the flats as the proceeds of the Highland Villa, and as the property of her mother, and considered and treated the flats as belonging one-third to herself and two-thirds to her mother; and the court finds that plaintiff held two-thirds of said property in trust for her mother." The further findings compute the amount of the trust fund in the hands of the plaintiff to be $20,805.90, and declare against the plea of the statute of limitations. Judgment was given for the interveners accordingly.

[1, 2] The evidence to establish the trust is ample and convincing. Mrs. Wheeler, in December, 1902, drew her olographic will, which was admitted to probate. That will contained the following: "Mrs. Parke [now plaintiff, Mrs. Jessie W. Taylor] and I paid twelve thousand dollars for the flats on Flower street; I paid eight thousand and she paid four thousand dollars. I want Jessie Parke to have one half and Mrs. Helen Morris to have the other half." The testimony is that upon the reading of this will Mrs. Taylor acquiesced in the statements above quoted, and pronounced them correct. Mrs. Taylor's letters to her sister are strongly confirmatory of this. Thus, four years after her mother had conveyed to her the Villa property, she writes to her sister Helen: "Don't worry about what will happen in five years. Mama, in all probability, will not be living, and you will have one-half of the Villa to live on or to do business with. In the meantime I will take care of her as best I can like I always have. I would sell the Villa this winter if I could and pay off the debt on it and put the money on interest or buy something that I could rent so she can support herself." In April, 1902, about three months after the sale of the Villa, and about two months after the purchase of the flats on Flower street, she wrote to her sister as follows: "I have sold the Villa for $10,000, paid the mortgage, principal and interest, and after settling up everything I had $8,000 left. Don't you think I did well. I had to repair the roof and paint the front and steps and had a lot of small repairs inside and paid the spring taxes. Well, I went right straight and got another place with it. I took mother's $8,000 and put $4,000 of my money with it and bought some very fine flats on Flower street between 9th and 10th streets, the whole costing me $12,000. The lot is 50 by 150 feet to a 20 foot alley. It is a very good piece of property and I wouldn't think of selling it for less than $15,000. I long so much to talk to you and if I can sell the flats for $15,000.00 Ma will have $10,000 clear and I will have $5,000. They are for sale. I am trying to make all the money I can so you can have something when you are old." Mrs. Taylor's explanation of these letters is that her sister was having trouble with her husband and was fearful that her husband would leave her, and that she wrote these letters at her sister's request, that they might be shown to the husband and convey to him the idea that she would soon have property of her own. But, of course, the court was not bound to accept this explanation; and it is well recognized as matter of law, as well as of plain common sense, that an account of a transaction, given in a contemporaneous writing when no differences have arisen, is to be preferred to a subsequent oral explanation at variance with the writing, given after differences have arisen.

[3] Appellant contends that the evidence entirely fails to establish that she held the Villa property in trust, and that, failing to establish this, the whole foundation for the asserted trust in the Flower street flats is destroyed. It is conceded, as it must be, that there is evidence to establish that plaintiff was trustee for her mother of the Villa property; but it is asserted that the deeds by which her mother conveyed title to her were absolute in form; that the stipulation of the parties in this action acknowledges her absolute title; and that therefore the evidence to establish the trust in contradiction of the deed and of the stipulation was inadmissible. To this proposition the familiar sections of the Code and the familiar decisions under them, forbidding the attempt to vary the language of written contracts by parol, are cited. But appellant mistakes the scope of the rule. The statute of frauds is never permitted to become a shield for fraud, and fraud at once arises upon the repudiation by the trustee of any trust, even if that trust rests in parol. When it rests in parol, either parol evidence must be received to establish the trust, or the faithless trustee will always prevail. Certainly no elaboration of so plain a proposition is necessary, and it should be sufficient to refer to such cases as Butler v. Hyland, 89 Cal. 575, 26 Pac. 1108; Hayne v. Hermann, 97 Cal. 261, 32 Pac. 171; Odell v. Moss, 130 Cal. 352, 62 Pac. 555; Becker v. Schwerdtle, 141 Cal. 391, 74 Pac. 1029; Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 104 Pac. 308; Cooney v. Glynn, 157 Cal. 589, 108 Pac. 506; Lauricella v. Lauricella, 161 Cal. 61, 118 Pac. 430.

[4] The stipulation upon which appellant relies does no more than to declare that it is stipulated "that the property called 'The Villa,' or 'The Highland Villa,' * * * was conveyed to her by her mother by grant deed March 28, 1894, 16 years ago, and also by a second grant deed made 4 years later in 1898, and it stood in plaintiff's name until she sold it." There is nothing in this stipulation to prevent defendants and interveners from establishing the trust. It is a stipulation affecting the legal title alone; and it is useless to contend that by such a stipulation the defendants and interveners designed to waive their contention of the existence of a trust which lay at the very foundation of their claim.

[5] To the objection of appellant that the evidence does not establish the existence of a trust, and does no more than to show certain naked promises made by the plaintiff after the transaction, it is to be noted that the evidence here adverted to is precisely of the same nature as that discussed in Fanning v. Green, supra, and Cooney v. Glynn, supra. The statements of Mrs. Taylor were not promises. They were admissions and acknowledgments of a trust relationship resting in parol, which trust relationship was created and existed contemporaneously with the acquisition by her of the Villa property and the purchase by her of the Flower street flats. So, while it is true that a constructive trust cannot be created by a naked promise of the grantee after conveyance made to him, it is equally true that his declarations, showing the existence of a trust at the time he accepted the conveyance, afford strong evidence against him in the establishment of the trust.

[6] Appellant contends that there is a fatal variance between the allegation and the proof; that the allegation (above quoted) is the furnishing by Zerelda S. Wheeler, in February, 1902, of $8,000 for the purpose of purchasing the flats on Flower street; that the proof fails to establish the furnishing by Zerelda S. Wheeler of this or any money at that time; still further that the evidence fails to establish the trust in the Villa property; that the finding is specific that the proceeds of the Villa property, even if there was a trust therein, were not invested in the Flower street flats; and that for this variance and this failure of proof the cause must be reversed. We have before said that the evidence to establish the trust in the Villa property is sufficient so to do. The findings of the court amount to this: That at the time plaintiff purchased the Flower street flats she was chargeable with the possession of $8,000 trust funds of her mother; that this identical earmarked trust fund was not invested in the Flower street flats, but that of the $12,000 paid by plaintiff for the purchase of those flats she herself, contemporaneously with the transaction, treated $8,000 of it as being and representing the trust fund of her mother; that defendants and interveners have accepted this, and their acceptance binds the plaintiff. This, we say, is the substance of the court's findings. These findings are unquestionably supported by the evidence. Generally speaking it is, of course, true that to charge a constructive or resulting trust upon any specific piece of property it must be shown that trust funds went to the purchase of the property. Here the proof that the trust funds so went into the purchase of the property is largely established by the declarations and admissions of the trustee herself. The question is: Shall she be allowed to repudiate these declarations by showing that the precise trust funds did not go into the purchase, and upon this repudiation contend for a variance between the allegation and proof; or shall it be said that, under such admissions and declarations of a trustee, it will be held, against an attempt to make a countershowing, that the trustee, who had commingled the trust funds, herself treated the investment as an investment of the specific trust funds, and will be bound accordingly? No doubt can be entertained but that the latter, which was the conclusion of the trial court, is the only one which equity will countenance.

[7] Moreover, it is not every variance which will necessitate the overthrow of a judgment. Section 469, Code Civ. Proc. The allegation in this instance is that Mrs. Wheeler, in February, 1902, furnished her daughter, with $8,000 trust funds to purchase, and with which she purchased a two-thirds interest in the Flower street flats. The proof established the possession by the daughter at that time of $8,000 of the mother's money, and her declarations in writing that she applied that money to the purchase of the Flower street flats, and that because of this application her mother was the equitable owner of two-thirds of the property. There is, as between this allegation and these proofs, no variance which could have misled or injured the plaintiff.

[8] The plea of the statute of limitations was not sustained. Appellant argues that respondents rely upon an implied trust arising by operation of law; that the statute of limitations runs against the right to charge upon such an implied trust from the date the right arises; and that the action is therefore barred by section 343, Code of Civil Procedure. See Hecht v. Slaney, 72 Cal. 366, 14 Pac. 88; Nougues v. Newlands, 118 Cal. 104, 50 Pac. 386; Broder v. Conklin, 121 Cal. 288, 53 Pac. 699. The difficulty with appellant's contention is that the claim against her does not arise under an implied trust, but under a positive, voluntary trust resting in parol; and it is, of course, well settled that the statute of limitations does not run against such a trust until repudiation of it by the trustee, with knowledge of this repudiation brought home to the beneficiaries. Only after this repudiation and knowledge does the four-year statute of limitation apply. Odell v. Moss, 130 Cal. 352, 62 Pac. 555; Norton v.

Bassett, 154 Cal. 415, 97 Pac. 894, 129 Am. St. Rep. 162. As late as December, 1906, plaintiff had written to her sister, acknowledging the trust and her trusteeship. As appears by the evidence, the first act amounting to a repudiation and disavowance of her trust was the filing by her of an inventory of her mother's estate, by which inventory no interest of the estate in the property, and no indebtedness to the estate from the plaintiff, was shown.

No showing is here made to justify appellant's contention that she should have a judgment for costs.

Her other contentions all revolve about the propositions which have heretofore been discussed. They do not therefore require specific consideration.

For the reasons given, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

In re CROSS' ESTATE. (L. A. 3,121.)

1. WILLS (§ 630*)—VESTED INTERESTS—DEVISE TO SURVIVOR—DIVESTING OF VESTED INTERESTS.

Under joint and mutual wills, executed by a husband and wife, providing that in the event of the death of either and the survival of the other for 30 days the whole estate of the deceased testator and of the community should pass to the survivor, there is no failure of a vested title during the 30 days after which the terms of the will take effect, but the law interposes; and under the rules of inheritance and succession the title vests in the heirs, devisees, or legatees, subject to divestiture if either husband or wife survive the other for more than 30 days.

2. WILLS (§ 184*)—CONSTRUCTION—CODICIL—ADDITIONAL LEGACIES.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1296, 1287, 1320, 1321, relating to the revocation, effect, and construction of wills, a prior will is not revoked by a codicil, unless the same is inconsistent with the will; and where joint and mutual wills, executed by a husband and wife, provided that on the death of either the survivor, if living at the end of 30 days, should take the whole estate of the decedent, and appointed the surviving husband or wife executor or executrix, and by another paragraph provided for disposition in the event that one of the testators should not survive the other for 30 days, and appointed certain other persons executors, and a joint and mutual codicil appointed the previously named executors and another as executors, the codicil did not revoke the first provision, but was a substituted clause for the second paragraph, naming the executors, so that under the first provision the widow, surviving for 30 days, was entitled to letters testamentary.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of John Cross, deceased. From an order admitting the will to probate and granting letters testamentary to Albert P. Cross and others, Laura L. Cross appeals. Reversed.

H. M. Barstow, of Los Angeles, and C. W. Cross, of San Francisco, for appellant. Edwin A. Meserve, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. John Cross and Laura L. Cross, his wife, had been married for 45 years. They were childless and owned property of considerable value. In May, 1898, they executed their joint and mutual wills. By paragraph I of those wills it was provided:

"In the event of the death of either one of the testators herein, if the survivor shall continue living for the period of thirty days thereafter, then and in that event the following terms of this instrument shall prevail, that is to say:

"1. The whole estate of the deceased testator and of the community shall pass to the surviving husband or wife; and for that purpose and in that event above described, each testator herein does hereby give, bequeath and devise to the other so surviving, all of said property and estate.

"2. That said surviving husband or wife is hereby appointed executor or executrix of this will as the will of the testator first dying as aforesaid, to serve without bonds, such executor or executrix to have full power to sell and convey and to manage said estate and all property thereof, without any order of court thereafter."

By paragraph II it was provided: "In the event that the deaths of the testators herein shall occur so that the one shall not survive the other for the full period of thirty days, then and in that event, and not otherwise, the following dispositions of this will shall have force and effect; and then and in that event, and not otherwise, we give, bequeath, and devise the said property and estate as follows; that is to say." Specific legacies were then made to named legatees. It was declared that the value of their property was estimated at $50,000; and provision was made for the ratable increase or decrease of these legacies in the event that the estate should prove to be of greater or less value than was estimated. It was further provided: "7. In the like event first described in this division II of this will, the said Albert P. Cross and Charles R. Diver (they having formerly been named as legatees) are hereby appointed as executors of this will."

Subsequently, in March, 1909, John and Laura L. Cross, in like manner, executed a joint and mutual codicil to their last will, which codicil increased legacies given by the original will to certain legatees, revoked another legacy because of the legatee's death, and provided in paragraph 6 as follows: "Albert P. Cross and Charles R. Diver mentioned in the original will, and J. E. Loomis of Los Angeles, California, are hereby appointed executors of the original will and of this codicil, and power is given to any two of them to act at any time, and the act of any two to have the same force and effect as if all three had acted."

John Cross died, and Laura, his wife, surviving him for more than 30 days, made application for the probate of the will and codicil, and for issuance to herself, as executrix, of letters testamentary. Opposition was made by Albert P. Cross, Charles R. Diver, and J. E. Loomis, with a petition that letters testamentary be issued to them as executors. The court admitted the will and its codicil to probate and granted letters testamentary to Cross, Loomis, and Diver. From the order issuing letters testamentary, the widow appeals.

[1] Thus the single question directly involved is the correctness or incorrectness of the court's decision that Cross, Loomis, and Diver were entitled to execute the will against the claims of the widow to letters testamentary. The court's ruling seems to have been based on the argument advanced by respondents that the first part of the will above quoted, was invalid, because to sustain it would "suspend the vesting of his whole estate entirely for a period of 30 days after his death, leaving the title to all his property in abeyance and nowhere, and preventing its vesting anywhere for a period of 30 days." This quotation is from respondents' brief. But the answer to this is that it is not humanly possible for a testator to do any such thing. The law itself intervenes and provides for the vesting of title. There was no failure to vest during the period of 30 days fixed by the will as the duration of the survivor's life before the terms of the will took effect. The rules and laws of inheritance and succession interposed wherever the will was silent, with the result that title vested in the heirs, devisees, or legatees, subject to divestiture if either spouse should survive the other for more than 30 days. The order, therefore, cannot be justified upon the argument that clause 1 of the testator's will is null and void.

[2] There remains then only for consideration the effect of the codicil and its nomination of executors upon the original will. To this the briefest reference to certain provisions of the Code embodying the fundamental rules of construction of wills and codicil thereto may be made. A prior will is not revoked by a subsequent will or a subsequent codicil thereto, unless the latter contains words of express revocation, or provisions wholly inconsistent with the terms of the former. In all other cases the prior will remains effectual, so far as consistent with the provisions of the subsequent will or codicil. Civ. Code, § 1296. All instruments testamentary in character, executed by the same testator, are to be construed as one instrument. Civ. Code, § 1320. All parts of a will are to be construed in relation to each other, so as to form, if possible, a consistent whole. Civ. Code, § 1321. The execution of a codicil, referring to a previous will, has the effect to republish the will, as modified by the codicil. Civ. Code, § 1287; Estate of Ladd, 94 Cal. 670, 30 Pac. 99; Estate of Plumel, 151 Cal. 80, 90 Pac. 192, 121 Am. St. Rep. 100. Growing out of these principles, it has become well established that additional or substitutional legacies given by a codicil are held to be attended by the same incidents and conditions as were the legacies given originally by the will. 1 Jarman on Wills, p. 149.

With these principles of construction before us, this appeal presents no difficulty. To construe the language of the codicil as being substituted language for paragraph II of the will makes of the will and codicil a harmonious whole. To say that the codicil meant to strike down paragraph I of the will is to do violence to these rules of construction, and to find a revocation where a revocation is not expressed, and where the construction of the instruments does not call for it. Subdivision 6 of the codicil, in nominating Cross, Diver, and Loomis as executors of the original will under this codicil, is clearly but a substituted clause for subdivision 7, paragraph II, of the will, where Cross and Diver alone are named. Thus Cross, Diver, and Loomis would be entitled to letters testamentary only upon the failure of the plan and scheme set forth in paragraph I of the will. This scheme has not failed. The wife has survived her husband for the named period, and by the terms of the will is entitled to letters.

The order appealed from is therefore reversed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action by M. D. Eaton and another against W. H. Wilkins and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

R. C. Minor and Clary & Louttit, all of Stockton, for appellants. Nicol & Orr and Nutter & Orr, all of Stockton, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Defendants' demurrer to plaintiffs' third amended complaint having been sustained, and plaintiffs having refused to amend further, judgment was accordingly given in favor of defendants, and from it plaintiffs take this appeal. The action was one for specific performance of a contract for the sale of real and personal property. The complaint contains allegations that on September 22, 1909, defendant W. H. Wilkins was the owner of a certain described tract of land in San Joaquin county, together with certain specified personal property situated thereon, and that on said day Wilkins executed and delivered to plaintiffs a contract, signed by him, giving them until September 29, 1909, to purchase the said land and personalty for $18,000. This contract is set out in full in the complaint as follows: "Wilkins Ranch, September 22, 1909. Messrs. Eaton and Buckley: We hereby grant you until next Wednesday, September 29th, 1909, in which to buy our land of 1,060 acres and all the personal property including hay, wood, wagons, 12 horses, 4 cows, 10 hogs and pigs, harness, mowers, plows, etc., meaning everything on the ranch excepting the baled hay in the warehouse, for the sum of eighteen thousand ($18,000.00) dollars. Terms of sale to be cash and you are to get your commission and a commission for Tom Walsh by selling for a greater sum. Land is to be clear of all debts and possession to be given with the deed. Personal property is to be clear of all debt. Abstract showing clear title to be furnished by us. The intention is to sell everything on the ranch except the hay mentioned above and the furniture and household goods, hay in barn and small stack in field across the river goes with the ranch. W. H. Wilkins."

The complaint contains averments that the real property described as "our land of 1,060 acres" was intended by Wilkins to refer to and did refer to the property in San Joaquin county theretofore specifically described in the complaint; that defendant E. A. Clifford was present when the contract was signed and delivered, and that he disclaimed any interest in the property involved; that, relying upon his statement, plaintiffs accepted the agreement, signed by Wilkins alone, and thereupon contracted and agreed to pay the purchase price according to the terms of the instrument; that on September 27, 1909, Wilkins caused certain abstracts to be delivered to plaintiffs; that from these abstracts plaintiffs ascertained that the title to the property stood of record in the name of W. H. Wilkins; that on September 29, 1909, plaintiffs tendered to Wilkins $18,000 for said property; that this sum was a just, fair, and reasonable price therefor; that plaintiffs have fully performed their part of the contract; that they have no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law; and that Wilkins has failed to execute a conveyance or to deliver to plaintiffs the possession of the real or personal property involved. The complaint contains the further averments that defendant E. A. Clifford knew of the execution of the contract by Wilkins, of the delivery thereof, and of the acceptance of the terms thereof by plaintiffs; but that on September 28, 1909 (the day before the tender to Wilkins of the $18,000), he caused to be recorded a deed from said Wilkins, dated January 31, 1907, conveying to him an undivided one-half interest in and to a large portion of the real property here in dispute. Plaintiffs further allege that at the time of the acceptance of the terms of the agreement, and at the time of the tender of the purchase price to Wilkins, they had no knowledge of the existence of said deed. The rest of the pleading is concerned with certain liens claimed by the other defendants and the reconveyance to Wilkins by Clifford of a certain interest in the property; but we need not concern ourselves with these matters.

[1, 2] The first contention of respondents in defense of the court's ruling sustaining the demurrer is that the contract is too indefinite to be specifically enforced. We think this position must be sustained. We have in mind the liberal rule with reference to indefinite descriptions capable of being made certain; but here the description of the real property as "our land of 1,060 acres," in a contract dated "Wilkins Ranch, September 22, 1909," is not sufficient. There is an allegation, as we have shown, that Wilkins intended by this vague description to designate the land in San Joaquin county, which is particularly described in the complaint; but that averment is of a bald conclusion, and is by no means sufficient. Marriner v. Dennison, 78 Cal. 210, 20 Pac. 386. There is no pleading of extrinsic facts which would support this conclusion, as, for instance, that the tract of land which plaintiffs desired to secure by this action was known as "Wilkins Ranch," or was the only realty containing 1,060 acres possessed by Wilkins. From the contract itself, it is impossible to determine whether or not the land is situated within the state of California. The description of the land to be conveyed is one of the most essential parts of an agreement to sell. Such a contract must be in writing, subscribed by the party to be charged, and must contain such description of the land, either in terms or by reference, that the property may be identified without resort to parol evidence. Craig v. Zelian, 137 Cal. 105, 69 Pac. 853. The contract here pleaded is one which, in and of itself, gives no clue to the property involved, and the complaint states no facts which would clarify the obscure references therein contained. The circumstance that in the agreement Wilkins promises to furnish, and did subsequently furnish, abstracts of title does not help the matter. The description in the contract must be sufficient to bind interested parties, and cannot be made to depend for its very existence upon the subsequent action of one of them. The demurrer was therefore properly sustained because of the failure of the complaint to set forth a definite and enforceable contract as a basis for the action.

[3, 4] There is another radical defect in the complaint. While it declares that the title to the property was in Wilkins on September 22, 1909, when the contract was delivered, and on September 27th, when the abstracts of title were examined, it pleads facts showing record title to an interest existing in favor of defendant E. A. Clifford on September 28 and 29, 1909, before the tender of the purchase price of $18,000 to Wilkins. Appellants contend that, since Clifford knew of their contract with Wilkins, his deed, placed of record on September 28, 1909, gives no title as against their contract. In this behalf they cite Smith v. Bangham, 156 Cal. 365, 104 Pac. 689, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 522, which holds that a right given by an option relates, when exercised, to the time of giving the option and cuts off intervening rights. But Clifford's deed was not one establishing a right acquired during the life of the option. It bore date January 31, 1907, and the presumption, in the absence of an allegation to the contrary, is that it was delivered on that date. There is an effort to plead estoppel in pais against E. A. Clifford, because he refused to sign the agreement, declared that he owned no interest in the land, and thereby caused plaintiffs to act upon his statements. There is, however, no allegation that he acted fraudulently, or with such gross negligence as amounted to constructive fraud. It does not appear that he was apprised of the true state of his own title when he made the statements attributed to him, nor that plaintiffs were without knowledge or the means of knowledge of the true condition of the title. The pleading therefore fails to set forth facts which would constitute an estoppel against Clifford; consequently the allegation that he was a grantee in a deed conveying an interest in the property, and presumed to have been delivered some years before the date of the contract upon which plaintiffs must rely for success in this case, establishes a state of the record inconsistent with the possibility of the granting of the equitable relief for which they pray. For this reason, also, the demurrer was properly sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; Joseph W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by George H. Fletcher, administrator of George Fletcher, against Sarah A. Kidder and another. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. W. Kitts, C. W. Cross, and Cross & Newburgh, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Fred Searls, of Nevada City, and Lloyd S. Larue, of Sacramento, and Edward J. McCutchen, and Page, McCutchen, Knight & Olney, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. By this action plaintiff sought to have a trust in favor of his intestate declared in one-half of the shares represented by certificates for 1,675 $\frac{1}{2}$  shares of the capital stock of the Nevada County Narrow Gauge Railroad Company. John F. Kidder was the president of the defendant corporation. During his lifetime George Fletcher, plaintiff's intestate, was secretary of the corporation. From time to time Kidder acquired stock of the corporation, and upon the surrender of the old certificates caused the new certificates to be issued in the name of "John F. Kidder, Trustee." George Fletcher died upon March 6, 1901, and John F. Kidder, who had been very ill for about a year immediately preceding his death, died upon April 10, 1901. The complaint is surprisingly deficient in its averments as to the nature of the trust. It neither sets up any agreement showing the existence of a voluntary trust, nor does it set up the payment by George Fletcher of any part of the purchase price of the stocks so acquired by Kidder, but contents itself with allegations to the effect that on such and such a day "said John F. Kidder and said George Fletcher became the owners of certificate," etc. It is alleged, further, only that the certificates issued to John F. Kidder as trustee were so issued to him as trustee for himself and George Fletcher. After trial the court found against the existence of the trust, and rendered judgment accordingly. From the order denying his motion for a new trial plaintiff appeals.

[1] Upon the appeal it is argued that the word "trustee" on the stock certificates held by John F. Kidder was evidence of ownership outside of Kidder himself. Authorities from other states are cited to this effect, but the rule is here to the contrary. "The mere addition of the word 'trustee' after the name in the certificate is not in this state of itself, nothing more appearing, to be deemed constructive notice of the equities of the secret owner of the stock." Brewster v. Sime, 42 Cal. 144; Thompson v. Toland, 48 Cal. 99.

[2] Certain entries on the books of the corporation, which entries were made by George Fletcher, secretary of the corporation, were refused admission in evidence. Thus, in the stock ledger and assessment book in the account of "John F. Kidder, Trustee," is found heading a list of stock the words "Stock owned jointly by John F. Kidder and George Fletcher." In the stock transfer book is a like entry. The ruling was proper.

These were not entries like those considered in Mt. Water Works Co. v. Holme, 49 Colo. 412, 113 Pac. 501, where the entries were such as the secretary in the performance of his duty was required to make, and where it was held that under these circumstances the fact that they were in the secretary's handwriting did not forbid their admission in evidence in his favor. Here the entries were not such as the secretary was required to make, had no proper place in the books where they were entered, and the effort to prove them amounted to no more than an effort to prove self-serving declarations by hearsay. See Civ. Code, 378.

[3] The only other evidence to establish this trust is that of George H. Fletcher, corroborated by John H. Coughlan, ticket agent and assistant to the auditor of the railroad company. Mr. Fletcher's testimony is that a few days after his father's death, on March 10, 1901, he called upon Mr. Kidder, who was in bed and very ill, and had with him the following conversation: "How do you do, Mr. Kidder? How do you do, Herbert? Herbert, I intend to place this whole matter in the hands of the probate judge. Mr. Kidder, how much of this 'trust' stock did my father own? He owned 838 shares. Where is that stock? In Wells Fargo's bank." Coughlan testifies that he heard Mr. Kidder say: "Yes, Herbert, half of that stock is your father's." Mr. Kidder at the time of this conversation was very ill, was on his deathbed, and died thirty days thereafter. This is absolutely all of the evidence in the case, saving that Coughlan also testifies that in 1900, when a difference arose between Mr. Kidder and Mr. Fletcher because Mr. Kidder had from the East telegraphed for $10,000 with which to buy cars and the money had not been sent, Kidder upon his return declared to Fletcher, "I want my orders obeyed," and Fletcher replied, "I have as much to say as you, and we didn't have the money and I didn't send it." It is thus made to appear that no facts and circumstances going to the creation of a trust are in evidence, no pretense is made that Fletcher ever paid any part of the purchase price of the stock, thus raising an involuntary trust in his favor, nothing is shown to establish any equity in the claim of Fletcher, and the whole case, so far as the establishment of the trust is concerned, rests upon the asserted acknowledgment of it made by a very sick man a few days before his death. From its findings the court manifestly concluded that this, to its mind, was not the clear and convincing evidence without which such a trust—particularly after the death of the asserted trustee—should not be declared. It follows herefrom that there were no errors and that the evidence supports the findings.

The order appealed from is therefore affirmed.

2. TRUSTS (§ 357*)—SECRET TRUST—ENFORCEMENT AGAINST INCUMBRANCER.

Under Civ. Code, § 856, providing that no implied or resulting trust can prejudice the rights of incumbrancers of real property for value and without notice of the trust, a secret trust was not enforceable against a bank which, in good faith and without notice, took a mortgage upon the trust property as security for a loan and for a debt then due.

3. TRUSTS (§ 372*)—SECRET TRUST—ENFORCEMENT AGAINST PURCHASER AT MORTGAGE SALE—PROOF REQUIRED.

Where a secret trust is sought to be enforced against a purchaser at a mortgage sale, the plaintiff must prove, not only the facts establishing the trust, but also that the mortgagee took with notice of plaintiff's equities; such purchaser being entitled to the same protection as the mortgagee, who, under Civ. Code, § 856, providing that no implied trust can prejudice the rights of a purchaser or incumbrancer of real property for value and without notice of the trust, is entitled to the same protection as a purchaser for value.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 600-603; Dec. Dig. § 372.*]

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 315*)—DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION.

Where a company sought to have the distribution of part of an estate made to it under a deed absolute in form, and it was established that its claim was false and its deed simply a mortgage, it was improper, in a decree distributing such interest to another, to apparently recognize the company's rights by making the distribution subject to any rights which the company might have by way of any mortgage.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Martha E. Lyon, deceased. From the decree of distribution, J. J. Rauer appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Louis P. Boardman, of San Francisco, for appellant. A. A. De Ligne, De Ligne & Jones, A. M. Seymour, Seymour & Yell, and George & Hinsdale, all of Sacramento, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal by J. J. Rauer from the decree of distribution in the matter of the estate of Martha E. Lyon, deceased. By her will, which was admitted to probate, Martha E. Lyon devised and bequeathed her property, real and personal, one-third each to Frank D. Willey, her nephew, W. H. H. Willey, her brother, and Dr. P. R. Watts. F. D. Willey and Watts were appointed executors without bonds. By deed of date January 11, 1907, Watts conveyed all his interest in the estate to Frank D. Willey. On August 2, 1907, Frank D. Willey, as devisee and as assignee and grantee of Watts, executed a mortgage to the Market Street Bank of all his interest in the estate, which then (subject to administration) consisted of an undivided two-thirds thereof. This mortgage was given to secure the payment of Willey's promissory note for $1,700, of even date with the mortgage, and also to secure the payment of all other indebtedness due by Willey to the bank, which in amount exceeded $4,000. The mortgage contained the power of sale in case of default in the payment of the indebtedness. This mortgage was recorded upon August 6, 1907, and upon August 20, 1907, notice of the mortgage and of its recordation was filed with the court in probate in the matter of the Lyon estate. By assignment, dated February 20, 1909, and recorded September 13, 1909, this mortgage, with all the indebtedness secured thereby, was transferred to appellant, Rauer. He in turn assigned to one Casner upon September 8, 1909; the assignment having been recorded on September 13, 1909. The assignee, Casner, executed the power of sale in accordance with the terms of the mortgage, and caused the property to be sold at public auction on November 29, 1909. Rauer purchased at the sale, and the deed of the property was made to him accordingly. Such is Rauer's title to the distributive portion of Frank D. Willey.

On July 10, 1907, Frank D. Willey executed to the C. W. Clark Company, a corporation, a deed or assignment of all his interest in the estate of the deceased, described as being an undivided two-thirds interest in the real and personal property belonging to the deceased, but this deed was not recorded until August 31, 1907; and it further appears that, while it was in form a deed, it was in fact a mortgage, given to secure the payment of all sums due from Willey to the Clark Company, according to the terms and tenor of five promissory notes, exceeding in amount $16,000. The C. W. Clark Company and J. J. Rauer filed separate petitions for distribution; each claiming the right to a decree distributing the two-thirds interest of Frank D. Willey. Thereafter W. H. H. Willey, the devisee of the remaining one-third interest under the will, filed his petition for distribution of the estate and for the appointment of trustees. In this petition he averred that he was the sole equitable owner of all and entitled to all the estate of the deceased; that the devise to Frank D. Willey of one-third and the devise to P. R. Watts of another one-third of the estate were each and both made to them in trust for him. He therefore petitioned, both being dead, that the court appoint trustees to take and hold these thirds for his use and benefit in accordance with the terms of the trust, which terms it is unnecessary to specify.

The court received parol evidence touching the nature and existence of the trust, but, without declaring its nature, found simply "that under the will of said decedent and the trust attached to said will one-half of the property of said deceased was to go to W. H. H. Willey and one-half thereof to Frank D. Willey." It therefore decreed distribution of one-half of the property to W. H. H. Willey and the other moiety to J. J. Rauer, "subject, however, to any rights which C. W. Clark Company may have by reason of any mortgages held by it on said property, given by Frank D. Willey." From this decree Rauer alone appeals.

[1, 2] The effect of the decree is to recognize the title acquired by Rauer through the foreclosure sale under the mortgage to the Market Street Bank, but to deprive him of one-fourth of the title which he took under the sale, because of the secret trust in the Watts' interest in favor of W. H. H. Willey. Such a secret trust, in proper cases, will be enforced in favor of the beneficiary against the recalcitrant trustee, who repudiates the trust and seeks to retain the devise or legacy for himself. De Laurencel v. De Boom, 48 Cal. 581; Curdy v. Berton, 79 Cal. 420, 21 Pac. 858, 5 L. R. A. 189, 12 Am. St. Rep. 157; Will of O'Hara, 95 N. Y. 403, 47 Am. Rep. 53. But where the faithless trustee has parted with the property, and the property has been acquired by an innocent purchaser for value without notice, equity can and will no longer follow the property to impress it with the trust, but will leave the beneficiary to his personal remedy against the trustee. The Civil Code declares that every one to whom property is transferred in violation of a trust holds the same as an involuntary trustee under such trust, unless he purchases it in good faith and for a valuable consideration. Civ. Code, § 2243. And, further, that no implied or resulting trust can prejudice the rights of a purchaser or incumbrancer of real property for value and without notice of the trust. Civ. Code, § 856; Tripp v. Duane, 74 Cal. 91, 15 Pac. 439; Marshall v. Farmers' Bank, 115 Cal. 334, 42 Pac. 418, 47 Pac. 52. W. H. H. Willey does not plead or attempt to show that the Market Street Bank was not an incumbrancer for value and without notice.

[3] It is beyond controversy that, where such a trust as this is sought to be established against one who has taken the legal title without anything of record to disclose the trust, the plaintiff must not only prove the facts establishing the trust, but prove that the grantee of the trustee took the conveyance with notice of the equities of the plaintiff. Long v. Dollarhide, 24 Cal. 218; Eversdon v. Mayhew, 65 Cal. 167, 3 Pac. 641. It is, of course, not in dispute (since such is the declaration of section 856, Civ. Code) that mortgagees come within the rule of purchasers for value, and are protected in the same manner. Chapman v. Hughes, 134 Cal. 658, 58 Pac. 298, 60 Pac. 974, 66 Pac. 982. As the mortgagee was thus an incumbrancer for value, it is equally beyond controversy that to the purchaser at mortgage sale is extended the same protection. Otherwise the absurdity would result that the mortgagee would have to buy at his own sale (since any other purchaser with notice would not be protected), but the mortgagee so buying would be able then to convey title free from the trust. It follows, therefore, as to the respondent W. H. H. Willey, whatever may have been the nature of the hidden trust, appellant, Rauer, acquired title deed from it.

[4] Complaint is justly made of the decree distributing the property of the estate to Rauer, "subject, however, to any rights which C. W. Clark Company may have by reason of any mortgages held by it on said property, given by Frank D. Willey." The Clark Company came into court seeking distribution to them as grantees of Frank D. Willey under a deed absolute in form. It was established that its claim was false; that its purported deed was simply a mortgage; and that it had given a defeasance establishing the mortgage, which defeasance was produced at the hearing. It may be said that the decree which distributes the property to Rauer, subject to any right which the Clark Company "may have," is without meaning or efficacy, since unquestionably, if the Clark Company had any right by way of mortgage, the decree would, as matter of law, be subject to it. But as a declaration, seemingly in recognition of the Clark Company's rights, the language has no place in the decree.

The decree appealed from is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance herewith.

PARTNERSHIP (§ 64*)—NAMES—FICTITIOUS DESIGNATION—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEES.

While a partnership, which has not complied with Civ. Code, § 2466, which regulates the use of fictitious names, cannot sue on a contract made by it, its assignee may do so.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; M. T. Dooling, Judge.

Action by F. X. Trudel against A. Butori and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Devoto, Richardson & Devoto, of San Francisco, for appellants. Lloyd Macomber, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by defendants from a judgment against them and from an order denying their motion for a new trial in an action brought by plaintiff against defendants for an alleged balance due for work done and labor furnished.

In January, 1907, defendants entered into a contract with W. Ottmann, in which contract Ottmann agreed to construct for defendants a certain building in San Francisco. With the consent and approval of defendants, Ottmann assigned this contract to F. X. Trudel & Son, who at that time were engaged as copartners in the contracting business. At the request of the defendants, there was some extra work done, and plaintiff, F. X. Trudel, as assignee of the copartnership, claims that on account thereof, and on account of an unpaid balance on the original contract, there is due him the total sum of $710.55. The cause was tried by a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff, F. X. Trudel, for the sum of $550, and judgment for that sum was accordingly entered.

There were several amendments to the complaint, but the allegations of the pleading upon which the case was finally tried show that F. X. Trudel and his son, Arthur Trudel, were carrying on business under the firm name of F. X. Trudel & Son. It is asserted by defendants that this is a fictitious designation, and that, as the complaint does not show that the partnership had complied with the provisions of section 2466 of the Civil Code, they contend that their demurrer, which raised this point, should have been sustained. There are a number of authorities which seem to hold that this designation is not fictitious. Guiterman v. Wishon, 21 Mont. 458, 54 Pac. 566; Vaughan v. Kujath, 44 Mont. 484, 120 Pac. 1121; Pendleton v. Cline, 85 Cal. 142, 24 Pac. 659; Wilson v. Yegen Bros., 38 Mont. 504, 100 Pac. 613. But it is unnecessary for us to pass upon the point in this case, for it is alleged in the complaint that the copartners assigned the claim against the defendants to the plaintiff, F. X. Trudel, in whose favor judgment was entered; and it has been repeatedly held in this state that while such partnership, not having complied with section 2466, Civil Code, may not maintain an action on a contract made by it, nevertheless its assignee may do so. Gray v. Wells, 118 Cal. 11, 50 Pac. 23. There is, therefore, no merit in this point. While the evidence of the assignment is meager, still we think, under all the circumstances of the case, it must be deemed sufficient.

In view of the stipulation of the parties in open court at the time of the oral argument, it is unnecessary for us to pass upon the point made by defendants concerning the complaint in intervention.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SAN DIEGO & A. R. CO. v. CALIFORNIA STATE BOARD OF EQUALIZATION
et al. (S. F. 6,260.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 2, 1912.)

1. TAXATION (§ 446½*)—POWERS OF BOARD OF EQUALIZATION.

St. 1911, p. 530, provides that the state board of equalization must levy all taxes on the operating property of railroads between the first Monday in March and the third Monday before the first Monday in July, and publish on such third Monday a notice in certain cities, stating that the assessment for state taxes had been completed, and that the record of assessments shall be delivered to the state controller on the first Monday in July, and that any company, etc., dissatisfied with the assessment may apply to the board to have it corrected, and provides that the board "shall have power at any time on or before the first Monday in July" to make corrections, and requires the secretary on the first Monday in July to deliver the record of assessments to the state controller, and that one-half of the taxes shall at once be due and payable, one half shall be delinquent on the sixth Monday after the first Monday in July, and the other half on the first Monday in the succeeding February. Pol. Code. § 3885, provides that no assessment or act relating to the assessment of taxes is illegal because of informality, or because not completed within the time required by law. Held, that the power of the board of equalization in making assessments for state purposes and equalizing them ceases with the final delivery of the record of assessments to the state controller, so that any assessment made by it after the time it was required by law to deliver the record to the controller would be invalid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Dec. Dig. § 446½.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 83*)—PRESUMPTIONS—PER-FORMANCE OF OFFICIAL DUTY.

In the absence of a contrary showing, it must be presumed that official duty is performed within the required time, and as required by statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 105; Dec. Dig. § 83.*]

3. MANDAMUS (§ 16*)—DEFENSES.

A writ of mandate will not issue to compel the performance of an official act which would be wholly void and useless to petitioner, so that, where at the time of an application for a writ to compel the state board of equalization to assess railroad property it had ceased to have power under the statute to make such assessment, the writ will not be issued.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 48; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

In Bank. Original application for writ of mandate by the San Diego & Arizona Railroad Company against the California State Board of Equalization and others. Application denied.

L. L. Boone, of San Diego, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Raymond Benjamin, Chief Dep. Atty. Gen., for respondents.

PER CURIAM. [1] This is an original application to this court, upon notice, for a peremptory writ of mandate to require the defendants, the state board of equalization, and the members thereof, to assess as operative property of plaintiff, for taxes for the year 1912, all of its roadbed, rights of way, and rolling stock used by it in the operation of its road between Twenty-Sixth and Main streets in the city of San Diego and the Mexican boundary line, together with certain switches. The notice of application, together with the petition, was filed herein June 24, 1912. The notice stated that the application would be made on July 1, 1912, at which time the application was presented to the court, a demurrer being filed by defendants based on the ground of want of facts to warrant the issuance of the writ prayed for. The matter was ordered submitted upon the demurrer upon briefs to be subsequently filed.

The theory upon which the application was based is that plaintiff railroad company ever since March 1, 1911, has been operating a railroad in this state within the meaning of section 14, article 13, of our Constitution (a new section adopted November 8, 1910), and that the property which it seeks by this proceeding to have assessed by the state board of equalization is operative property, assessable under such section only by such state board for the benefit of the state. Such state board has refused to so assess it on the ground that said railroad company "was not in operation, and is not now in operation" within the meaning of such constitutional provision. If this ground is well based, the property is locally taxable where situated for county and local purposes, and the petition shows that it has been listed for local taxation by the county assessor of San Diego county, and that portions of such property located in National City and Chula Vista have been listed in such cities for taxation.

Section 14 of article 13 of the Constitution provides that the Legislature shall pass all laws necessary to carry the section into effect, and shall provide for a valuation and assessment of the property enumerated in the section, prescribing the duties of the state board of equalization and any other officers in connection with the administration thereof. In pursuance of this provision, the legislative act for that purpose was adopted; the same having been approved April 1, 1911. Stats. 1911, p. 530. It is provided therein substantially as follows: The state board of equalization must assess and levy all such taxes between the first Monday in March and "the third Monday before the first Monday in July" (which this year was Monday, June 10th), and must publish on said third Monday before the first Monday in July a notice in a daily newspaper in certain cities, stating that the assessment for state taxes has been completed and that the record of assessments for state taxes will be delivered to the state controller on the first Monday in July, and that any company, etc., dissatisfied with the assessment may apply to the board to have the same corrected in any particular. The board "shall have power at any time on or before the first Monday in July" to make corrections. On the first Monday in July the board, through its secretary, must deliver such record of assessments to the state controller, who shall proceed to collect the same. Such taxes are at once due and payable, and one-half thereof shall be delinquent on the sixth Monday after the first Monday in July and the other half on the first Monday in February next succeeding. There is absolutely nothing in the law that can be held to authorize the board of equalization to make any assessment for state purposes as to plaintiff after it has completed its record of assessments for the year and has delivered the same to the controller for collection, thus parting with all custody and control thereof. We have in mind, of course, the provisions of section 3885, Political Code, to the effect that no assessment or act relating to assessment or collection of taxes is illegal on account of informality, nor because the same was not completed within the time required by law and the decisions of this court thereunder, but there is not to be found therein any authority for the proposition that after the assessing officer or board has completed the assessment roll, and delivered the same as a completed roll, in accordance with law, to the proper collecting officer, parting with all custody and control thereof, that he or it can, in the absence of express authority, change any of the assessments therein or add a new assessment thereto. In Savings & Loan Society v. San Francisco, 146 Cal. 673, 80 Pac. 1086, the change was held to be one expressly authorized by the board of supervisors under sections 3679 and 3681, Political Code, and it was said that "it must * * * be conceded that the assessor had no power to make any changes in the assessment after he delivered his roll to the board of equalization, unless such changes were authorized by the board of supervisors under sections 3679 and 3681 of the Political Code, or with the written consent of the city and county attorney under section 3881 of the same Code." It seems very clear to us that at least with the final delivery of the record of assessments by the state board of equalization to the state controller all the power of the board in the matter of the making of assessments for state purposes and the equalization thereof is at an end.

There is nothing in the petition in this case to negative the idea that the state board of equalization complied with the law in the matter of the completion and delivery of the record of assessment to the state controller.

[2] In the absence of a showing to the contrary, it must be presumed that official duty has been regularly performed, and consequently that the state board of equalization finally delivered its record of assessments to the state controller on July 1, 1912, the very day on which plaintiff presented its application for a writ of mandate to this court. If this be so, the state board of equalization has not had, at any time since July 1st, the power to make any assessment for the year 1912 against plaintiff, and any assessment now made by it for the year 1912 would be absolutely void. This matter was not submitted to us for decision until some days after July 1, 1912.

[3] What we have said appears to us to be a complete answer to the application, even if, as claimed by plaintiff, the state board should have assessed its property, a matter we have in no way considered and upon which we express no opinion. A writ of mandate will not issue to compel the performance of an act that will be wholly void, and of no possible benefit to the petitioner.

The application for a writ of mandate is denied.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by Mary N. Burk, sometimes known as Mary N. Burke, against the City of Santa Cruz and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Cassin & Lucas, of Santa Cruz, for appellant. J. Leslie Johnson, City Atty., of Santa Cruz, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Mary N. Burk sued to quiet title to a tract of land situated in the city of Santa Cruz. The defendant, the city of Santa Cruz, asserted that "it was the owner and entitled to a right of way for street and sewer purposes over those certain public streets" delineated upon the map known as Garfield Park No. 1, filed June 7, 1890, and named Bethany Circle, Walk Circle, and Raymond Circle. Further, defendant "averts the fact to be that the said streets hereinabove mentioned have been dedicated as public streets by said defendant, and that the same have been accepted by the city of Santa Cruz, and have been at all times since said dedication and acceptance used and traveled as public streets by the public in general." Judgment passed for defendant, and from that judgment, and from the order denying her motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Plaintiff has since died, and her personal representative, Charles L. McFarland, has been substituted as plaintiff. The court found that plaintiff owned the land described in her complaint, but further found that the streets named in defendant's answer "have been dedicated as public streets by said defendant, and that the same have been accepted by the city of Santa Cruz, and that the same have been at all times since said dedication and acceptance used and traveled as public streets by the public in general, with the knowledge and consent of plaintiff."

The facts disclose that the map of Garfield Park No. 1 delineates and delimits a large tract of land, including the oblong piece owned by plaintiff. The center of the land upon this map is circular in shape and designed apparently as a public park or recreation ground. Immediately surrounding this central plat is a circular street, known as Everett Circle. Distant from the outer boundary of Everett Circle about 150 feet is delimited another street, known as Wilkes Circle. At the same distance beyond Wilkes Circle is, in like manner, delimited Walk Circle. Beyond Walk Circle, in the same way, Bethany Circle, and next to Bethany Circle, Raymond Circle. Radial streets intersect these circular streets, and one of them, Garfield avenue, which cuts plaintiff's oblong piece of land in two unequal portions, is admittedly a public highway. Upon this map of Garfield Park all the land between the circular and radial streets is subdivided into lots and numbers. Mrs. Burk's oblong piece of land is cut by Walk Circle, Bethany Circle, and Raymond Circle in such a manner and at such angles as to leave, according to the map of Garfield Park, fragmentary bits and pieces of lots. Indeed, it may be said that it would be strong evidence of mental incompetency for an owner to permit his land to be divided and dismembered as upon that map shown.

It should be said without delay, however, that plaintiff is relieved from this imputation, because it is not shown or pretended to be shown that she in any way authorized or consented to the Garfield Park map, or even knew of its existence. Moreover, it is established that she owned her land before the map was filed, and the map itself was so unwarranted and so unauthorized, so far as plaintiff's property was concerned, that it was by the court admitted in evidence only for the limited purpose of showing these circular streets in their relation to the land of the plaintiff.

What the evidence does establish is that Garfield avenue divided plaintiff's land in two unequal oblong portions; the greater lying west of Garfield avenue. Garfield avenue, as has been said, was concededly a public highway. Plaintiff inclosed by fences her two pieces of land, maintained these fences until a year before the trial, and farmed her whole tract, putting it to plow, and in so farming, raised crops upon the so-called Walk, Bethany, and Raymond Circles.

Still further it is shown that none of the so-called streets was ever used as a public street, and that they had no physical existence and no other existence than their delineation upon the map, unauthorized by the owner of the property. There were no streets upon the ground. Says the superintendent of streets of the city: "The only streets, if any, were the streets upon the map." Further, it is shown that the city intruded upon plaintiff's land in 1905 and undertook to remove the fences maintained by plaintiff, first passing a resolution that it was for the best interests of the city and of the inhabitants thereof that the "streets running through and along said property of Mary N. Burk be opened." Pursuant to this resolution, the city, against the protest of the plaintiff, did tear down the fences and proceeded to build sewers upon one or another of these circular streets, and then, according to the evidence, admitted without objection and without conflict, "both the city engineer and the city attorney advised the city officers that they had no title to those streets, and, in order to protect the city from any further trouble, we gave them an easement to the two sewers already laid in the ground. The city received that deed and accepted that map of Prospect Park." Such is the testimony of plaintiff's agent. And it appears that the plaintiff did file a map of Prospect Park, which map was a subdivision of her own land, and which map was a distinct repudiation that Raymond, Bethany, and Walk Circles extended over her land, and which map, furthermore, delimited and laid out other and different streets, and which map was formally recognized by the mayor and city council of the city of Santa Cruz with formal acceptance "on behalf of the public of the streets as shown and delineated on this map as public highways as the same there designated." Furthermore, the city accepted a deed from plaintiff for a right of way to maintain the sewers which it had unlawfully constructed upon plaintiff's land, and accepted this deed without any mention of the circles in which the sewers were constructed, but by express reference and description according to the Prospect Park map, which plaintiff had filed, and for which alone she was responsible.

[1] But it is said by respondent that the acts of the plaintiff estop her from denying that it was her intent to dedicate the streets. It would be a complete answer to this to say that if estoppel in pais was relied upon it was the duty of the defendant to have pleaded this estoppel, and, not having pleaded it, it cannot be considered. Such is the uniform rule of decision laid down by this court from the case of Clarke v. Huber, 25 Cal. 593, to Chapman v. Hughes, 134 Cal. 641, 58 Pac. 298, 60 Pac. 974, 66 Pac. 982.

[2] But waiving this consideration, in what does the evidence consist showing her intent to dedicate? It is said to consist in her knowledge that the map of Garfield Park was recorded; but if she had such knowledge it committed her to no course of conduct. It compelled her to do nothing, for, not only, as has been said, was the map of Garfield Park absolutely unauthorized by and without binding force upon plaintiff, but the trial court recognized this by admitting that map for the sole purpose of showing the location, with reference to plaintiff's land, of the circular streets. The second and only remaining fact is that the assessor of the city assessed plaintiff's land by the lots set off and numbered upon the Garfield Park map. If such a fact can be regarded as evidence establishing a dedication to a public use, or as evidence to estop a party from denying such a dedication, then to municipalities desiring to acquire property is pointed out a direct, though novel, method. Let the city's assessor fail to assess the property to the owner and it becomes the property of the city by gift or dedication, because the owner is estopped to assert the contrary. However, if this be so, the converse must be equally true, and if the assessor of San Francisco should assess Market street to the abutting property owners, and they should pay the assessment, Market street would immediately become private property, and the city be estopped from asserting the contrary. In truth, it is too preposterous to merit serious consideration that a ministerial officer, like the assessor, charged only with the duty of assessing property which should be assessed, can by his mistaken act of omission or commission raise an estoppel for or against the city as to a matter in which he has absolutely no authority. But, finally, and the more completely to dispose of this, it is shown and it is uncontradicted that plaintiff protested against this form of assessment, and insisted that her land had not been subdivided and should be assessed as acreage property.

[3] Where a dedication rests in acts and conduct and not in grant, the rule is well settled and has been many times repeated by this court to the effect that "property cannot be taken for public use without compensation, unless the owner is willing, and this willingness should be manifested by clear and unmistakable acts. Parties may not be done out of their property by doubtful implications, no matter how greatly the public may be inconvenienced." Cerf v. Pfeiffer, 94 Cal. 135, 29 Pac. 417; Latham v. City of Los Angeles, 87 Cal. 519, 25 Pac. 673; San Francisco v. Canavan, 42 Cal. 553; Spaulding v. Bradley, 79 Cal. 449, 22 Pac. 47; San Francisco v. Grote, 120 Cal. 60, 52 Pac. 127, 41 L. R. A. 335, 65 Am. St. Rep. 155. No case before this court has ever evinced a plainer attempt to do the very thing which the law thus forbids.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore reversed.

FORESTIER v. JOHNSON et al.
(S. F. 5,441.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 1, 1912.
Rehearing Denied Oct. 31, 1912.)

1. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 37*)—PUBLIC LANDS —LAND BENEATH NAVIGABLE WATER—PUBLIC EASEMENT.

The title to soil underneath navigable waters, including all that is covered with water at ordinary high tide, as well as that lying below low tide, belongs to the respective states, but it is held in trust for the use of the people in navigating, carrying on commerce and fishing; and the control of the state cannot be relinquished by any transfer, so as to divest the public easement, except where the transfer is for a pier, dock, etc., which is a grant consistent with the trust, and does not substantially impair the use.

2. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 37*)—PUBLIC LANDS—LAND BENEATH NAVIGABLE WATER—DESTRUCTION OF EASEMENT.

The state may, however, establish a harbor line or sea wall in furtherance of navigation, and destroy the public easement by fixing the wall at such a distance from the shore that some of the intervening lands lie so far from the sea wall that they cannot be conveniently applied to any use in aid of navigation or commerce, thereby destroying the public easement over such lands, so that thereafter the state may sell to private parties, who may fill in.

3. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 37*)—PUBLIC LANDS—TIDELANDS—EASEMENT OF NAVIGATION—RIGHTS OF OFFICER—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The statutory provisions enacted prior to the Political Code and dealing with public lands are, as developed, substantially the same as Pol. Code, §§ 3440–3493½, which authorize the sale of swamp lands, salt marsh, and tidelands; and neither such statutes nor the Code make any provision for the protection or management of navigable waters, or for the regulation of navigation on the soil of such lands. The decisions under the former statutes recognized that the purchaser of tidelands took subject to the right of the public to unrestrained navigation of navigable waters. Held that, as the Code does not substantially depart from the provisions previously existing, it will be presumed that the Legislature intended it to be understood as having substantially the same purposes, object, and meaning; and a purchaser of tidelands thereunder will take subject to the public easement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. §§ 201–227, 285; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

4. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 37*)—PUBLIC LANDS—TIDELANDS—EASEMENT OF NAVIGATION—RIGHTS OF OFFICER—CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Const. art. 15, § 2, provides that a claimant of frontage or tidal lands may not obstruct the right of way for navigation in the navigable waters. Pol. Code, §§ 3440–3493½, which authorize the sale of such lands, makes no provision for the protection of the public right. Held that, as an intent to contravene the Constitution in enacting a law will not be imputed to the Legislature, unless it clearly appears, the statute will not be considered to authorize disposition or a use which would defeat the public easement.

5. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 37*)—TIDELANDS—EASEMENT OF NAVIGATION—PATENT AS EVIDENCE OF NONEXISTENCE OF NAVIGABLE WATERS.

And the sale of such lands by the state and the preparation and execution of a patent thereto do not therefore constitute a determination that the land contains no navigable waters within its bounds, as such matter remains a question of fact, which may be shown by any citizen in defense of an action to prevent his exercise of the public right secured to him by the constitutional provision.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1071*)—HARMLESS ERROR—FINDING ON AN IMMATERIAL ISSUE.

Where a judgment is supported by a finding on a material issue, a finding on an immaterial issue, though erroneous, would not bind the parties, and will not require a reversal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4234–4239; Dec. Dig. § 1071.*]

7. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 16*)—ACTION TO ENJOIN USE—PUBLIC EASEMENT AS DEFENSE.

While a private citizen cannot maintain an action to remove an obstruction or open the way where navigable water or a public way is obstructed or closed, or recover damages caused thereby, or enjoin a threatened obstruction, unless he can show private injury, a person against whom an action is begun to enjoin him from using navigable water or other public way may defend by asserting his public right to do so, and need not show a private injury, either to person or property.

8. GAME (§ 2½*)—RIGHTS OF PUBLIC—HUNTING WILD GAME.

The hunting of wild game is a privilege which is incidental to the public right of navigation over tidelands and navigable waters.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

Action by Edwin H. Forestier against Frank Johnson and others. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank V. Bell and Bell, Straus & Atwood, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Raymond Benjamin, of San Francisco, and Frank L. Coombs, of Napa, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Appeals taken from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial in an action to enjoin trespasses upon and injuries to land alleged to belong to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff claims ownership in fee of 302 acres of land which at ordinary high tide is covered with water, and is known as "Fly's Bay." The defendants are residents and citizens of the state. They deny that the plaintiff is the owner of the land, but do not claim ownership in themselves. Their sole affirmative claim is that, as citizens of the state, they have the right to go upon the premises for the purposes of hunting, fishing, and navigation. They assert that Fly's Bay is a side channel of the Napa river, and is a navigable stream or channel, and as such belongs to the public, so far as may be necessary for the purposes stated. The plaintiff claims title from the state of California, under a sale of the land as tideland, made by the state to him on January 15, 1906. The action was begun on January 26, 1906. Afterwards, on March 4, 1907, in pursuance of said sale, a patent was issued to him by the state.

The court below found that the plaintiff is not the owner or entitled to the possession of the premises; that they belong to the state of California; that the "so-called property * * * consists of a navigable bay, commonly known as 'Fly's Bay,' which said bay is a portion of and opens into and at its northern and southern boundaries is connected with the Napa river, * * * one of the navigable streams within the county of Napa"; and that at mean tide the whole of the premises is a large body of navigable water which for many years has been and now is used by vessels of small burden for purposes of navigation. Judgment was thereupon given that each defendant is entitled to the privileges, use, possession, and enjoyment of the waters of Fly's Bay for navigation, for fishing, and for hunting wild game thereon, and that plaintiff take nothing by his action.

The evidence concerning the survey under which the plaintiff obtained his patent shows that the tracts surrounding Fly's Bay had been previously sold as tidelands, or as swamp lands, and that the surveys thereof had been made by meandering Fly's Bay and making its banks the boundaries of those tracts. In surveying for the plaintiff, the distances across the channel at the northern end of the bay and across the bay at the southern line of the tract, and across Mud slough on the easterly line, were ascertained by triangulation. The southern end was more than a quarter of a mile wide. The remaining lines were not surveyed, but were ascertained by verifying the surveys of the surrounding tracts and practically adopting the lines thereof next to the bay as the lines of the plaintiff's tract. There is ample evidence to show that through this bay, and extending at each end into Napa river, there is a channel deep enough for navigation at mean tide which has been used for many years, and is now used for navigation by the public. There is evidence, also, that practically the whole area included within the boundaries of the patent is navigable for small boats at ordinary high tide. It does not appear that there has ever been any occasion for running boats out of the main channels, except for the purpose of hunting. At low tide the land is nearly all bare, except the channel aforesaid. The finding that Fly's Bay is navigable water is supported by sufficient evidence.

The issuance of the patent is admitted. If it conveys to the plaintiff the unqualified fee in the entire area, the findings and judgment are unquestionably wrong. If it conveys the title to the soil, subject to the public easement for purposes of navigation and fishery, the finding that the plaintiff has no title at all is without support; but the judgment refusing an injunction and declaring the defendants entitled to the privileges of the bay for navigation and fishery is not erroneous in any substantial respect. The latter proposition presents the principal question for consideration.

The defendants, in their presentation of the case to this court, admit that the patent was valid and effectual to convey to the plaintiff the title to the soil underlying the waters of the bay, and to give him complete title to the premises, except so far as they may be necessary to the public uses of navigation and fishery. With the exercise of these public rights, they contend, the plaintiff cannot interfere. They further say that, if a citizen has the right to navigate the water in a boat, he may go at will, for any purpose or without purpose, and that if he finds game birds thereon he may shoot them and take them for his own use without infringing any right of the plaintiff as the subordinate owner of the soil. The defendants further concede that they have no private rights in the premises, nor any such privity with the state as would be necessary to authorize them to attack the validity of the patent, except so far as it is absolutely void as matter of law. The decision in Gale v. Best, 78 Cal. 235, 20 Pac. 550, 12 Am. St. Rep. 44, and other similar cases, would preclude them from making such attack as mere citizens claiming public rights alone. Their theory is that they are not attacking the patent at all, but that it is qualified and limited by the law and by certain provisions of the statute and the Constitution which enter into and become part of it, and that they are seeking only to have it limited to its true effect, and to claim and maintain the privileges which, as thus qualified, it preserves to them.

[1] So far as may be necessary for the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, the United States has the paramount right to control the navigable waters within the several states. The state can make no disposition of the soil beneath, or allow any interference with, the navigable waters that will impair this right and power of the United States. The title to the soil beneath such waters, including all that is covered with water at ordinary high tide, as well as that lying below low tide, belongs to the respective states by virtue of their sovereignty. "It is a title held in trust for the people of the state that they may enjoy the navigation of the waters, carry on commerce over them, and have the liberty of fishing therein freed from the obstruction or interference of private parties. * * * The trust devolving upon the state for the public, and which can only be discharged by the management and control of property in which the public has an interest, cannot be relinquished by a transfer of the property. The control of the state for the purposes of the trust can never be lost, except as to such parcels as are used in promoting the interests of the public therein, or can be disposed of without any substantial impairment of the public interest in the lands and waters remaining. * * * It is grants of parcels of lands under navigable waters that may afford the foundation for wharves, piers, docks, and other structures in aid of commerce, and grants of parcels, which, being occupied, do not substantially impair the public interest in the lands and waters remaining, that are chiefly considered and sustained in the adjudged cases as a valid exercise of legislative power consistently with the trust to the public upon which such lands are held by the state." Illinois C. Ry. v. Illinois, 146 U. S. 435, 452, 13 Sup. Ct. 110, 118 (36 L. Ed. 1018). Similar statements concerning this subject have been made by this court. Eldridge v. Cowell, 4 Cal. 87; Ward v. Mulford, 32 Cal. 372; Oakland v. Oakland W. F. Co., 118 Cal. 183, 50 Pac. 277; People v. Kerber, 152 Cal. 733, 93 Pac. 878, 125 Am. St. Rep. 93.

Since the defendants concede the validity of the patent, and that the title to the soil passed thereby, and claim only the public rights aforesaid; and, as the question of the validity and effect of such patents, as affecting the right of the state to vacate them or retake the lands, is involved in other cases now pending before this court, we need not determine whether or not the sale passed the title to the soil to the plaintiff, but, for the purposes of the case, we will assume that it is valid and effectual to that extent.

[2] The defendants further concede the soundness of the decision in Eldridge v. Cowell, supra, to the effect that the state has power to establish a harbor line, or sea wall, in furtherance of navigation, and to fix it at such a distance from the shore that some of the intervening lands lie so far from the sea wall that they cannot be conveniently or practically applied to any use in aid of navigation or of commerce between land and water, and that, having done so, the public easement over such land is destroyed, and the state may then sell it to private persons to be filled in and applied to other purposes. This proposition has been affirmed, recognized or conceded in other cases in addition to those above cited. Holladay v. Frisbie, 15 Cal. 635; San Francisco v. Straut, 84 Cal. 124, 24 Pac. 814; Wheeler v. Miller, 16 Cal. 124; Knight v. Haight, 51 Cal. 171; Friedman v. Nelson, 53 Cal. 589; Seabury v. Arthur, 28 Cal. 142; Knight v. Roche, 56 Cal. 21; Le Roy v. Dunkerly, 54 Cal. 459; People v. Davidson, 30 Cal. 384; People v. Klumpke, 41 Cal. 277; Hyman v. Read, 13 Cal. 444. See, also, U. S. v. Mission R. Co., 189 U. S. 405, 23 Sup. Ct. 606, 47 L. Ed. 865.

[3] The sale and patent, under which plaintiff claims title, possession, and control of these waters, were made in pursuance of the provisions of the Political Code authorizing the sale of swamp lands, salt marsh, and tide lands, being sections 3440 to 3493½, inclusive. It is admitted that those provisions were regularly pursued. The aforesaid propositions being conceded by the defendants, the soundness of which we need not consider, the only remaining inquiry necessary to the disposition of the case is whether or not the provisions of the Political Code, conceding that they authorize the sale of the soil covered by water at ordinary high tide, go farther and authorize a sale which destroys or vacates the dedication of the water to the public uses of navigation and fishery, or vests in the grantee the right to prevent the public use and convert both land and water to his own private use and possession. We are of the opinion, for reasons now to be given, that such sale does not vacate the public easement, or vest such right in the purchaser.

The decisions above cited, so far as they hold that the state may, in the interest of navigation, destroy the public easement and divert to exclusive private ownership parts of the tideland or submerged land not necessary for navigation and capable of reclamation for other uses, were all cases involving dispositions of lands under statutes adjusting, or authorizing the adjustment of, harbor lines and providing for the sale of lands covered by navigable waters, but too far landward of the sea wall to be of any use in connection with navigation—statutes which plainly manifested an intent to deal with and terminate the public easement over such lands. They are not authority for the proposition advanced by plaintiff, unless we shall find that the statute under which he purchased manifests a like intent.

The aforesaid provisions of the Political Code do not express or indicate such intent with respect to navigable waters, but, when properly interpreted and applied, show a design to dispose of the tidelands subject to the public easement in any navigable waters included within the tracts so disposed of.

The provisions in question are the result of an evolution in legislation beginning in 1855. The act of 1855 (St. 1855, p. 189) provided only for the sale and reclamation of the swamp and overflowed lands granted to the state by the United States by the act of Congress of September 28, 1850. Chapter 84, 9 U. S. Stats. 519. The state held these lands free from any public use. This act of 1855 was repealed by the act of 1858 (St. 1858, p. 198), which substantially re-enacted the provisions of the former act. Its title was "An act to provide for the sale and reclamation of the swamp and overflowed lands of this state." It was perceived, however, that in many places the swamp land was contiguous to tidelands; that they were similar in character and appearance; that it was often difficult or impossible to accurately locate the lines of separation; and, indeed, that such line might change temporarily in times of flood. In view of these conditions, the statute provided that if, upon the survey of any land sold under the act—a survey which the purchaser was to have made—any portion should prove to be land belonging to the state by virtue of her sovereignty, the money paid therefor should be paid into the general fund of the state, instead of the swamp land fund. Stats. 1858, p. 198. An amendment, not important here, was made in 1859. Stats. 1859, p. 340. The act of May 13, 1861, provided for the reclamation and segregation of the swamp and overflowed lands of the state, and for the sale thereof, after segregation. The swamp and overflowed lands were to be segregated from the "high lands"—that is, from lands belonging to the United States—and maps were to be made thereof. Section 27 provided, that the act should also apply to salt marsh and tide lands. Stats. 1861, p. 355. Unimportant amendments were passed in 1862 and 1863. Stats. 1862, p. 197; Stats. 1863, p. 523. A complete revisory act concerning the sales of swamp lands, marsh lands, tide lands, and other lands of the state was enacted April 27, 1863. Stats. 1863, pp. 591-601. In 1864 (St. 1863-64, p. 230), and 1866 (St. 1865-66, p. 799), some amendments were enacted. All these statutes were expressly repealed by the general statute of 1868. Stats. 1867-68, p. 507. It was substantially a revision of the previous laws on the subject. It established a state land office to manage the sale of all lands held by the state and the reclamation thereof, where necessary. So far as the question here under consideration is concerned, it is not materially different from the provisions of the Political Code on the same subjects.

Neither in the Political Code nor in any of the previous statutes, above mentioned, is there any provision for the protection or management of navigable waters, or for the regulation of navigation. No provision is made for the consideration of the subject of navigation, or for a decision of the question whether any tidelands are or are not required therefor, or whether the public right of navigation over any given parcel of the soil may be discontinued and the dedication of the soil to the public use revoked or vacated without detriment to the general welfare. The scheme is manifestly designed, not as an exercise of the sovereign power of dominion over these lands for the preservation and protection of the right of navigation, or of the duty of the state to promote, control, and regulate it, but as a plan to dispose of the soil of the tidelands in such a manner that the grantee shall take it for reclamation and subject to the public rights, wherever they may exist over such lands. It would follow, therefore, that sale under these laws authorizes no destruction of any public easement, and that whenever a navigable channel or navigable water may extend over any tideland granted by the state under these statutes the public right of navigation therein is not destroyed, the purchaser takes subject thereto, and he has no right to enjoin or prevent any citizen from exercising the public rights incident thereto.

[4] If this was true of these statutes originally, because of the nature of the state's title to the land and its duty to protect and preserve navigation, there can be no doubt that it is true since the adoption of the Constitution of 1879. Apparently for the purpose of settling this question, section 2 of article 15 provides that no one "claiming or possessing the frontage or tidal lands of a harbor, bay, inlet, estuary, or other navigable water in this state, shall be permitted to exclude the right of way to such water whenever it is required for any public purpose, nor to destroy or obstruct the free navigation of such water; and the Legislature shall enact such laws as will give the most liberal construction to this provision, so that access to the navigable waters of this state shall be always attainable for the people thereof." The Legislature is without power to dispose of the tidelands of the state in a manner which would conflict with this provision of the Constitution, or to provide for the alienation of a greater estate in such lands than that provision would permit. The provision is that no person possessing tidal lands of a bay, estuary, or other navigable water, whether the possession be lawful or unlawful, can be permitted to obstruct the free navigation thereof. The power of the Legislature is limited by the provisions of the Constitution, which are mandatory and prohibitory. Therefore, if it can dispose of, or authorize the disposition of, the underlying soil to private ownership, it cannot thereby authorize the alienee to obstruct the free navigation of such water. The words of the Constitution are to be considered as incorporated in the grant or patent the same as if inserted therein. They become a part of it and qualify, it so that the estate granted is limited to the permitted uses. All the statutory provisions aforesaid regarding tidal lands must be construed so as to be in harmony with this declaration. An intent to contravene the Constitution will not be imputed to the Legislature, unless it clearly appears, and when it does appear the provision is void. We think it is plain that the provisions for the sale of swamp and overflowed, salt marsh, and tide lands, as set forth in the Political Code, were not intended to affect or extinguish the public rights in navigable waters. The result is that the grantee of such lands may claim the portions of the land so purchased which are not capable of navigation, but that he must leave the navigable waters open for public use.

The previous decisions of this court confirm these conclusions. People v. Morrill, 26 Cal. 336, was an action on behalf of the state to cancel a state patent to Morrill for land sold to him under the act of May 14, 1861 (Stats. 1861, p. 363), providing that tidelands might be sold under the laws then in force for the sale of swamp and overflowed lands. The act of May 13, 1861, had not then become operative, and the court held that the laws referred to were the acts of 1858 and 1859. Stats. 1858, p. 198; Stats. 1859, p. 340. The land patented lay upon the sea beach, and extended from the line of high tide seaward beyond the low-tide line. It was unfit for cultivation and unsuitable for reclamation. The court declared that the acts of 1858 and 1859 were enacted to encourage the reclamation of lands suitable, when reclaimed, for cultivation, and were intended to apply only to lands susceptible of reclamation, and that they did not authorize the sale of land along the sea beach lying between the high and low tide lines. Taylor v. Underhill, 40 Cal. 471, is similar to the case at bar. The land in controversy there was a narrow strip opposite the city of Sacramento, constituting the sloping bank of the Sacramento river, lying between the high-tide and the low-tide lines. The defendant claimed the right to purchase it from the state under the act of 1868, aforesaid. He had obtained a certificate of purchase from the surveyor general under that act. The court says: "It could not have been intended in authorizing the sale of swamp and overflowed lands to enable persons to obtain titles to lands under navigable waters, which are incapable of being reclaimed for agricultural purposes, and which could not be utilized without materially interfering with navigation. * * * Admitting that the title of the state would pass to the defendant under the patent, it would not authorize him to change the water front or obstruct navigation. The state can probably sell the land and authorize the purchaser to extend the water front so as to enable him to build upon this land; but it must be done in the interest of commerce, and that must first be determined by the Legislature. No such right to obstruct navigation passes to the purchaser under the laws for the sale of swamp and overflowed land." Kimball v. MacPherson, 46 Cal. 103, was a land contest referred to the court by the surveyor general. It arose under the act of 1868 aforesaid. Each party claimed the right to purchase the land as tideland. At low tide it was an exposed sand beach; at ordinary high tide it was covered with water. It was not susceptible of use for agricultural purposes, and was useful only for some purpose in aid of commerce and navigation. The court said: "It was not the intention of the Legislature to permit a sand beach on the shore of the ocean, between ordinary high and low water marks, to be converted into private proprietorship under the act of March 28, 1868. * * * The chief purpose of that act was to reduce into one harmonious system all previous provisions for the sale of overflowed, swamp, and tide lands, and other lands belonging to the state, and to provide for the reclamation of the first-named classes. * * * Nothing short of a very explicit provision to that effect would justify us in holding that the Legislature intended to permit the shore of the ocean, between high and low water mark, to be converted into private ownership." The judgment was that neither claimant was entitled to purchase. People v. Cowell, 60 Cal. 400, was a direct action to cancel a certificate of purchase of tideland, issued under the act of 1863, above mentioned. Stats. 1863, p. 591. The land was on the shore of Monterey Bay at Santa Cruz, partly below low-tide line and the remainder below the ordinary high-tide line. The trial court found that it could be reclaimed by dykes, but could be made useful for agriculture only by transporting soil for that purpose, and that the cost of reclamation would greatly exceed its value, when reclaimed, for any purpose of tillage and agriculture. It was argued by the claimant that the mere fact that it would be a bad speculation for such uses was immaterial; that the only test was, "Is the land reclaimable?" The court held that, although reclamation was physically possible, land of that character was not within the terms of the statute, but that said statute applied only to land reclaimable for agricultural purposes; that this was clearly not of that character; and that therefore it was not subject to sale thereunder.

In People v. Russ, 132 Cal. 102, 64 Pac. 111, the defendant had bought, under the provisions of the Code, a tract bordering on Salt river, a navigable stream in which the water rose and fell with the tide. He had applied to buy the land as marsh and tide land, under said Code provisions. Two small sloughs extended through the tract from Salt river to the ocean. These were not navigable; but the tides forced water from the ocean through them into Salt river. This increased the flow of the river to the ocean, and by that means Eel river bar, at the outlet of Salt river and Eel river, was kept sluiced out to a depth which made it navigable, and thereby navigation from Salt river to the ocean was made possible. The defendant in reclaiming his land dammed these sloughs, so as to prevent this tidal flow through them from the ocean to the river; the effect being that the volume of water in the river was not sufficient to sluice out the bar, and navigation in the river and over the bar was thereby obstructed. The court held that, although the sloughs were not themselves navigable, yet that the filling of them so as to affect injuriously the navigation of the river and bar was unlawful. It said that the right to reclaim the tidelands, under the provision of the Code for the sale of such lands, is not superior to the public use of navigable streams. Speaking of the right of the owner to dam the sloughs, it said: "The swamp and overflowed land act does not purport to give the owner that right, even conceding such a power in the state; and the right of the public in the use of a stream as a public highway is paramount to any right which the owner of the land has to reclaim his land from overflow. * * * While the state is pleased to see its swamp and overflowed lands reclaimed, and thereby become productive, yet the Constitution of the state declares that no owner of tidelands of any harbor, bay, inlet, estuary, or other navigable water in this state shall be permitted to destroy or obstruct the free navigation of such water."

[5] All of the foregoing decisions, except the last, concern sales made under the laws enacted prior to the Code. As the Code does not substantially depart from the provisions previously existing, it is to be presumed that the Legislature intended it to be understood as having substantially the same purpose, object, and meaning. Hence it cannot be said that the action of the surveyor general in receiving the application approving the survey and preparing the patent, or of the Governor in executing it, are to be considered as a determination by the state that the land does not include any navigable water, or as a destruction or discontinuance of the public easement therein, or as an exercise of the functions of the state concerning the control of navigable waters. It seems necessarily to follow that, conceding that the title to the soil passes when tideland is purchased from the state, under the Code, the question whether it includes within its bounds any navigable waters, and the extent of such navigable waters, are not determined by the sale, but remain open for further adjustment between the purchaser and the state, and the sale does not vest in the purchaser the right to erect reclamation works which may materially interfere with the navigation of such waters. And the question whether or not there is such navigable water over such land must in the meantime remain open as a question of fact; and its existence may be shown by any citizen in defense of an action to prevent his exercise of the public right of navigation secured to him by the said constitutional provision.

The decision in Bolsa Land Co. v. Burdick, 151 Cal. 254, 90 Pac. 532, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 275, and the comments of the court regarding the power of the state to sell tidelands, are based on the conclusion stated in the opinion that the waters there involved were not navigable. While it appeared that some of the land there involved had been obtained from the state by purchase under the Code provision for the sale of tidelands, yet it also appears that the land or waters so purchased were all included within the limits of a Mexican grant afterwards confirmed by the United States. It is doubtful if the state patent conveyed any title thereto. There is nothing in the decision which, when applied to the facts upon which it is based, is at all inconsistent with the proposition that the provisions of the Political Code for the sale of swamp lands and tidelands do not authorize the closing of navigable waters by the purchaser, and were not intended to affect public easements therein. The effect of the constitutional provision was not mentioned or involved in that case.

It has been said that the right of the United States to control navigable waters and adjust harbor lines in the exercise of its power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce is paramount to any title, dominion, or control of the state over such water. Illinois C. R. v. Illinois, supra. Nothing which we have said is intended to apply to this question. It is clear that, in the absence of any exercise of such power by the United States, the state has control and management thereof, and its mandates upon the subject are binding upon all persons.

[6] The appellant claims that the title to the soil was transferred to him by the patent, and hence that, if the finding that the title is in the state and not in him is an adjudication against him, it is a cloud upon his title of such force and effect as to constitute injurious error, for which the judgment must be reversed. As we have shown, the validity of the patent is not involved in this case. The defendants cannot question it. Although it is technically put in issue by the pleadings, the issue is immaterial. The judgment contains nothing on the subject of title, and the finding on title is not necessary to support it. It secured to the defendants nothing but the exercise of the public rights existing in navigable waters. This judgment is supported by the finding that the bay is navigable, and that the defendants are citizens. The findings upon the immaterial issue, even if erroneous, are not binding upon the plaintiff and do not warrant a reversal of the judgment. Collins v. Gray, 154 Cal. 135, 97 Pac. 142.

[7] A person against whom an action is begun to enjoin him from using navigable water, or other public way, may defend by asserting his public right to do so. He need not, in such a case, show private injury, either to person or property. This is not inconsistent with the well-established rule that if such navigable water or public way is obstructed or closed a private person cannot maintain an action to remove the obstruction or open the way, or to recover damages thereby caused, or to enjoin a threatened obstruction, unless he can show such private injury.

[8] The authorities do not designate the hunting of wild game as an object for the protection and promotion of which the state holds title to and dominion over the tidelands and navigable waters. Nevertheless it is a privilege which is incidental to the public right of navigation. There is no private property right in wild game. The wild animal or bird, not in captivity nor tamed, becomes the property of him who takes or kills it. Any person has the right to take and kill such wild birds or other game in any place where he may find them. He has no lawful right to trespass on the premises of another for that purpose. But wherever he may lawfully go, he may take and kill such game as he may find there, subject, of course, to the restrictions of the game laws. The defendants, therefore, having the right of navigation over these waters, may exercise that right at will as a public right; and if, in doing so, they find game birds thereon they may, during the lawful season, shoot and take them. The plaintiff, of course, has an equal right to the same privilege. If the judgment were to be construed as excluding the plaintiff from this privilege, or as giving defendants the exclusive privilege of hunting thereon, it would be to that extent erroneous. But it is clear that it was not so intended and should not be given such effect. It is to be understood as a declaration that the defendants, in common with the plaintiff and all other persons, have the privilege of hunting on these waters while exercising the public right of navigation over them. It is therefore a correct statement of the rights of the defendants.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

F. P. CUTTING CO. v. PETERSON.
(S. F. 5,762.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 2, 1912.)

1. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 19*)—
GROUND—MISTAKE OF FACT.

A buyer of canned tomatoes refused to accept the prices offered by the seller, unless the seller would guarantee him against the opening prices for that season, to be thereafter fixed by a fruit canneries association; that is, unless the seller would agree to reduce the prices, if necessary, to correspond with the association's prices. The seller agreed to meet the association's general prices, but not any special price made to particular customers, and, under the mutual belief that the association would, as usual, announce such prices by a printed circular, the contract guaranteed the buyer against the opening printed prices of the association. The association made no printed prices for that season, but did fix prices lower than those fixed in the contract. Held, that the word "printed" was inserted in the contract under a mutual mistake in expecting something to happen which did not occur, and that, under Civ. Code, § 3399, authorizing reformation of a contract when, through a mutual mistake of the parties, it does not truly express their intention, the contract would be reformed.

2. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 11*)—
GROUND—MISTAKE OF FACT.

Although the parties to a contract may have used the exact language they intended to use, inserted nothing that they did not intend to insert, and omitted nothing which they intended to insert, or supposed had been inserted, if the language does not express their actual intent, the contract may be reformed to agree with such intent, in view of Civ. Code, § 3401, providing that in revising a written instrument the court may inquire what it was intended to mean, and is not confined to the inquiry what the language of the instrument was intended to be.

3. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 17*)—
GROUND—MISTAKE OF FACT.

Relief from the consequences of a mutual mistake is not confined to cases where the mistake was with reference to a past event, or to the present existence of some fact or thing, but also extends to cases where both parties, by mistake, expect a future event to occur, and describe the subject-matter by words making their intent clear if this event does occur but which defeats the real intention if the event does not occur in the manner expected.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. §§ 69-71; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

4. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 19*)—
MISTAKE OF FACT—MUTUALITY.

Where a buyer refused to accept the seller's prices, unless the seller would reduce them, if necessary, to correspond with the prices fixed by a third person, but, under the mistaken belief that such third person's prices would be announced in printed form, signed a contract by which the seller only agreed to meet the third person's printed prices, the buyer was entitled to reformation, where the third person fixed no printed prices, although the seller did not mistakenly believe that such prices would be printed, since, under Civ. Code, § 3399, a mistake of one party, which the other at the time knew or suspected, justifies a reformation.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by the F. P. Cutting Company against Frank B. Peterson. From an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

Devoto & Richardson, of San Francisco, for appellant. Gerold C. Halsey, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was to recover for the unpaid part of the purchase price of some thousands of cases of canned tomatoes sold and delivered by plaintiff to defendant. The court instructed the jury to render its verdict for the plaintiff in the amount sued for. This the jury did, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial defendant appeals.

[1] Plaintiff is a company engaged in the business of canning fruits and vegetables. Defendant is a wholesale grocer. Plaintiff and defendant entered into a written contract for the sale and delivery of canned tomatoes. These canned tomatoes were "futures"; that is to say, they were yet to be packed. The contract fixed the price per dozen for the different qualities sold, and contained the following provision: "The above prices guaranteed against the California Fruit Canners Association opening printed prices for the season of 1908." It was executed on August 12, 1908, which was a short time before the beginning of what was called the season of 1908. It is over this provision of the contract that the whole controversy is waged. The plaintiff sued for a recovery under the prices named in the contract, averring that the association "did not print any opening printed prices for the season of 1908 on said goods." The defendant for answer alleged that it was mutually understood and mutually agreed between the parties to the contract that the prices fixed in the contract were subject to reduction if it became necessary to meet any prices that might be fixed for the goods mentioned in the contract by the association, and that the language, "the above prices guaranteed against the California Fruit Canneries Association opening printed prices for the season of 1908," was inserted with the mutual intention of the parties that the "guarantee should protect this defendant against any prices which might be made on said goods by said California Fruit Canneries Association for said season of 1908."

Upon the trial, after a prolonged effort on the part of the defendant to introduce evidence of mutual mistake under the allegations of the answer, the court stated that the answer was not sufficient as an application for the correction of a mistake and to enforce the contract as revised and corrected, but that, as the defect could be supplied by an amendment, evidence would be taken to ascertain whether or not there had been such mistake in drawing the contract, with a view to allowing such amendment if the mistake appeared. No objection was made to this course, and the court proceeded to hear the evidence offered on that subject.

At the close of this evidence, the plaintiff moved the court to deny the application to amend the answer and for a reformation of the contract, on the ground that no mistake which could be corrected under the principles of equity was shown by the evidence. The court sustained this motion and refused to allow the defendant to amend the answer, or to proceed further with the proposed defense.

The contention of the defendant was that the phrase "opening printed prices," in the clause above quoted, did not correctly state the meaning which the parties mutually desired to express; that the idea sought by both parties to be expressed was that the Cutting Company would reduce the prices named in the contract, so as to make the selling prices equal to the opening market prices which the California Fruit Canneries Association should fix and declare for the season of 1908, whether the prices so fixed were printed or announced by other methods.

The contention of the plaintiff was that there was no mistake between the parties with respect to the words which were to be inserted in the contract, and that they, in effect, selected the very words used as the best expression of their intention, according to their understanding of the conditions at that time. The evidence showed that there was no mistake in the selection of the words, and it appears that the court below directed the verdict upon the theory that if the mistake was not with respect to the selection of the words to be used there was no mistake shown, within the rule by which courts of equity will reform contracts.

The fact that the parties used the very words which they intended to use is not always sufficient cause for refusing relief of this character. There may be no mistake as to the words used or to be used, and at the same time there may have been a mutual mistake as to some other matter or fact, affecting the meaning or application of the words, and by reason thereof the contract may not truly express the real intention of both parties; and in that case it may be revised and reformed at the instance of the aggrieved party and enforced accordingly, although the words were carefully chosen. Civ. Code, §§ 3399, 3401, 3402. We now state the facts shown by the evidence on this subject.

At the time the contract was made, and for many years prior thereto, the California Fruit Canneries Association had packed so large a part of the canned goods of the state that when it declared its opening prices for such goods all other producers and dealers at once conformed thereto. In other words, that association fixed and controlled the market prices of those goods. It had regularly and habitually in preceding years announced its prices at the opening of the season by printing and distributing generally to the trade a circular containing its established price list for "futures" for that season. The parties to this contract did not personally meet. The contract was negotiated by Mr. Oliphant, a broker, who acted as go-between or mutual agent of the parties, representing the Cutting Company when talking with Peterson, and Peterson when talking with the officers of the Cutting Company. The association had not at that time announced or declared its prices for the coming season; but both parties believed and expected that it would do so in a short time, and that the announcement would be made in the usual manner; that is, by a printed circular distributed to the trade. When the prices named by the Cutting Company were discussed between Oliphant and Peterson, the latter said he would not agree thereto, unless the contract contained a clause guaranteeing him against the opening prices for the season, to be thereafter fixed by said association. By this it was meant and understood by both parties that, if the association's prices were lower than the prices named in the agreement, then the association's prices should be those upon which the sales under the contract should be made. This requirement of Peterson was communicated to the Cutting Company by Oliphant, and that company thereupon agreed that the contract should contain a provision to that effect. The association sometimes made lower prices to particular customers, and the Cutting Company insisted that the guaranty should not extend to such special prices, but only to the general prices fixed. This was agreed to by Peterson. Having thus brought the parties to an agreement, Oliphant drew the contract for the purpose of expressing the agreement so made, and to provide for the guaranty required he inserted the clause above quoted and submitted the contract to both parties. It was satisfactory to both as a correct expression of their intention, and each thereupon signed it.

It is apparent from this evidence that the object to be secured by the clause in question was to put Peterson on an equal footing with other dealers in canned tomatoes, in case the association's opening prices and the general market prices thereby fixed should be less than those named in the contract. The printing of the price list by the association was wholly immaterial to this purpose; but both parties, assuming that such price list would be printed as usual, and desiring to use language that would exclude occasional or special prices as a standard, accepted the words "opening printed prices" as a good description of the standard intended. The words would clearly have accomplished that purpose, if the event had occurred in the manner each expected it would. When the season opened, however, the event proved that the expectation that there would be a printed announcement of association prices was a mistaken one. There can be no doubt from the evidence that this expectation was entertained by both parties; that the mistake in that respect was mutual; and that by reason thereof the contract failed truly to express the intention of the parties.

[2] The case comes clearly within the sections above cited. Section 3399 declares that when, through a "mutual mistake of the parties," a written contract "does not truly express the intention of the parties, it may be revised on the application of the party aggrieved, so as to express that intention." The fact that no word was inserted which the parties did not intend to insert, and none omitted which they did intend to insert, or supposed had been inserted, does not prevent the application of the rule, nor make it any the less a case of mistake. It was the mutual mistake in expecting a thing to happen in the future which did not occur that led to the insertion of the word "printed." This word, if taken literally in connection with the fact that the price list for that season was not printed, would operate to frustrate the real intent. Section 3401 covers this point precisely. It is as follows:

"In revising a written instrument, the court may inquire what the instrument was intended to mean, and what were intended to be its legal consequences, and is not confined to the inquiry what the language of the instrument was intended to be." It was shown that both parties intended the legal consequences of the contract to be that the opening market prices of the season as established by the association should be the prices for which the goods should be sold to Peterson, and that the language chosen to effect that object was so chosen because of the mistake as to the manner of announcing such prices.

[3] We do not understand that relief from the consequences of a mutual mistake is confined to cases where the mistake was with reference to a past event, or to the present existence of some fact or thing. No sound reason appears why the doctrine should not equally apply where both parties by mistake expect a future event to occur and describe the subject-matter by words which make the intent clear if the event does happen as expected, but which defeat the real intent if the event does not happen precisely in the manner expected. We think this case comes clearly within the doctrine.

There was no substantial conflict in the evidence on this subject. The president and secretary of the Cutting Company each testified that the wording of the contract was exactly as he intended it should be, and that he intended to guarantee Peterson precisely as the clause provided. There was no contention that they did not intend this, as they understood the facts and conditions and effect of the words used. This was not the essence of the mistake. Neither of them disputed nor denied that he then expected that the opening prices of the association would be printed as usual, or that he approved the words in consequence of that erroneous belief and expectation.

[4] If they had declared that they did not then expect that the price list would be printed, and that they approved the wording with that idea, it would be a virtual confession that they believed that the guaranty would be nugatory and intended to perpetrate a fraud upon the defendant if a lower price was fixed by the association without printing the price list. The mistake would then come within the class of mistakes described in section 3399 as "a mistake of one party, which the other at the time knew or suspected." The evidence shows that Oliphant informed the Cutting Company's officers that Peterson insisted upon a protection against the possibility of being bound to pay a price higher than the opening prices fixed for the trade generally by the association. They do not deny this evidence. Hence they would be chargeable with knowledge that Peterson expected that the price list would be printed; and if they did not expect the same thing themselves the case would come under the second class of mistakes mentioned in the said section. The use of the word "printed" of itself indicates such expectation. The court below should have allowed the defendant to amend his answer, and, upon the proof made, should have reformed the contract so as to make it express the real intention of the parties. There was evidence to the effect that the association did fix opening prices for that season for the goods in question, and that they were lower than those named in the agreement; the difference making the amount which Peterson refused to pay for the goods delivered. The matter of the reformation of the contract was therefore an important one to the parties, and the judgment is prejudicial to the defendant.

The order is reversed.

In re DONNELLAN'S ESTATE.

TRACY et al. v. REILLY et al. (S. F. 6,079.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 27, 1912.)

1. WILLS (§ 491*)—CONSTRUCTION—QUESTION OF LAW.

The doubt as to the meaning of a will must be resolved by construction, which is a question of law, by application of legal rules governing construction, either to the will alone, or to properly admitted evidence to explain testator's intention.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1058; Dec. Dig. § 491.*]

2. WILLS (§ 400*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—QUESTIONS OF LEGAL CONSTRUCTION.

Where there is a conflict in the extrinsic evidence admitted to explain doubtful language of a will, a determination of the conflict is a finding of fact; and the court, on appeal, will only determine whether or not a wrong construction has been reached in view of the findings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 869-873; Dec. Dig. § 400.*]

3. WILLS (§ 400*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—QUESTIONS OF LEGAL CONSTRUCTION.

Where the extrinsic facts, proved to explain doubtful language in a will, are without conflict, the propriety of the court's application of the facts in its construction of the will is reviewable as a legal proposition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 869-873; Dec. Dig. § 400.*]

4. WILLS (§ 486*)—CONSTRUCTION—EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where extrinsic evidence is admissible to aid in the construction of doubtful language of a will, the evidence is limited to such purpose; and, under Civ. Code, § 1340, it may not show a different intent or a different object from that disclosed by the will itself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1016-1022; Dec. Dig. § 486.*]

5. WILLS (§ 489*)—CONSTRUCTION—EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE.

Where there are two or more persons or things measuring up to the description and conditions of a will or where no person or thing exactly answers the declarations and descriptions, but there are two or more persons or things answering in part, extrinsic evidence is permissible to remove the ambiguity; and in the first case resort is had to determine the person or thing to whom or which the language of the will is to operate, and, where the person or thing has once been determined as a matter of law, the construction follows; and in the second case, where errors in description or designation are found, the construction results in rejecting some part of the designation or description as erroneous and as not expressing testator's intent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1037-1046; Dec. Dig. § 489.*]

6. WILLS (§ 493*)—CONSTRUCTION—NAME—DESCRIPTION.

The court, in construing a will, ambiguous in the designation of a beneficiary named and described, will not prefer the name to the description; but where a correct name is given, coupled with an erroneous description, the person of that name takes, while where there is no one who answers to the name, but there is one who answers to the description, the latter may take.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1077; Dec. Dig. § 493.*]

7. WILLS (§ 493*)—CONSTRUCTION—NAME—DESCRIPTION.

The court, to ascertain whether there is a description in a will which is not consistent with the name of the beneficiary, will consider the whole will, and in such case, the person intended must be ascertained by a consideration of all the circumstances of the case to arrive at testator's intention.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1077; Dec. Dig. § 493.*]

8. WILLS (§ 489*)—CONSTRUCTION—DESIGNATION OF BENEFICIARY—EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE.

Testatrix gave a part of her residuary estate to her "niece Mary, a resident of New York, said Mary being the daughter of my deceased sister Mary, the name of my niece Mary I do not know as I understand she is now married, nor am I sure of niece Mary's maiden name, as her mother, my sister Mary, was twice married, but I believe my niece's maiden name was Mary Donohoe." Testatrix, a native of Ireland, came to the United States, but left in Ireland a sister, Mary, who had two daughters, Annie, who came to the United States and resided in the state of New York, and Mary, who married and continued to live in Ireland. Testatrix left Ireland before either of the daughters of her sister was born, and she had never seen either of them. There was nothing to show that the testatrix knew of more than one niece. She thought that her name was Mary; but she knew that such niece came to the United States and was living in New York. She had written to relatives in Boston to learn the whereabouts of the niece who had come to the United States. Held, that the niece Annie was the niece designated; the words "resident of New York," being the correct description, while the name was erroneous.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Catherine Donnellan, deceased. From a decree of distribution awarding to Mary Smith a part of the residuary estate pursuant to a provision in the will of the deceased, Jane Tracy and others appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Wm. S. McKnight, of San Francisco, for appellants. T. E. K. Cormac and John C. Quinlan, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Catherine Donnellan died testate in the city and county of San Francisco, and her will was there probated. The tenth clause of her will is as follows: "The one-fourth of the rest and residue of my property I will, devise and bequeath to my niece Mary, a resident of New York, said Mary being the daughter of my deceased sister Mary, the name of my niece Mary I do not know as I understand she is now married, nor am I sure of niece Mary's maiden name, as her mother, my sister Mary, was twice married, but I believe my niece's maiden name was Mary Donohoe."

Upon petition for distribution, Annie Sheridan, appellant herein, and Mary Smith, respondent herein, each claimed distribution as the person meant in the paragraph above quoted. The court's decree favored Mary Smith. As has been said Annie Sheridan appeals, and so, also, do certain heirs at law, who insist that the latent ambiguity disclosed to exist in paragraph 10 has not been removed by extrinsic evidence; wherefore the bequest fails and the property descends to them as heirs at law.

The evidence showed that Catherine Donnellan, born Catherine Riley, the testatrix, came to San Francisco from Ireland about 55 years ago, and there died, after the death of her husband, without issue. At the time she left Ireland, she had a sister Mary, who remained in Ireland. This sister, by her marriage to Michael Cook, had two daughters, Annie and Mary. After the death of Cook, she married John Donohoe. The daughter Mary married a man by the name of Smith, and lives in Ireland with the testatrix's brother Thomas Riley. Mary has never been in the United States. The other daughter, Annie, married a man by the name of Sheridan, came to the United States about 25 years ago, and at the date of the will lived and still lives in Brooklyn, state of New York. The testatrix left Ireland before either of the daughters of her sister Mary was born, never saw either of the daughters, and, being unable to write, never personally wrote to either of them. This statement discloses the latent ambiguity and uncertainty as to the person whom the testatrix intended to indicate by the tenth paragraph of her will. Both Mary and Annie were her nieces, both were the daughters of her sister Mary, and both were the stepdaughters of John Donohoe, the second husband of testatrix's sister. If the testatrix intended the niece Mary, then there is a grave error in description; for the niece Mary was never a "resident of New York." If the testatrix meant to designate the niece who was a resident of New York, then that niece was Annie, and not Mary.

Extrinsic evidence was taken, as was proper, to explain this latent ambiguity, and that evidence was this: In May, 1909, testatrix gave instructions to her attorney to draw her will. This he did, and was a witness to it. The testatrix told her attorney that she had a sister named Mary, who had a daughter named Mary; that she did not know where the daughter was. She thought she was in New York. She did not know what her name was. "In fact," concludes Mr. Quinlan in his testimony, "everything that she told me about Mary I concluded in the description as she gave it to me and put it in the will as closely as I could adhere to her general statements to me." Still further the testatrix explained to her attorney that she would not make provision so that another branch of her family, "the Boston Rileys," would take the share allotted to the niece, in the event that Mary could not be found, because "she had made inquiries from the Riley family in Boston as to the whereabouts of this party, and that they had refused to give her information, and she thought that if they were interested in this portion of the estate that they would not make any endeavor to find or locate this person." The further testimony was that Annie was the elder sister; Mary the younger. Thomas Riley, a nephew of the deceased, living in Boston, Mass., testified that he received a letter from the testatrix in her lifetime, which letter was appended to the deposition, and in which the following inquiry was made, "Let me know about my sister Mary's daughter;" that he had written to Catherine Donnellan in answer to this letter, and in so writing wrote about the niece Annie Sheridan, who was the only niece of Catherine Donnellan who ever lived in New York. Annie Sheridan deposes that her father died when she was about six years of age, and at that time the testatrix, living in San Francisco, wanted her (Annie) to come to San Francisco to live with testatrix; that she (Annie) had been called Mary when she first came to America, and had been so called by Margaret Riley, an aunt by marriage at Boston, where she (Annie Sheridan) first lived.

Over objection and exception, the court admitted in evidence from the deposition of Mary Smith the following: "I remember my mother getting a letter from the decedent over 20 years ago, in which she asked my mother to send me out to her home in California, as the decedent stated that all her family were dead." And also the following from the deposition of Thadeus Doyle: "Mary Riley, the deceased [mother of Annie Sheridan and Mary Smith], told me several times that her sister Catherine [the testatrix] was married to a man named Donnellan, and that she received letters from America, and that Catherine Donnellan wanted Mary Riley's daughter, the present Mary Smith, to be sent to her in America." This is, in substance, all of the extrinsic evidence given to relieve from the latent ambiguity and to aid in the construction of the will. It will be noted that it presents absolutely no conflict.

[1-3] It is a fundamental and indisputable proposition that wherever doubt arises as to the meaning of a will, such doubt is resolved by construction, and that construction is one of law. It is an application of legal rules governing construction, either to the will alone, or to properly admitted facts to explain what the testator meant by the doubtful language. In those cases where extrinsic evidence is permissible, there may be a conflict in the extrinsic evidence itself, in which case the determination of that conflict results in a finding of pure fact. But when the facts are thus found, those facts do not solve the difficulty. They still are to be applied to the written directions of the will for the latter's construction, and that construction still remains a construction at law. In such cases, where the evidence of the facts is in conflict, it is permissible for the court, or for the jury, to find the facts; and those findings, under firmly established principles, will not here be disturbed. But the application to the will itself of the facts found, admitted, or established without conflict presents a question of legal construction, which is as purely a question of law as is a construction of the will without resort to extrinsic evidence. Therefore, if the facts have been found by the court upon conflicting evidence, this court, accepting the findings, will still review the construction of the court in probate and determine whether or no a wrong construction at law has been reached. If the facts are admitted or established without conflict, the justness of the application which the court made of those facts in its construction will equally, as a legal proposition, be the subject of review.

[4] Again, it is fundamental that in all cases where extrinsic evidence is admissible to aid in expounding the will the evidence is limited to this single purpose. It is considered for the purpose of explaining and interpreting the language of the will, and is never permitted to show a different intent or a different object from that disclosed, though, perhaps, obscurely, by the language of the will itself. 6 Wigmore, Ev. 2472-2474. So it is declared by section 1340, Civil Code: "When, applying a will, it is found that there is an imperfect description, or that no person or property exactly answers the description, mistakes and omissions must be corrected, if the error appears from the context of the will or from extrinsic evidence; but evidence of the declarations of the testator as to his intentions cannot be received."

[5] Broadly speaking, there are two classes of wills presenting latent ambiguities, for the removal of which ambiguity resort to extrinsic evidence is permissible. The one class is where there are two or more persons or things exactly measuring up to the description and conditions of the will, as "to my niece, daughter of my sister, Jane, residing in Alameda county," when there are two or more nieces, daughters of his sister Jane, so residing; or a devise "of my ranch in Alameda county," when the testator owns two or more ranches in that county. The other class is where no person or thing exactly answers the declarations and descriptions of the will, but where two or more persons or things in part, though imperfectly, do so answer. To this latter class belongs the case under consideration. The very apparent distinction between the two classes is this that in the first class resort is had to extrinsic evidence to determine the person or thing upon whom or which the language of the will is to operate. That person or thing once being determined, as matter of law, the construction follows so much as matter of course that the legal aspect of it is sometimes regarded as negligible. And thus in some cases it is said that under circumstances such as this the court or the jury determination of the intent of the testator is one of fact. Logically this is not true; for always must the intent of the testator be determined by the will itself, and that determination is a conclusion of law. But the person or thing which is the matter in doubt being decided upon as matter of fact, the application of the intent of the will that that person should receive the property, or that the property should go to such a person, presents absolutely no difficulty. For that reason, as has been said, the fact that there still remains to the court the duty of construing the will in this particular is sometimes lost sight of. Thus a will gives a legacy "to my niece, daughter of my sister Jane, in San Francisco." It is disclosed that the testator has a sister Jane, who lives in San Francisco, and who had two nieces. Extrinsic evidence is admitted to show that at the time of the making of the will the sister Jane had but one daughter; that the testator knew this niece; that before the birth of the second niece he departed from the state, was never thereafter in communication with his sister, and did not know of the existence of the second niece. Here the finding of fact would clearly be that the testator had in mind the elder niece. This finding at once removes the only difficulty in the way of construction; but, nevertheless, legally and logically, no matter how simple may be the construction which follows, there is the necessity of construction in the declaration by the court that the testator by his will did bequeath a legacy to the elder niece.

Much more apparent is this legal construction in the second class of cases, where errors in description or designation are found, so that, however the will may be construed, the construction results in rejecting some part of such designation or description. Here, manifestly, the construction is one of law, because it necessarily results in striking from a written instrument some words or phrases contained therein as being erroneous and not expressing the true meaning and intent of the testator. To these propositions, which we think to be very plain, it is unnecessary to do more than cite Taylor v. McCowen, 154 Cal. 798, 99 Pac. 351; Estate of Dominici, 151 Cal. 181, 90 Pac. 448; McKeough's Estate v. McKeough, 69 Vt. 41, 37 Atl. 275; In re Welch's Will, 78 Vt. 16, 61 Atl. 145; 2 Underhill's Law of Wills, § 909 et seq.; 2 Woerner Am. Law of Admin. p. 893; Wigram on Wills (O'Hara's Ed.) 142; Charter v. Charter, 7 H. L. 364; Hiscocks v. Hiscocks, 5 M. & W. 362.

In the case before us the court is called upon to do this precise thing. It becomes its duty to declare, either that the use of "Mary" as the name of the devisee was error, or that the use of the phrase "a resident of New York" is erroneous description, and should therefore be rejected; or, finally, to declare that the doubt raised by the latent ambiguity cannot be resolved, and the devise must lapse. If the name is rejected as error, then the devise is a perfectly clear and intelligible one—"to my niece, a resident of New York, said niece being the daughter of my deceased sister Mary." If the description be rejected, the devise becomes equally clear and intelligible and is "to my niece Mary, said Mary being the daughter of my deceased sister Mary." As has been said, the evidence was without conflict, and the court by its construction adopted the theory that the name controlled, and that the description was erroneous and should therefore be rejected. But if, as respondent implies, the court adopted the maxim "Veritas nominis tollit errorem demonstrationis" as controlling, and the declaration of Redfield that, "where persons are correctly named, any amount of false description will be rejected as surplusage, and even a great degree of certainty will not induce a court to give the devise of a person named to one described, but not named" (Redfield [3d Ed.] 404), it unduly extended the application of the maxim and the meaning of the text-writer.

[6, 7] There is no rule in the construction of wills which prefers a name to a description. The matter is clearly expounded in Theobald on Wills, page 268. He says: "Sometimes a correct name is given, coupled with an erroneous description. There is a person of that name, but no one to whom the description applies. The person of that name takes. 'Veritas nominis tollit errorem demonstrationis.' On the other hand, if there is no one who answers to the name, but there is a person who answers to the description, the latter may take. 'Nihil facit error nominis cum de corpore constat.' There is more difficulty where a person is indicated by name and description, and there is no one who answers both name and description, but there is some one who answers the name and some one who answers the description. For the purpose of ascertaining whether there is a description which is not consistent with the name, the whole will must be looked at. * * * In these cases the person intended must be ascertained by a consideration of all the circumstances of the case. It has been said that 'there are more instances in which the demonstration prevailed than in which the name prevailed.'" See, also, 1 Jarman on Wills (6th Ed.) pp. 379 and 381; Abbott's Trial Evidence, p. 176; Drake v. Drake, 8 H. L. Cas. 172. Thus, if a testator should give a devise "to my nephew John, who is and for many years has been a member of my family," and it should prove that his nephew James, and not John, had been such inmate, it would be ridiculous to allow the name to prevail over the description. In every case the court seeks to arrive at the testator's intent; and the application of general rules are but aids, and sometimes but feeble aids, to that endeavor.

[8] What, then, fairly appears by the uncontradicted evidence in this case? First, that the testatrix knew that she had one niece, the daughter of her sister Mary. Nothing in the evidence from the beginning to the end points to knowledge upon her part of the existence of more than one such niece. Second, she thought this niece's name was Mary; but she knew that the niece whom she had in mind had come to America and was living in New York. She even wrote to her Boston relatives to learn the exact whereabouts of this niece, whom she knew had come to America. All of the evidence of her inquiries concerning the whereabouts of this niece, her refusal to will over to the Boston Rileys the share bequeathed to the niece, in case the niece should not be found, points irresistibly to the conclusion that she had in mind the niece who was in America. All of this evidence is absolutely unexplainable upon the theory that the niece she meant was the one who was living with her mother in Ireland, and who had never left her home. Still less possible is it to explain the theory that Mary was meant, if credit be given to the hearsay evidence admitted by the court; for, whatever else that evidence shows, it establishes knowledge upon the part of the testatrix that Mary was not and had not been in America, because she desired Mary to come to America. Again, it appears affirmatively that the testatrix did know that her niece was in America, and (bearing in mind that she knew of the existence of but one niece) it further appears that she wrote to the Boston Rileys to learn the exact whereabouts of the niece in America. Balancing, then, the probabilities of error, and considering that Mary was the mother's name, and the name which it would not be unlikely her daughter would bear, it appears to us that the inference that the niece in America, the one "resident in New York," was intended is overwhelming, and that the error was an error in name and not in description. Rejecting from the consideration the evidence above quoted, which, without question, was improperly admitted, and the inference becomes well-nigh irresistible.

[9, 10] Treating, for a moment, the evidence improperly admitted. The first is the declaration of the niece Mary, as follows: "I remember my mother getting a letter from the decedent over 20 years ago, in which she asked my mother to send me out to her home in California, as the decedent stated that all her family were dead." The witness purported to give the contents of a written instrument—a letter—without proof either of the destruction of the letter, or that the deponent had ever herself read the letter. The second is the declaration of Thadeus Doyle, also as to the contents of letters, whose destruction was not proved, which Doyle never asserts that he read, and the contents of which he was testifying to upon statements of those contents made to him by another. Here was hearsay upon hearsay, and it needs no citation of authority to support the statement that such evidence was inadmissible.

Finally, it should be added, as to the appeal of those contending that the devise lapses because the ambiguity is not removed by parol evidence, that what this court has already said is a declaration that the extrinsic evidence is sufficiently explicit to solve the ambiguity and points to the niece Annie as the one meant by the testatrix.

Therefore the appeal is sustained, and in the indicated particulars the decree is reversed, with directions to the trial court that if there be no other or further evidence presented upon the rehearing of the matter section 10 of the will shall be construed to apply to and to mean the niece Annie.

SBARBORO et al. v. JORDAN, Secretary of State. (S. F. 6,346.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 4, 1912.)

1. ELECTIONS (§ 131*)—DELEGATES TO CONVENTIONS—POWERS OF.

A delegate regularly elected to a political convention may vote any way he pleases on any question, whatever might be his motive, without affecting his legal right to remain therein.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. § 120; Dec. Dig. § 131.*]

2. UNITED STATES (§ 25*)—NOMINATION OF PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS—FILING OF CERTIFICATES—POWERS OF DELEGATES TO POLITICAL CONVENTIONS.

Where a convention of a political party is regularly called and organized, its nominees and not those of a convention made up of a minority of the delegates, who withdrew from the regular convention, are entitled to have their certificates filed by the Secretary of State, although the delegates repudiated the actions and platform of the national convention and nominated as candidates for the office of presidential electors men who were pledged to vote against the nominees of the national convention.

In Bank. Original application by Andrea Sbarboro and others for writ of mandate to issue against Frank C. Jordan, as Secretary of State. Denied.

Clayberg & Rose and Samuel M. Shortridge, all of San Francisco, Leroy A. Wright, of San Diego, and Walter R. Bacon, of San Francisco, for petitioners. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an application by A. Sbarboro and 12 others for a writ of mandate requiring the Secretary of State to place their names on the general election ticket to be used at the general election on November 5, 1912, as the candidates of the "Republican party" for electors of President and Vice President of the United States, and to omit from said ticket the names of 13 other persons who claim to be and whose names have been certified to said Secretary of State as the candidates of such Republican party for such office. The Secretary of State, it is alleged, will place the names of such other persons on such ticket as such candidates, instead of the names of these petitioners, unless this court orders otherwise. The facts upon which petitioners rely are fully set forth in their petition, and the question is whether upon these facts they are entitled to the relief sought.

Under our law for the nomination of candi-

dates for electors of President and Vice President of the United States by political parties (Stats. 1911, Ex. Sess. p. 83), the candidates of any such party at the next election are required to be nominated by a convention composed of the so-called "hold-over" state senators belonging to such party, and the nominees of such party for state senator and assemblyman throughout the state, selected at the direct primary election of such party held on September 3, 1912. Such a convention of the "Republican party" was held at the time and place appointed by the law therefor, 114 persons participating therein as members. It is not disputed that all the persons attending said convention and participating as members in its proceedings were entitled under the law to which we have referred to participate therein as members; each of them being either a "holdover" senator elected as and registered as a member of the "Republican party" or a nominee of such party for senator or assemblyman. We say this is not disputed; for, although it is alleged that of the 114 persons participating as members in said convention, only 13 were "Republicans" and the remaining 101 were not affiliated with the Republican party, and were mere intruders in the convention, it is subsequently alleged that each of said 114 persons who were nominees for the senate and assembly (being 100 of the 114) were nominated at the primary election held September 3, 1912, as Republicans, and that each had duly made and filed the affidavit required by law in which he stated that the name of his party is the Republican party, and that he intended to affiliate with said Republican party and vote for a majority of the candidates of said party at the next ensuing general election. There is no pretense that the same is not true as to the 14 "holdover" senators participating. Each and all of those participating were qualified to participate in the convention as Republicans, so far as any test prescribed by the law is concerned. The sole basis of any claim that 101 of the persons participating as members of said convention were not affiliated with the Republican party, and were disqualified from acting as members of the convention, is substantially that as members of such convention they repudiated the action of the convention of the national Republican party held at Chicago in June of this year by adopting a resolution directly and positively repudiating the platform and nominees of such national Republican convention, and declaring it to be their intent and purpose to support the national platform and candidates of a new party known as the Progressive party, and by nominating as candidates for electors of President and Vice President of the United States persons pledged in the event of their election to vote for the nominees of said Progressive party for President and Vice President of the United States. Such a resolution was, in fact, adopted by the votes of said 101 members, against the protest of the remaining 13 members, and by the vote of the same 101 members, 13 candidates for elector of President and Vice President of the United States were nominated as the candidates of the Republican party for that office, who are pledged to vote against the nominees of the national Republican party for President and Vice President. The 13 protesting members thereupon organized as a convention, claiming to be the only rightful members of the Republican convention called for by the law, adopted a platform ratifying the platform adopted by the national Republican convention at Chicago, and nominated these petitioners as the Republican candidates for electors of President and Vice President.

No question is raised by this proceeding as to the constitutionality of the statute prescribing the manner of nomination by political parties of candidates for elector of President and Vice President of the United States. The petitioners seek the relief asked by them solely as the alleged nominees of the convention provided for by such statute. They set forth no other alleged source of right or title as candidates of the Republican party for such office, and they do not allege any matter entitling them to oppose the printing on the general election ticket of the names of the other set of nominees of said convention, as the candidates of the Republican party, in the event that they, petitioners, are not the rightful nominees under said statute. For all the purposes of this proceeding, then, the statute must be regarded as being free from objection on the ground of violation of any constitutional provision.

[1] Assuming the statute to be in all respects valid, we are satisfied that the petitioners cannot prevail in this proceeding. There is no ground for holding that any member of the convention lost his legal right to participate therein by reason of his attitude or vote on any question coming before the convention. Each member measured fully up to the statutory requirements for election to the convention and participation in the proceedings thereof, and his legal right to continue therein as a member to the adjournment of the convention could not be affected by his attitude or vote on any question, whatever might be his motive therein. In this respect he occupied no different position in principle from that occupied by a delegate to a nominating convention under our old system of nomination of candidates.

[2] As to such a convention, we have direct authority in this state, in the case of Hutchinson v. Brown, 122 Cal. 189, 54 Pac. 738, 42 L. R. A. 232. A state convention of the People's party, then a regular political party of this state, had been regularly called and convened for the nomination of candidates of such party for state officers. There were about 160 delegates actually present. By a majority vote a plan of fusion with the Democratic and Silver Republican parties was agreed upon, and Judge James G. Maguire, a Democrat, was nominated as the People's party candidate for Governor. Fifty-three delegates protested against this proceeding, and withdrew and at once organized another convention as the real People's party convention and nominated a full state ticket. The majority completed their ticket. Each faction presented its ticket for filing to the Secretary of State as the regular People's party ticket, and the question before this court was, which was entitled to be filed as the ticket of the People's party? It was unanimously held that the ticket nominated by the majority of such convention was the regular People's party ticket, and it was said, among other things, Chief Justice Beatty writing the opinion: "It is conceded that both certificates are regular in form, duly authenticated, and that all the conditions of the statute relative to their presentation have been fully complied with. The only question is, Which emanated from the regular and authorized convention of the party? Upon this point we are satisfied that the respondent erred in his conclusion. It is clear that the full convention was regularly called and organized, and that only about one-third of its members withdrew after the nomination of Judge Maguire. The withdrawal of a minority of the delegates present did not dissolve the convention or destroy its identity. It remained as before, the people's convention, with full authority to nominate a ticket to be voted for at the election. The fact—if it be a fact—that some or all of the delegates who remained were violating pledges or sacrificing party interests in nominating Judge Maguire and adopting the plan of fusion presents a question with which neither the Secretary of State nor the court has the slightest concern. That is a matter to be settled between them and their constituents. Delegates to political conventions are no doubt trustees in a large sense of the word, but they discharge a trust with which the courts do not meddle. They obey or disobey instructions as they see fit, and the only remedy for their disobedience is the censure of the people expressed at the polls. This is true, at least so far as the ballot law is concerned. All the filing officer has to determine is whether the certificate offered for his acceptance emanates from the regular convention of the party. It is no concern of his whether the delegates to the convention have nominated members of their own party or of other parties, whether the nominees are there to stay or to be taken down." The italics are ours.

The views thus announced are applicable here, and they obviously dispose of petitioners' application. They are not the nominees of the Republican party convention for electors, but are simply the choice of a minority thereof, the 13 others whose names they seek to prevent respondent from placing on the ticket having been legally nominated by a majority vote of such convention as the candidates of the Republican party of this state for that office.

For the reasons stated, the court from the bench ordered that the application for a writ of mandate be denied.

An agreement between a corporation and a director that the latter should purchase stock at public sale for nonpayment of assessments if no other bidder should offer the amount of the assessments, costs, and charges, that he should hold the stock in trust for the corporation and should pay assessments thereon, and that the corporation would repay his expenditures, with interest, is absolutely void because in violation of Civ. Code, §§ 343, 344, providing that a corporation purchasing its stock for want of bidders at a sale for nonpayment of assessments must transfer the stock to it on its books and the amount of the costs, assessments, and charges must be credited on the books as paid in full, and the stock, while remaining the property of the corporation, is nonassessable, etc., and because contrary to public policy as declared by the statutes.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; John G. Covert, Judge.

Action by the Lemoore Canal & Irrigation Company against Emma E. McKenna, as executrix of Richard E. McKenna, deceased. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Houghton & Houghton, of San Francisco, for appellant. F. J. Walker, of Lemoore, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Appeal from the judgment entered after a demurrer to plaintiff's amended complaint had been sustained without leave to amend further. The action was one to declare a trust in defendant's decedent, and in defendant as his executrix, and to enforce such trust by the transfer to the Lemoore Canal & Irrigation Company of one-half of a share of its own stock, upon payment to Richard E. McKenna's estate, with interest, of the amount expended in the purchase of the said stock and in assessments thereon. According to the allegations of the complaint, the one-half share of stock which is now sought by the plaintiff corporation was duly sold in January, 1907, because of the failure of the owner to pay a certain assessment. McKenna, who was then, and until a short time prior to his death in July, 1908, a director of the corporation plaintiff, bought the stock. The really important allegations of the complaint are all upon information and belief. "It was understood and agreed," according to the complaint, by and between the Lemoore Canal & Irrigation Company, its board of directors, and said R. E. McKenna, that he should purchase the stock at the public sale, if no other bidder should offer the amount of assessment, costs, and charges due thereon; that he should hold it in trust for the plaintiff corporation; that he should pay the assessments thereon; that the corporation pledged itself to repay his expenditures in that behalf, together with interest; and that said McKenna accepted the trust. It appears that several assessments had been paid by McKenna in his lifetime and by his executrix after his death before the corporation did anything toward enforcing the alleged trust in its favor.

[1] Conceding, without deciding, that allegation upon information and belief of essential facts which should be peculiarly within the knowledge of the plaintiff is sufficient, still the complaint falls far short of stating a cause of action. The trust which plaintiff seeks to enforce is one which the directors of the Lemoore Canal & Irrigation Company were powerless to create, and was, moreover, one in violation of sound public policy.

[2] The powers given to corporations with reference to their own stock are purely statutory. Section 343 of the Civil Code provides what must be done after the purchase of stock for the corporation by its president, secretary, or a member of its board of directors. The amount of the costs, assessments, and charges must be credited upon the books of the corporation as paid in full. The stock must be transferred to the corporation on its books; and finally the stock, while it remains the property of the corporation, is nonassessable. According to the complaint, all of these provisions were violated. The stock was reissued to McKenna in his own name, assessments were levied against it, and we must assume, wanting averment upon that subject, that no transfer of the stock to itself was made but that the corporation's books correctly showed the issuance of the one-half share to the purchaser individually. Confronted with these matters, plaintiff declares that, even conceding the violation of the law by its directors, the defendant should be declared a trustee de son tort holding the stock for the benefit of the stockholders. This might be true if the directors had merely acted in violation of a directory statute, but the attempted trust was absolutely void. The provisions of section 343, Civil Code, are not merely directory, but are themselves the measure of the corporation's power to acquire its own stock sold for failure to pay assessments. Hence the alleged contract was void as being in violation of express statute. It was further void as against public policy.

[3] The very purpose of section 343, Civil Code, is to prevent boards of directors from continuing themselves in power by secret manipulation of the stock through trustees. If such were not the object of that statute a board of directors might secretly purchase, through a trustee, enough stock to give them, when added to that openly theirs, the balance of power whereby they might accomplish their own selfish ends, and then, having enjoyed the positive voting strength of the stock held in trust, in disobedience not only to the provisions of section 343, but also of section 344 of the Civil Code, by giving such stock equal value with that of other owners in fixing the majority necessary to control a stockholders' meeting, they might repurchase the stock from the trustee with the corporation's moneys. It is no answer to this conclusion to say that no such sinister use of the stock appears here. We are dealing with the policy of the law which makes contracts like that set forth in this pleading absolutely void. The law looks to the tendency of such an agreement, not to the results in a given case.

[4] The statement of the existence of a contract between the corporation and McKenna is not sufficient. An averment upon information and belief that there is an "understanding and agreement" between a corporation and one of its directors that the latter shall hold certain stock in trust is about as tenuous as a pleading well could be. The only method by which a corporation reaches an "understanding" is by the legal action of its duly authorized officials. No such action is pleaded. A complaint alleging the bare conclusion that there is such "understanding" in existence is not sufficient. The judgment is affirmed.

Gibson, Trask, Dunn & Crutcher, of Los Angeles (Edward E. Bacon, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant in No. 2,774 and for respondent in No. 2,764. J. W. McKinley, of Los Angeles, for respondent in No. 2,774 and for appellant in No. 2,764.

MELVIN, J. These are actions to foreclose two certain mortgages. Judgments in favor of the plaintiff were rendered in the trial court, but the court declined to include in said judgments a certain amount claimed on account of advances made by plaintiff for taxes, street assessments, insurance, and the like due upon the mortgaged premises. Defendant's appeal is from the judgments and from an order denying her motion for a new trial. Plaintiff appeals from that part of the judgments which is unfavorable to his claim for advances.

The whole controversy with respect to defendant's appeal has reference to the alleged bar of the statute of limitations. On November 20, 1888, Jane M. Phillips and Charles M. Phillips, her husband, executed a note in favor of plaintiff, Thomas W. Phillips, a brother of said Charles, for $5,000 secured by a mortgage on certain realty in Los Angeles county described as "lots numbered ten (10), eleven (11), and the south half of lot seven (7), all in block 'P' San Pasqual tract, lands of the Lake Vineyard Land & Water Association, as per map of said San Pasqual tract as the same is recorded in book 3, page 315, Miscellaneous Records of Los Angeles County, California." The note was by its terms made payable on or before two years after date. Later, another note supported by a mortgage was executed by the same parties for $14,000. This note and the mortgage were both dated September 30, 1893, but were in reality executed somewhat later. The complaint alleged a written agreement between the parties also dated September 30, 1893, whereby plaintiff promised not to enforce the collection of either of these obligations for at least a period of 10 years, and not even then to commence foreclosure proceedings unless the real and personal property of Charles M. and Jane M. Phillips should at that time be of a value of more than $60,000 above the indebtedness evidenced by the said notes and mortgages, and that, if at the end of 10 years from the date of the execution of the agreement of forbearance the wealth of the mortgagors should fall below the value indicated, then a further period of 5 years was to be allowed for the payment of the debt, at the end of which time, if the property of the mortgagors was still insufficient to leave them at least $60,000 after the full satisfaction of the notes and mortgages, then only so much of the debt was to be collected as would allow Mr. and Mrs. Charles M. Phillips to retain $60,000 worth of real and personal property.

The uncontradicted evidence shows that in 1893 Charles M. Phillips visited his brother, the plaintiff herein, at the latter's home in Pennsylvania. At that time Charles and his wife were indebted to the plaintiff in a sum exceeding $16,000, $5,000 of which was secured by one of the mortgages here in suit. The remainder of it was unsecured, $8,000 of the indebtedness being represented by the promissory note of Charles M. Phillips and his wife payable to the wife of Thomas W. Phillips. While Charles M. Phillips was at his brother's home, the agreement of forbearance was drawn in duplicate, was signed by plaintiff, and one copy thereof was delivered by him to Charles M. Phillips, among whose papers it was found after the latter's death in 1908. The agreement, which was signed by plaintiff only, was in the form of a contract between him as party of the first part and Charles M. and Jane M. Phillips, as parties of the second part. It recites the execution of the note and mortgage of even date to secure the sum of $14,000, and the prior note and mortgage for $5,000, but states that of the larger note only $11,000 had been actually paid; the balance being for future advancements. The considerations mentioned for the execution of the contract of forbearance are one dollar and "brotherly love and affection." On the return of Charles M. Phillips to California, he and his wife executed the note and mortgage for $14,000, dating it September 30, 1893. In the three years succeeding such execution plaintiff advanced to defendant and her husband sums aggregating the $3,000 necessary to make up the principal sum of the note, and thereafter continued to make further loans to them. The complaint contains the allegation that at the expiration of the 15 years contemplated by the contract of forbearance the property of Mrs. Jane M. Phillips exceeded by more than $60,000 her indebtedness to plaintiff, but that it had not been worth that much money when the 10-year period was completed. Defendant did not deny the alleged value of her possessions at the time of the ending of the period of 15 years. On the contrary, she alleged that on September 30, 1903, 10 years after the date of the contract of forbearance, she possessed property worth more than $60,000 above the debts secured by the mortgages in suit, but as no oral testimony was adduced with reference to this matter, as her allegation was on information and belief, and as plaintiff's positive averments that on September 30, 1903, the combined wealth of his brother and Mrs. Jane M. Phillips was less than $60,000 in excess of the mortgage debts, while on September 30, 1908, his brother's widow was possessed of more than that amount of property, stand without contradiction, it follows that the finding of the court in favor of plaintiff on this subject is fully supported.

Appellant advances three general statements for our consideration. These are that (1) the agreement dated September 30, 1893, never became effective because not signed by the parties of the second part; (2) said agreement was void because executed without consideration; and (3) knowledge of the existence of said supposed agreement had never been brought home to defendant by the proof in this case. From these premises defendant concludes that the agreement of September 30, 1893, never suspended the operation of the statute of limitations, and that, therefore, the bar of said statute is available as a defense in this action.

[1] It is not disputed that the note for $8,000 was surrendered to Charles M. Phillips for himself and his wife, and that with that note in his possession, as well as with plaintiff's written agreement to make further advances and to extend the time for the enforcement of the mortgage liens, defendant's husband returned from Pennsylvania to California. Very shortly thereafter he and his wife executed the note and mortgage for $14,000. Defendant probably had opportunity to see the contract as her husband kept it until the time of his death. But, even if she never actually saw it, she was charged, under the circumstances, with knowledge of it and its contents. The land in question was her separate property. This is alleged in the complaint, is not denied in the answer, and is found by the court to be true. Therefore in the negotiations with his brother her husband acted as her ostensible agent. While they lived together in Pasadena her husband continued to borrow money from his brother, and to apply it to the payment of debts standing against this land. The unchallenged evidence shows that she, with her husband, executed a mortgage for more money than she had then received, and this mortgage was antedated to correspond with a date when Charles M. Phillips was at his brother's home in Pennsylvania. Surely these facts would put her on her inquiry. By asking she would then have learned from her husband, who had acted as her agent, that the mortgage was given in part for future advances and that the mortgagee had formally agreed to postpone for a term of years the collection of the indebtedness secured by the mortgages. Having knowledge of circumstances which were sufficient to put a prudent person upon inquiry she had constructive notice of the existence of the agreement of September 30, 1893. Section 19, Civ. Code.

[2] Where such constructive notice exists as that which appears from the facts proven in this action, the party who received such notice is held to have ratified the acts of an assumed agent. Ballard v. Nye, 138 Cal. 594, 72 Pac. 156.

[3] Neither in her pleading nor at the trial did defendant assert ignorance of the agreement of forbearance or of its contents. She denied in her answer on information and belief that plaintiff made, executed, or delivered to herself and her husband the agreement in question, but positively denied that plaintiff delivered it to her or to her and Charles M. Phillips at her request. These allegations do not amount to a denial that the document was delivered to her husband acting for her, and therefore in law to both of them, nor do such averments negative in any way the presumption of her full knowledge of the transaction.

[4] Aside from all questions regarding the consideration for the contract of forbearance and the sufficiency of its execution, defendant is prevented from setting up the bar of the statute of limitations upon clear principles of estoppel. She accepted the benefits of the contract. Her actions and those of her husband, as her agent, lulled the plaintiff into assumed security and caused him to postpone foreclosure until the expiration of the period mentioned in the agreement. Consequently she cannot now pursue the advantage ordinarily available to a litigant under the statute of limitations. Smith v. Lawrence, 38 Cal. 27, 99 Am. Dec. 344; State Loan & Trust Co. v. Cochran, 130 Cal. 249, 62 Pac. 466, 600; Quanchi v. Ben Lomond Wine Co., 17 Cal. App. 565, 120 Pac. 427 (No. 870), decided by the District Court of Appeal for the First District, November 29, 1911.

[5] We pass now to a consideration of plaintiff's appeal. The later of the two mortgages securing the note for $14,000, dated September 30, 1893, contained the following provision: "And the mortgagors promise to pay said note according to the terms and conditions thereof, and in case of default in payment of the same, or of any installment of interest thereof, when due, the mortgagee may foreclose this mortgage and may include in such foreclosure a reasonable counsel fee to be fixed by the court together with all payments made by the mortgagee for taxes and assessments on said premises excepting taxes on the interest of the mortgagee therein by reason of this mortgage." The complaint alleged, the evidence showed, and the court found that plaintiff, at the request of his brother, had sent to Charles M. Phillips various sums of money aggregating about $3,400 for payment of taxes and assessments on the mortgaged premises, and that with such amounts so sent the claims against the property had been discharged. Notwithstanding these findings, the court concluded that plaintiff could not recover for such advances and the judgment was entered accordingly. The only question presented by plaintiff's appeal, therefore, is whether or not the findings show payment by him of the taxes and assessments according to the tenor of the mortgage. Plaintiff does not assert that he actually made the payments and received the tax receipts. He insists that his brother acted as his agent in settling these matters,

We think this theory is correct. It is true that plaintiff, who was evidently very generous to his brother, often sent money to the latter for the payment of household expenses, cost of maintaining the property and other debts, exacting no security for such advances, and it was doubtless the conclusion of the lower court that the amounts of money forwarded by Thomas W. Phillips for the settlement of taxes and the like differed in no respect from these other loans, but we must remember that in each instance Charles M. Phillips requested an advance of money from his brother to pay the taxes or assessments due. Thomas W. Phillips advanced the money in response to such request, and Charles M. Phillips on receipt of the necessary amount applied it to the intended purpose. Such request and such compliance with it made Charles M. Phillips his brother's agent and charged him with the duty of executing his undertaking to apply the money when received to the settlement of the particular indebtedness for which it was sent. We see no difference between each of these transactions and the payment of the obligations through a third person having no interest in the mortgaged property. If Thomas W. Phillips had sent the money to such an agent, and that person had obeyed instructions, no one would question that payment was made according to the tenor of the mortgage by plaintiff through his agent. Therefore we are of the opinion that the superior court erroneously reached a contrary conclusion. The fact that Jane M. Phillips is not shown by the record to have been cognizant of these payments is not material. The mortgage does not provide that notice should be given to either of the mortgagors in case the taxes or assessments were paid by the mortgagee.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed, except that that part of the judgment from which plaintiff appeals is reversed with instructions to the court below to amend its conclusions of law in accordance with the view above expressed.

On Rehearing.

MELVIN, J. By the petition for rehearing it has been brought to our attention that the evidence and the findings are uncertain in this, that it cannot be determined therefrom how much of the amounts paid by Thomas W. Phillips was applied to taxes upon the mortgagor's interest and what part went to the payment of his own taxes as mortgagee. Let the opinion heretofore rendered be amended therefore by striking out the final paragraph and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

It does not appear, however, from the evidence, nor consequently from the findings, what portion of the moneys advanced by Thomas W. Phillips for taxes was applied to the payment of taxes upon the interest of the mortgagee and it is fair to conclude from the evidence that some part of it was used for that purpose, because his brother Charles, who was acting for him with reference to these matters, always in his requests for money to pay taxes referred to "our taxes." This matter is easily capable of solution and the case should be therefore retried upon these issues (after amendment of the pleadings if found necessary by the trial court) so that findings may be entered based upon evidence showing the exact amounts of the taxes and assessments on the property correctly chargeable to Jane M. Phillips under the terms of the mortgage, duly "excepting taxes on the interest of the mortgagee therein."

The judgment and order from which defendant appeals are affirmed. The judgment from which plaintiff appeals is reversed with instructions to the superior court to retry the issues mentioned in the last preceding paragraph hereof in the manner there indicated.

SUISUN LUMBER CO. v. FAIRFIELD SCHOOL DIST. (Civ. 967.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 5, 1912. On Petition for Rehearing, Oct. 5, 1912.)

1. JUDGMENT 551*)—BAR OF CAUSES OF ACTION—IDENTITY OF CAUSES OF ACTION.

A judgment in an action at law, brought by a subcontractor after filing a notice of lien as provided in Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, against the general contractor, a school district, and its trustees to recover a sum claimed to be due from the general contractor and enforce payment thereof by the school district by reason of the failure of its trustees to require the contractor to give a bond, was a bar to a subsequent action against the school district alone to enforce the subcontractor's lien for the same debt involved in the first action.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 584*)—BAR OF CAUSES OF ACTION—IDENTITY OF PARTIES—"SAME PARTIES."

A judgment for or against a party will operate as a bar to another action against him alone, although other parties were joined with him in the first action and the subject-matter of the action adjudicated as to all such parties, the phrase "the same parties" in connection with the rule of res adjudicata not meaning that all the parties plaintiff and defendant to the first action must be joined in the later action to render the plea of estoppel available, but where the action is against a number of defendants and the merits litigated and adjudicated as to all, and the same plaintiff subsequently proceeds against one, the later action being between the "same parties" within the meaning of the rule.

3. JUDGMENT (§ 551*)—BAR OF CAUSES OF ACTION—IDENTITY OF CAUSES OF ACTION.

A judgment in an action at law may be pleaded as a bar to a subsequent suit in equity; the subject-matter of the action and not the form of the remedy being the test determinative of the applicability of the plea of res adjudicata.

5. JUDGMENT (§§ 592, 713*)—BAR OF CAUSES OF ACTION—MATTERS CONCLUDED.

Where a matter is the subject of litigation in and adjudication by a court, the parties, except under special circumstances, must bring forward their whole case, and will not be permitted to bring a new action in respect to matter which might have been brought forward in the first action, but which was omitted through negligence, inadvertence, or accident, the plea of res adjudicata applying except in special cases, not only to points on which the court was required by the parties to form an opinion and pronounce a judgment, but to every point which belonged to the subject of the litigation and which the parties, by exercising reasonable diligence, might have brought forward in the first action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by the Suisun Lumber Company against the Fairfield School District. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Appeal from judgment dismissed, and order denying new trial reversed on rehearing.

W. U. Goodman, of Fairfield, for appellant. T. T. C. Gregory, of Fairfield, and Theodore W. Chester, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HART, J. The defendant, through its board of trustees, entered into a written contract with one C. C. Foy on the 4th day of January, 1908, for the construction of a grammar school building, for the sum of $16,000 in cash and the old school building at the agreed value of $1,000. Under the stipulations of the contract said building was to be completed by the 1st day of August, 1908. The plaintiff prior to the 21st day of September, 1908, furnished the said Foy certain materials which, according to the averments of the complaint, "were to be used and were used in the construction of the school-house building described in the said contract, and on the said date there was due and unpaid from the said C. C. Foy to the plaintiff the sum of $2,400.28 for the materials furnished as aforesaid." On the said 21st day of September, 1908, so the complaint alleges and the evidence shows, "the plaintiff delivered to and served on the said Fairfield school district, and on each of said trustees personally, a certain written notice" in accordance with the following provision of section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure: " * * * Any of the persons mentioned in section eleven hundred and eighty-three, except the contractor, may at any time give to the reputed owner a written notice that they have performed labor or furnished materials, or both, to the contractor, or other person acting by authority of the reputed owner, or that they have agreed to do so, stating in general terms the kind of labor or materials, and the name of the person to or for whom the same was done or furnished, or both, and the amount in value, as near as may be, of that already done or furnished, or both, and of the whole agreed to be done or furnished, or both. * * *" This action is prosecuted by plaintiff under the authority of the foregoing provision of the section of the Code mentioned. The answer, in addition to specific denials of the averments of the complaint, sets up a number of special defenses, among which is the following, using the language of the answer: "And answering further the complaint of plaintiff, and as a further and separate defense, defendant alleges that on or about the 27th day of October, 1908, the said plaintiff commenced an action in the above-entitled court against the Fairfield school district, in the county of Solano, state of California, Roy D. Smith, James N. Watson, James Lackie, and C. C. Foy, defendants, which action was for the same cause of action as that set forth in the complaint herein; that on the 30th day of March, 1909, at Fairfield, in said action commenced as aforesaid, and for the same cause of action as set forth in the complaint herein, a judgment was duly given, made, and entered, a copy of which judgment is hereto attached, marked Exhibit 'A' and made a part hereof, to which judgment reference is hereby made; that said judgment has never been appealed from and is still in full force and effect." Smith, Watkins, and Lackie, mentioned as defendants in the action referred to in the foregoing allegations of the answer, were, at the time said action was instituted and tried and judgment rendered and entered therein, members of and constituted the board of trustees of the defendant.

The other special defenses pleaded in the answer are that the plaintiff, prior to the commencement of its action, at no time presented to the defendant its alleged claim against the district, "or any claim based upon the items set forth in said complaint; that at no time has the said plaintiff ever presented to said district in the manner and form required by law an itemized statement of any amount due from said district to plaintiff"; that the plaintiff prior to the 21st day of September, 1908, being unable to complete the building described in the contract, sublet, with the consent of the district, the contract for painting said building and the contract for furnishing and installing blackboards therein to other parties, named in the answer; that said last referred to parties completed said work, and that Foy assigned to them, in the respective amounts to which they were entitled for said work, his claim under said contract for the money due for said work; that said assigned claims, with other like assignments for other work done by other parties, were presented to and accepted by said school district before the 21st day of September, 1908, and that "there was nothing due, owing, or unpaid to said C. C. Foy from the said Fairfield school district on the said 21st day of September, 1908; that the payment of said assigned claims exhausted the funds of said district which it had on hand for the construction of said building." The court's findings are adverse to all the material claims made by the defendant and, accordingly, judgment was rendered and entered in favor of the plaintiff. This appeal is by the defendant from said judgment and the order denying it a new trial.

[1] We think that the plea and proof of the judgment in the former action, instituted by the plaintiff upon the claim upon which it declares in this action, constitute a complete and conclusive bar to its right to maintain the present action. It will therefore be unnecessary to consider at length other points made by the appellant, although we are convinced, from a careful examination of the record, that the findings of the court that Foy completed the building, according to the terms of his contract, before the 21st day of September, 1908, and that he was personally paid money on the contract after the service of the notice prescribed by section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, are not supported by the evidence. The undisputed testimony of Foy discloses that he did not so complete the building, and that he himself never did complete it. The evidence without conflict further shows that Foy having discovered before the 21st day of September, 1908, that he would be unable to carry out the terms of the contract, according to the plans and specifications by which the building was to be erected and completed, so announced to the board of trustees of the defendant. Without passing upon the competency of the evidence by which arrangements were entered into with others to do certain work called for by Foy's contract, we feel warranted in saying that none can read the record without being forced to this conclusion: That Foy practically abandoned the contract prior to the 21st day of September, 1908, and that the board of trustees of the defendant thereupon, with the voluntary acquiescence of Foy, entered into contracts with others for the completion of the portions of the contract left uncompleted by Foy; that at the meeting of the board of trustees at which the claims were allowed for the work so performed—that is, for the work by the "subcontractors"—Foy and said subcontractors were present by the request of the board, in order that Foy might immediately by his own act approve the allowance of the claims to said subcontractors. In other words, since the contract for erecting the building was with Foy and in his name, the board conceived it to be legally necessary to allow the claims in Foy's name, although he was not entitled to them, and therefore as a matter of protection to itself or against the probability of being required to pay said claims the second time insisted upon the presence of all the parties, so that Foy, upon the allowance of the claims, might immediately assign the same to the subcontractors, who were the real owners thereof. This is precisely what was done at said meeting; Foy at no time laying any claim to the claims so allowed by the board and by him assigned to the "subcontractors." Objection was made to the testimony from which the foregoing facts are reasonably deducible upon the ground that it was incompetent, and the court reserved its rulings on many of the questions so objected to until the argument of the case upon the merits. It is probable that the court finally concluded that the testimony thus allowed was not competent, and therefore did not consider it in making its findings. But, assuming such to be the case, the question whether the court thus committed prejudicial error need not, as stated, be inquired into, in view of the conclusion at which we have arrived as to the effect of the pleaded judgment in the former action upon the right of the plaintiff to maintain the present action.

The judgment roll in the former action was introduced and received in evidence. It is expressly admitted by counsel for the respondent that said action was instituted on the 27th day of October, 1908—subsequent to the date of the service of the notice on the defendant under section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Although the defendant here and the members of its board of trustees were, with the contractor, made defendants in the former action, and although the first of the two distinct causes of action set up in the complaint in said action was for damages for a breach of the contract between the defendant here and Foy, it is clear from the averments of the complaint in said action that the subject-matter thereof is precisely the same as the subject-matter of the present action. The complaint in the former action, as does the complaint here, sets out the contract between Foy and the defendant, and alleges that the plaintiff furnished certain materials to Foy to be used in the construction of the school building under said contract between Foy and the defendant, and further alleges, after disclosing that certain payments had been made by Foy on the original amount due plaintiff for the materials so furnished to Foy, that the plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $2,400.28, precisely the sum which it is alleged in the complaint in the present action is due from Foy to the plaintiff. But it is, in effect, admitted by counsel for the plaintiff that both actions were founded on or originated out of the same transaction. The point made by the plaintiff is that the judgment in the former action, for reasons which will hereafter be noted, cannot be made to operate as an estoppel here.

In the present action the court made the following finding relative to the judgment in the former action: "On or about the 27th day of October, 1908, plaintiff commenced an action in the above-entitled court against the Fairfield school district in the county of Solano, state of California, Roy D. Smith, James N. Watson, James Lackie, and C. C. Foy, defendants. Said action was not for the same cause of action as that set forth in the complaint herein, but the cause of action set forth was an entirely separate and distinct cause of action. The cause of action set forth in the present action was not under a claim arising out of the transaction set forth in the former complaint. The present action does not affect all the parties to the former action, or any of them, except the Fairfield school district." It is further found that the judgment in the former action has never been appealed from, and is still in force and effect, and that "said judgment is not a bar to the present action."

The foregoing findings are to a great extent mere conclusions of law, and are in line with the theory upon which the respondent argues against the contention of the appellant that the effect of said judgment is to estop the maintenance of the present action, the position of the respondent being that the cause of action of the former action is not the same as the cause of action here for two reasons, viz.: (1) That the parties to the former are different from or not the same parties as those to the present action. (2) That the former action was an action at law for damages for breach of the contract between Foy and the defendant and for the neglect of the defendant in not exacting the statutory bond from the contractor, and that the present action is a suit in equity the purpose of which is, in effect, to enforce a lien. Both positions are obviously untenable.

[2] There could be, it seems to us, no proposition less debatable than that, where an action is commenced against a party and a judgment entered for or against him, such judgment, after becoming final, will always operate as an estoppel or bar against the maintenance of another action thereafter brought against such party alone for the same cause, notwithstanding that other parties might have been joined with him in such action, and the subject-matter of the action is adjudicated as to all the parties thereto. In other words, it cannot possibly be true that where, as here, a cause of action has been adjudicated as to all the defendants to an action the judgment therein cannot be successfully set up in bar of an action thereafter commenced for precisely the same cause of action against one of such defendants. By the phrase, "the same parties," we do not understand it is meant that all the parties plaintiff and parties defendant to the former action must be joined in the later action to render available the plea of the judgment in the first action as an estoppel in the subsequent action. Where the action is against a number of defendants and the merits have been litigated and adjudicated as to all, and the same plaintiff thereafter proceeds in a subsequent action against one of said defendants for identically the same cause of action, then the later action is between the "same parties" as those to the former in the sense that the plea of res adjudicata may with perfect legal propriety be set up, for, as between the plaintiff and the party defendant to the later action, the merits as to the same cause of action have been as definitively adjudicated as if such defendant were the only party defendant to the first action.

[3] The position that the judgment in the former action cannot be pleaded in this because the one was an action at law and the other a suit in equity is without any sound reason for its support. To sustain that position would be to declare that it is not the subject-matter of the action, but the remedy by which a party may seek, judicially, to assert a right that is the test determinative of the applicability of the plea of res adjudicata; but obviously the remedy is not nor could it be made the criterion without upsetting the very object of pleas in estoppel by judgment. If, for example, a county should proceed by the extraordinary legal remedy of mandamus to compel a county official to turn over to the public treasury certain moneys which, it was charged, he had collected in his official capacity and should lose out on the merits, could not such county official, in an ordinary action at law thereafter brought by the county to recover the same money, interpose with success the plea of estoppel based upon the judgment in mandate? The question answers itself.

These views are not inconsistent with anything that is said in Lillis v. Emigrant Ditch, 95 Cal. 553, 558, 30 Pac. 1108, Parnell v. Hahn, 61 Cal. 131, 132; Hall v. Susskind, 109 Cal. 203, 205, 41 Pac. 1012, Newhall v. Hatch, 134 Cal. 269, 272, 66 Pac. 266, 55 L. R. A. 673, McCormick v. Gross, 135 Cal. 302, 304, 67 Pac. 766, or Laguna Drainage Dist. v. Martin Co., 5 Cal. App. 166, 169, 89 Pac. 993, cited by the respondent. To the contrary, the cases mentioned very clearly announce the rule as we understand it, and think that it ought to be construed and applied here. Conceding that the present action is one in equity, and we find a striking counterpart of the proposition which is presented here in the case of Parnell v. Hahn, supra. There, in the first action, Hahn proceeded against Parnell and several others in a suit to quiet title to a certain piece of land belonging to him, and, to that end, to have it determined that said parties did not have an equitable estate or interest therein by reason of the terms of a certain contract for the sale of said land. Parnell alone answered the complaint, and, as a defendant, asked, as affirmative relief, specific performance of said contract of sale. The court's decision in that case on all the issues was in favor of Hahn. Thereafter Parnell brought an action for damages for the nonperformance of the same contract upon which he founded his defense, and asked affirmative relief in the former action. The judgment in the former action was pleaded in the subsequent action as an estoppel by Hahn. The court said: "The facts which constitute the causes of action in both are therefore the same; and the parties to the former action were the same as in the present action, for, although the complaint was filed against Parnell, Hill, and Corcoran, yet Corcoran had no interest whatever in the contract between Hahn and Parnell. Hill acted only as the agent of Parnell, and the latter was the only one who answered the complaint and claimed to be the sole equitable owner of the land under the contract of sale. The matter in issue in the former action involved the validity and legal effect of the contract of sale, and the issue in this action involves the same question."

[4] Now, the effect of the service of the notice mentioned in section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure upon the defendant by the plaintiff was to subrogate the latter to the right Foy had to any money held by the defendant as part of the contract price for the erection of the building. The notice, in other words, operated as an equitable garnishment, or as an assignment pro tanto of the money due from the defendant to the plaintiff. Bates v. Santa Barbara Co., 90 Cal. 543, 547, 27 Pac. 438. The service of said notice was the only means by which the defendant could be bound to pay the plaintiff on its claim any money due the contractor from the defendant. It is, of course, correct to say that no cause of action could have accrued against the defendant in favor of the plaintiff on account of the materials furnished by the latter to the contractor until such notice had been served on the defendant, and that consequently, in the absence of the service of such notice, no valid or binding judgment in favor of the plaintiff as against the defendant could have been rendered. Whether, had no notice been served on the defendant prior to the commencement of the former action, the judgment in favor of the defendant could be successfully pleaded in bar of the present action, we need not stop to inquire. Nor need we examine the question whether, in order to bind the defendant by a judgment in the former action, said action not being directly based upon the garnishment of which the service of the notice was the effect, it was necessary to serve such notice.

[5] It is sufficient to know that if the notice was necessary to support a judgment in said action against the defendant, such notice having been in fact served prior to the commencement of said action, and although not pleaded in the complaint therein, it was the duty of the plaintiff, in order to have found the defendant by any judgment it might have obtained against the former, to have pleaded and relied upon the notice in said action, having made the defendant one of the parties defendant thereto, and thus have fully put in issue and litigated in one and the same action all the matters which might have been necessary to a definitive determination of the whole case—that is, of all matters which might have materially affected any or all the parties to the action as to the subject-matter thereof. On the other hand, if the notice was not necessary in order to bind the defendant in that action, then all the matters materially affecting the defendant as to the subject-matter of that action were litigated and adjudicated. In this connection, it may be parenthetically observed that the second cause of action set out in the complaint in the former action was based upon the alleged failure of the defendant and its board of trustees to exact from the contractor the bond required by the statute to indemnify those furnishing labor and materials for a building, in case the contractor failed to pay for the same. It is plainly evident that the plaintiff in that action thus sought, in preference to pleading and relying upon the notice prescribed by section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which it had previously served on the defendant, to enforce pro tanto, against the defendant, if thus it could be done, any judgment that it might obtain against the contractor and the defendant in said former action for the former's alleged breach of the contract. In other words, it is manifest that the object of the second cause of action set out in the complaint in the former action was, in effect, to subserve the purpose, if thus it could be accomplished, that the notice prescribed by section 1184 is designed to effectuate for a party furnishing materials for or performing labor on a building to be erected under a contract between the owner of the land and the contractor. But, however that may be, it is very clear, as before declared, that, although the recovery sought in and by the former action was one at law and the action ex delicto in character, said action nevertheless originated out of and was founded upon precisely the same transaction as that upon which the present action is predicated. It, in other words, involved the litigation and determination of identically the same question as that involved here, and, although the plaintiff failed in said former action to plead and rely upon the notice which it had served upon the defendant, in compliance with section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we cannot bring ourselves to the belief that it was not its duty to have done so, if necessary to bind the defendant by any judgment which might have been obtained against it and the contractor in said action, to the extent of its indebtedness to the contractor. We are therefore unable to dissuade ourselves from the conviction that the judgment in the former action is conclusive as to the ultimate question involved here as between each and all the parties to said former action.

The rule as here applied is in perfect harmony with the theory upon which estoppels by judgment proceed. In Woolverton v. Baker, 98 Cal. 632, 33 Pac. 732, the rule is given as follows: "Where a given matter becomes the subject of litigation in and of adjudication by a court of competent jurisdiction, the court requires the parties to that litigation to bring forward their whole case, and will not, except under special circumstances, permit the same parties to open the same subject of litigation in respect of matter which might have been brought forward as a part of the subject in contest, but which was not brought forward only because they have through negligence, inadvertence, or even accident, omitted part of their case. [Italics ours.] The plea of res adjudicata applies, except in special cases, not only to points upon which the court was actually required by the parties to form an opinion and pronounce a judgment, but to every point which properly belonged to the subject of litigation and which the parties, exercising reasonable diligence, might have put forward at the time." See, also, Flynn v. Hite, 107 Cal. 455, 40 Pac. 749; Crew v. Pratt, 119 Cal. 149, 51 Pac. 38; Silverston v. Mercantile Trust Co., 122 Pac. 976.

In Quirk v. Rooney, 130 Cal. 505, 510, 62 Pac. 825, 826, the court says: "We do not think it the policy of the law to allow as many different suits between the same parties in regard to the same subject-matter as there might be different modes of establishing title to property."

The foregoing authorities seem to us to be decisive of the case here upon the question of estoppel.

The judgment and order are therefore reversed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

HART, J. In the petition for rehearing of this cause before this court, counsel for the respondent, while conceding that there is an appeal from the order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial, insist, as they originally insisted, that there is no appeal from the judgment. The judgment was entered on October 4, 1911. The notice of motion for a new trial was served and filed on the 14th day of October, 1911, from which circumstance it is assumed that the defendant must have had actual notice of the rendition and entry of judgment at that time. We think this assumption is correct, and that the defendant must necessarily have had such notice of the fact of the entry of judgment; otherwise, the intention to move for a new trial would not have been noticed. The appeal from the judgment was taken on February 1, 1912, a little over 4 months after the date of the entry of the judgment. Under section 941b of the Code of Civil Procedure the appeal from the judgment is required to be taken within 60 days from the notice of the entry of judgment. It has been held that, under said section, neither a notice of the appeal from the judgment to the adverse party nor an undertaking on appeal is required. Estate of McPhee, 154 Cal. 385, 392, 97 Pac. 878; Mitchell v. California, etc., S. S. Co., 154 Cal. 731, 733, 99 Pac. 202. But it is very clear that, if the defendant sought to take its appeal from the judgment under that section, it failed in its attempt to do so, since it is a requirement of said section that such appeal must be taken within 60 days after notice of the entry of judgment.

By section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure—one of the sections prescribing the former exclusive method of taking an appeal from a judgment, and which method of so appealing may still be resorted to—it is provided that an appeal from the judgment may be taken within 6 months after the entry of judgment. Section 940 of the same Code provides, however, that an appeal so taken "is ineffectual for any purpose, unless within five days after service of the notice of appeal, an undertaking be filed," etc., "to the effect that the appellant will pay all damages and costs which may be awarded against him on the appeal, or on a dismissal thereof," etc. Section 941, Id. The appellant having failed to file an undertaking as prescribed by those sections, it is claimed that, if its appeal from the judgment was attempted under the old method, it has also failed in such attempt.

No substantial reason at present occurs to us why there should be such a wide difference as to the time within which such appeals may be taken between the two methods of appealing from the judgment. Nor are we now able to perceive any sound reason why in the one case an undertaking on appeal should be necessary, while in the other it is not necessary, according to the legislative judgment. We are not, however, prepared to say that, so far as an undertaking is concerned, the provisions of sections 940 and 941, requiring and pointing out the requisites of such obligation on the part of the appealing party, should not be observed in order to render an appeal from the judgment available to such party. We shall, therefore, treat the attempted appeal from the judgment here as futile, and consequently not reviewable.

[6] But the question whether the findings are supported by the evidence may be reviewed on the appeal from the order, and a review of that question is all that is involved in the decision of this court on this appeal. In the former opinion we held that the evidence does not support the finding that the cause of action declared upon in the first action by the plaintiff against the defendant here was not the same as the cause of action relied upon in the present action, but that, to the contrary, the evidence disclosed that the cause of action stated in both the complaints was the same, although the remedies through which said cause of action was sought to be asserted were different. It is thus plainly apparent that, as stated, the sole question discussed and decided by the former opinion was whether certain findings, vital to the judgment, were sustained by the proofs, and, as declared, such question is obviously one that is reviewable on an appeal from the order.

Upon the main question, this court has been unable to take any other view than that the facts as disclosed by the evidence present clear grounds for the application of the rule of res adjudicata. In accordance with the views herein set forth, the judgment heretofore entered herein will be and the same is hereby amended, so that it will read: "The appeal from the judgment is dismissed, and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial is reversed."

The petition for rehearing is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkherth, Judge.

Action by Harron, Rickard & McCone against John Sisk. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. L. Dennett, of Modesto, and Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for appellant. W. H. Hatton, of Modesto, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was brought to recover the balance due for the sale of what was known as a 40 horse power Foos type special horizontal engine. The agreed price was $1,642.50, of which $400 was paid at the time of the purchase. The defense, set forth in varying phraseology, is based upon the claim of a breach of warranty. The action was tried before a jury and a general verdict rendered for defendant in the sum of $400. The appeal is from the judgment and the order denying a motion for a new trial.

[1] The first contention of appellant, worthy of notice, is that there was no implied warranty that the engine would do the work required of it. This proposition of law is urged by reason of the fact that the purchase was of a certain specified, well known, staple article from a seller who was not the manufacturer. There is a clear distinction between such transaction and the case where the purchaser relies upon the judgment of the seller for the selection or manufacture of an article suitable and adequate for a certain purpose. There are many decisions upon the subject among which is the carefully considered opinion of the Supreme Court of Kansas in the case of Ehrsam v. Brown, 76 Kan. 206, 91 Pac. 181, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 877, which may be consulted with profit. This diversity is also recognized by the provisions of our Civil Code found in sections 1763 et seq.

This feature of the discussion, however, may be dismissed, as respondent claims the breach of an express warranty contained in the following language of the contract of sale: "Guarantee: All Foos Engines are guaranteed to deliver their rated horse power at sea-level." Respondent's position is that the engine fell far short of this requirement, and that hence there was a substantial failure of consideration as set forth for a defense in the answer to the complaint. This is the occasion for the assertion of appellant, admittedly sound, that "defendant can recover, if at all, only upon showing some defect in the engine in question, which constitutes a breach of such warranty." And herein it is declared that "there is no evidence before the court that the engine in question was not what it claimed to be and did not actually deliver forty horse power. The sole defect in the engine complained of is directed to the clutch." As to this, we do not think it can be maintained that there is no substantial evidence from which a reasonable inference can be drawn that the engine was materially defective. It may be admitted that the evidence as to the infirmity of the clutch is more persuasive than that in reference to the engine proper, but, in consideration of all the circumstances as we must view them, it is believed that the jury were warranted in the conclusion that there was a breach of appellant's guaranty. In this connection attention is called by respondent to the following facts disclosed by the record: In 1908 defendant used the same separator to thresh grain and the power was furnished by a 25 horse power gasoline engine which furnished all the power that was needed. The work done then was the same kind of work and under similar conditions as that attempted in 1909 with the use of the engine in question. After this "Foos" engine was received, defendant employed a crew of men to carry on threshing operations. He did all in his power to have the engine furnish the necessary horse power to operate his separator. He tried for 12 days to make the engine furnish sufficient power for this purpose, but he did not succeed, and he testified that it could not be made to furnish sufficient horse power to run his separator and enable him to conduct his threshing operations. He further declared that during said 12 days everything possible and everything necessary was done to cause the engine to deliver 40 horse power, but the engine would not, and did not, furnish it or sufficient power to run his separator. From the cross-examination of defendant's witnesses and from the testimony offered by plaintiff, it could be and it has been plausibly argued that the failure of the engine to furnish sufficient power for the purpose intended was due to the inability of the clutch and pulley to carry it to the separator and not to the want of development of the power, but, as we view it, the other inference is not unreasonable that the engine itself was incapable of measuring up to the guaranteed efficiency.

[2] Assuming, then, support for the asserted breach, what redress is open to defendant? He may undoubtedly set up either or both of two defenses: First, a rescission with its resulting restoration; and, second, damages that he has suffered for the violation of the contract. It is undoubtedly true that the fact that the buyer has a right to rescind does not compel him to resort to that remedy. He may still, if he so elect, and if the contract does not expressly confine his remedy to a rescission, affirm the sale and maintain an action on the warranty for damages, or rely upon the breach of the warranty when sued for the price. 30 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 195. In some jurisdictions rescission is not allowed except for fraud, and in others a distinction is made between executed and executory contracts. Id. 190.

[3] In this state the statute designates the grounds for rescission, and provides how it may be effected. Sections 1689 and 1691, Civil Code. One of these grounds is the failure of the consideration in whole or in part, and it is well settled that the breach of an express warranty in sales of personal property comes within the purview of this provision and authorizes rescission or claim for damages. In Polhemus v. Heiman, 45 Cal. 579, involving the sale of wool with an express warranty that it should not be in an unmerchantable condition by reason of dirt and burrs, the Supreme Court said: "Having a warranty, the defendants were not required to return or offer to return the wool. If it was not what it was warranted to be they might have done so, and thus have rescinded the contract, but they were at liberty to retain it and bring an action for the breach of the warranty, or plead the breach in reduction of damages in any action brought by the vendors for the purchase money." In Hoult v. Baldwin, 67 Cal. 610, 8 Pac. 440, in an action to recover the purchase price of a harvesting machine, the defendant set up a warranty of the machine, a breach of the warranty, and a prompt offer to return the machinery to the plaintiffs after he discovered its insufficiency. The Supreme Court said: "Having taken the machine then under a warranty, whether it be that expressed in the writing or provided by the Code, or both, the defendant had the right, if there was a breach of the warranty—that is, if in any respect the machine was not what it was warranted to be—to rescind the sale by returning or offering to return it to the plaintiffs."

[4] The familiar requirement of the Code (section 1691, supra) is that the one seeking to take advantage of its provisions must rescind promptly, upon discovering the facts which entitle him to rescind, and he must restore to the other party everything of value which he has received from him under the contract, or must offer to restore the same, upon condition that such party shall do likewise. By the allegations of his answer there is no doubt defendant brought himself clearly within the terms of the statute. It appears that on the 13th day of July he received the engine; that, about 10 days later, he attempted to operate it and continued his trial for two weeks without success; that on or about the 10th of August he informed plaintiff of the failure of the engine to deliver the required power; that on or about the 20th of August plaintiff removed from the engine the friction clutch, and did not return it; that on or about the 30th of August following the defendant in writing informed and notified plaintiff of his rescission of the contract. It is true that in his written notice he demanded the payment of the amount of damages caused by the failure of the engine, in addition to the return of the $400, but this was not made a condition precedent to the redelivery of the engine, the notice stating: "The engine is here at your disposal," and "I hereby offer to return to you the engine and all accessories thereof and everything connected therewith received by me from you which has not already been returned to you." This written offer is admitted by appellant to have been received, and, upon the assumption of a breach of warranty, the offer was sufficient to place appellant in default and to authorize the restoration of the parties to their former position. This, of course, would include the return to defendant of the $400 paid as part of the purchase price of the engine.

[5] As we look at the record, then, impressed with all the intendments in favor of the action of the jury and the court below that the law enjoins, we find a sale under an express warranty, the payment of part of the purchase price, a breach of the warranty, a prompt rescission of the contract after the discovery of the failure of the consideration, and a verdict and judgment in favor of the purchaser for the return of the money paid. Appellant's answer is that "an issue of rescission was not made," and, furthermore, in the closing brief, that "under the issues as tried in this case, and as made by the pleadings the action to rescind was abandoned and defendant relied upon his claim for damages for breach of warranty." But we do not so read the record. Both defenses were set up, as they might well be, and, if upon either theory we find sufficient legal support for the verdict, the result must be an affirmance. It is true that the attention of the court and jury seems to have been occupied largely with the consideration of the claim for damages and the instructions are devoted entirely to that theory, but there was no necessity for proof of the rescission in view of the admission in appellant's pleading and the absence of any instructions on the subject of rescission is probably due to explanations and admissions in the argument. At any rate, while it is doubtful whether there is sufficient evidence to support the verdict upon the theory of an affirmance of the contract, it is believed that it is not unsupported upon the other ground.

It is assumed that defendant will not attempt to withhold the engine from appellant if it has not already been restored. None of the alleged errors, most of which, indeed, affect the theory of damages, can be held sufficiently erroneous to overthrow the verdict, sustainable, as we believe it is, on the hypothesis that the contract of sale was rescinded for breach of warranty.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. P. James, Judge.

Action by J. F. Groover against the Pacific Coast Savings Society and others. Judgment for plaintiff and defendant the California Title Insurance & Trust Company appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Olney, Pringle & Mannon and Page, McCutchen, Knight & Olney, all of San Francisco, for appellant. C. M. Fickert, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. A rehearing was granted on this appeal after decision in department. That decision, written by Justice ANGELLOTTI and concurred in by Justices SHAW and SLOSS, is as follows:

"This action was brought by plaintiff to obtain the delivery up and cancellation of,

and the execution of a good and sufficient release of, a promissory note for $800 executed March 10, 1899, by plaintiff to defendant Pacific Coast Savings Society, and a mortgage given by plaintiff to said defendant on the same day, to secure payment of said note, as well as all other indebtedness of the mortgagor to the mortgagee. Defendant and appellant California Title Insurance & Trust Company is the assignee of said note and mortgage, as well as the certificate of stock in the Pacific Coast Savings Society mentioned therein, by assignment made January 9, 1900. The appeal by said last-named company is from a judgment granting plaintiff the relief asked upon payment by him of $386.99.

"The case was submitted to the lower court for decision upon an agreed statement of facts, upon which appellant, in addition to claiming that plaintiff was not entitled to the relief asked, moved for relief in accordance with the prayer of its cross-complaint, viz., that the amount due under the note and mortgage be ascertained, that the same be declared a lien on the mortgaged property, and that the mortgaged property (including the certificate and shares of stock) be sold to pay the same, and attorney fees and costs. This motion was denied.

"The trial court reached its conclusion as to the amount due on the note and mortgage, $386.99 (which amount plaintiff duly offered to pay appellant long prior to the commencement of his action), by deducting from the amount of principal, $800, what would be the cash surrender value of plaintiff's said stock, 'if computed in accordance with the by-laws (of the Pacific Coast Savings Society), and as appears from the rules of computation as stated on the face of the stock itself,' viz., $413.01. The surrender value of such stock is made up, of course, of the installments paid in by the holder on account of the purchase price, and such profits as are allotted to the stock. Whether or not plaintiff was entitled to any credit on his note and mortgage for the amounts paid by him on account of the purchase price of his stock, or for the surrender value thereof, is practically the only question presented by the briefs on this appeal.

"The Pacific Coast Savings Society was incorporated in January, 1891, which was prior to the enactment of the statutes of 1891 relating to building and loan associations, and never elected to continue its existence thereunder. Some of its purposes, as stated in its articles of incorporation, were generally to accumulate a fund from contributions of its stockholders, advance payments, proceeds of sale of debentures, and profits from investments; to purchase real estate and erect buildings thereon for its members, and to make loans to its members; to issue and sell first mortgage debenture bonds and to borrow money, and to secure the capital stock to be paid into the treasury on the basis of monthly installments, or otherwise. By its by-laws various classes of stock were provided for, with only one of which we are here concerned, viz.: 'Class "A," ordinary installment shares.' This stock was to be paid for in monthly installments of 60 cents per share, and was payable at its face value, in cash, when the amount paid in and the pro rata share of profits in excess of expenses and membership fees and any losses which may occur equal $100. Each holder of such stock desiring it was entitled to receive for each share of his stock a loan of $100 from the society upon proper application therefor, assignment of his stock, and execution of such mortgage on real estate as the directors might deem sufficient security for the loan. The rate of interest on such loans was to be not less than 6 per cent., and such premium as might be fixed. There was no provision in the by-laws relative to loans to be made on such stock which would make the relation of the borrowing stockholder and the company in so far as the loan was concerned, in regard to any matter material in this case, anything other than that of borrower and lender of money, whose respective rights and obligations must be determined by the stipulations of the note and mortgage given and accepted upon the making of the loan. In other words, while the by-laws were expressly made a part of the mortgage given by plaintiff, there was nothing in said by-laws to modify or affect the express provisions of both note and mortgage as to the nature and extent of the obligation assumed by the borrower, in so far as any matter material to this case is concerned. The by-laws authorized the directors to issue and sell debenture bonds, and secure the payment of the same with a portion or all of the securities owned by the society. In 1895 $100,000 of such bonds were issued and sold, appellant being made the trustee to hold the securities furnished for the payment of the amounts due thereon, and in January, 1900, plaintiff's note and mortgage, together with his pledged certificate of stock, were regularly assigned to appellant for the purpose of such security. In February, 1905, in an action brought by the Attorney General of the state, the Pacific Coast Savings Society was regularly adjudged to be insolvent, and trustees in liquidation were appointed. The affairs of said society are still in course of liquidation by the trustees under the direction of the court. The judgment of insolvency, which has become final, forbade the transaction of further business by the society. The debenture bonds secured by the assignment of various mortgages, including plain-tiff's, are still unpaid to the extent of $36,356.70.

'The terms of the note and mortgage given by the plaintiff, constituting the contract between the parties, are such as, in our judgment, to preclude any credit to plaintiff of installments paid by him on account of the purchase price of his stock, or by reason of any profits earned by the society which are apportionable to such stock.

'The note is a simple promissory note for $800, payable 'seven years after date,' with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum payable monthly in advance, the interest to become part of the principal if not paid, and to bear interest at a specified rate. The only other provisions of the note are those substantially providing that if the monthly interest be not paid within a certain time after it becomes due, or if the monthly installments due upon 10 shares of stock of the payee 'pledged as security for the payment' of the note are not paid when due, or if the 'monthly premium due on said loan amounting to the sum of $4.80 per month' payable monthly in advance is not paid when due, then the whole of said principal sum of $800 and the interest thereon shall become forthwith due and payable at the option of the holder, and the recital that the note is secured by mortgage bearing even date and the pledge by the mortgagor of 10 shares of the capital stock of the mortgagee.

'The mortgage, covering certain land in Los Angeles county, recites that it is made as security for the payment of this note, which is set out in full therein, and also as security for all further advances and other indebtedness of the mortgagor to the mortgagee that may exist, arise, or be contracted for, before the satisfaction hereof, not exceeding at any time the sum of $80, exclusive of interest. It provides that the mortgagor 'as a further security for the payment of said promissory note, and the interest to accumulate thereon, and the said par value of said shares of capital stock, has pledged and he does hereby pledge to said mortgagee all of the aforesaid shares of the capital stock,' and gives the mortgagee the right in case of a foreclosure, or nonpayment of the note, etc., to apply at its option to such payment, the cash surrender value of said stock, and thereupon become the absolute owner of such stock. The mortgagor promises that he will pay to said mortgagee the par value of said stock in monthly installments of 60 cents per share on the 1st day of each month until such shares are fully paid by the said payments and the dividends and accumulations thereon, and, further, 'to pay the monthly premium of $4.80 on said loan on the 1st day of each and every month during the continuance thereof.' It is further provided that 'all covenants by the mortgagor are intended to run to the mortgagee, its successors and assigns.'

[1] 'There is absolutely nothing in note, mortgage, or by-laws or in plaintiff's certificate of stock, which certainly comprehend all of the written contract entered into by the parties, that warrants the conclusion that payments of installments on account of the purchase price of the stock may, under any circumstances, be applied to the credit of the plaintiff on account of his note, or that the transactions so far as the stock was concerned was anything more than a mere pledge by way of security for the payment of the note, to which the mortgagee might resort 'at its option' in the enforcement of plaintiff's obligation. The features which in some cases involving contracts between building and loan associations and borrowing members have been held to show that the arrangement between the parties was nothing more nor less than the advancement by the association of the par value of the borrower's stock, upon the undertaking of the borrower properly secured, that he would pay not only interest thereon, but also installments on the purchase price of his stock until such time as, by reason of such payment and the profits thereon, such stock becomes fully paid for, when, by reason of such payments, the indebtedness is to be considered discharged and the stock canceled, are absent from the transaction here involved, so far as the same is evidenced by the writings constituting the contract between the parties. By the terms of that contract, plaintiff was bound to pay in money the amount stipulated in the note, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, and payments on account of his stock were not, and cannot now be, held to have been payments on account of his indebtedness. The fact that, if the society had continued a solvent concern and he had continued to make payments on account of his stock until the same had attained its par value of $100 per share, he would have been able to discharge his indebtedness with the amount then due him on account of the stock, is of no consequence in determining what the contract between these parties was.

'The distinction between this case and that of Hale v. Barker, 129 Cal. 419, 62 Pac. 168, so far as the stipulations of the agreement between the parties are concerned, is very marked, and it was expressly recognized by the learned writer of the opinion in that case that it is impossible to lay down any 'hard and fast' rule that shall apply in all cases, 'not only because of the difference in the mode and rules of business adopted by different associations, but because of the different conditions inserted in mortgages and the varying allegations in complaints.' In that case, according to the opinion, Barker, the borrower, applied for the advancement of $1,500 by way of loan or anticipation of the value of his shares at their maturity, the bond given by him recited that the loan was 'an advancement to him by said association of one thousand five hundred dollars, by way of anticipation of the value at their maturity, of thirty shares of the capital stock of said association, now owned by said John A. Barker,' and the mortgage purported to secure the continued monthly payment of the interest on the $1,500, and the monthly dues on the stock, until it matured and should be of the value of $100 per share, and also the surrender of said stock at its maturity in payment of said advancement and the premium bid. The court said that it was part of the contract between the mortgagor and the association that, when the stock should be fully paid up and of the value of $100 per share, the mortgagor should surrender the stock to the association in full payment and discharge of the mortgage. The association having become insolvent, it was said that the 'contract as to the time and manner in which the mortgage was, by its terms, to be satisfied became impossible of fulfillment.' By reason of the insolvency, it was impossible for the association to continue business and bring the stock to its par value of $100 per share, and therefore impossible to complete the scheme established by the contract, of discharge of the indebtedness by a surrender of the fully paid-up shares of stock. Of course, that situation does not exist in this case, for no such scheme is established by the terms of the contract. As put by appellant, 'the only connection here between the note and mortgage and the stock, is that the stock is assigned as collateral security, with the usual covenant on the part of the borrower that he will keep the collateral good.' Assuming Hale v. Barker, supra, to have been correctly decided, in view of the particular contract there involved, we do not think that it warrants a similar decision upon the contract presented in this case.

'The dual relation to a building and loan association occupied by a borrowing stockholder, and the fact that payments made by him on account of his stock are not payments on account of his debt, are fully recognized by two decisions of this court in bank, each more recent than Hale v. Barker, supra, a department case. In Henry v. Continental Building & Loan Association, 156 Cal. 667, 105 Pac. 960, where the terms of the note were substantially the same as in the case at bar, the court held that the lower court erred in allowing as credits on the note payments which the agreement into which plaintiffs entered expressly provided should be exclusively applied to the payment of the premium and to the extinguishment of the obligation arising by reason of the purchase of the shares of stock required to be bought as a prerequisite to the exercise by plaintiff of the privilege of securing the $800 loan. It was said, quoting approvingly from McNamara v. Oakland, etc., Ass'n, 131 Cal. 336, 63 Pac. 670: 'He (the borrower) occupied the dual relation to the corporation of borrower and stockholder, each of which was distinct from the other. Under the scheme, he could not be a borrower without becoming a stockholder, but he could be a stockholder without being a borrower. * * * That the relations of borrower and stockholder are separate and distinct, in associations such as defendant's assignor, seems to be well settled. And it is general law that payments on account of collaterals are not payments on account of the debt they secure. The pledging of shares as collateral security for the payment of a debt is a recognition of the distinct character of the member as a member and a debtor.' It was further said: 'So, in the case at bar, it is clear, from the evidence, that the stock of the respondents had not matured at the time of the commencement of this suit, and consequently the payments made on said stock could not, under the terms of the contract of the parties, be lumped with payments for other agreed purposes and the total sum thus produced made to extinguish the principal sum of the note.' See, also, McNamara v. Oakland, etc., Ass'n, supra.

[2] "It is true that in neither of the cases just cited had the association become insolvent, with the consequent result that the shares of stock could never mature. But these cases do emphatically hold that the dual relations of stockholder and borrower occupied by a borrowing stockholder under such a contract as we have before us are entirely separate and distinct. It would seem to follow necessarily that, under such a contract as we have before us, the fact that the association becomes insolvent cannot affect the obligation of the borrower so far as the necessity of paying in full the amount of his loan and interest thereon is concerned, and the payments made by him on account of the purchase price of the stock cannot be credited as payments made on account of his loan. This is held by the overwhelming weight of authority. The reasoning of the cases so holding appears to us to be unanswerable. As substantially stated in Curtis v. Granite State, etc., Ass'n, 69 Conn. 6 [36 Atl. 1023, 61 Am. St. Rep. 17], the borrowing stockholder stands in a double relation to the association; he is a member—investor—as well as a borrower. As a member, he is bound to contribute to the losses and expenses of the common enterprise. If the amount of dues paid in by him as a member is credited back to him as a debtor, he will receive in full the amount paid upon his stock, while the other members who have not become borrowers may receive only a small percentage of the amount paid in by them.

Where such a company becomes insolvent, nothing remains but to wind it up in such a manner as to do equity to the creditors and between the members themselves. As regards the latter, care should be taken to adjust the burdens equally, and not to throw either upon borrowers or nonborrowers more than their respective shares. 'That result may be reached by requiring the borrower to repay what he actually received with interest. He would then be entitled, after the debts of the corporation are paid, to a pro rata dividend with the nonborrower for what he has paid upon his stock. He will thus be obliged to bear his proper share of the losses.' And in Coltrane v. Blake, 113 Fed. 785 [51 C. C. A. 457], it was said: 'The rule in the United States is that the capital stock of a corporation is impressed with a trust for the payment of the creditors of the corporation [citing cases]. Especially is this the case with insolvent corporations. The capital stock of a building and loan association is composed of the subscriptions to it, either by cash or dues. If any part of those dues is diverted from the claims of creditors generally, and used for the benefit of a single stockholder by way of credit on a debt due by him to the corporation, it is a misuse of trust funds, and so unlawful.' See, also, Towle v. American, etc., Society [C. C.] 61 Fed. 446; Weir v. Granite, etc., Ass'n, 56 N. J. Eq. 234, 38 Atl. 643; Taylor v. Clark, 74 Ark. 220 [85 S. W. 231]; Hale v. Cairns, 8 N. D. 145 [77 N. W. 1010, 44 L. R. A. 261, 73 Am. St. Rep. 746]; Dooling v. Smith, 89 Ill. App. 26; Clark v. Lopp, 80 Mo. App. 542; Strohen v. Franklin, etc., Ass'n, 115 Pa. 273 [8 Atl. 843]; Rogers v. Hargo, 92 Tenn. 35 [20 S. W. 430]. While there are some decisions not in accord with this view, we are satisfied that, upon the question of the application in payment of the loan of amounts paid on account of stock, the views stated in the opinions cited are clearly correct, at least in cases where the terms of the contract between the borrower and the association are substantially the same as those in the case at bar. As to such a case as this, viz., one where the borrower's mortgage has passed by assignment to one from whom the association has borrowed money and to whom it has transferred members' obligations as security, Mr. Endlich in his work on Building Associations (2d Ed.) § 531, says: 'In such cases, * * * when the society has become insolvent, the right of the outside creditor to be paid speedily requires that the borrowing member pay at once what his mortgage then stands for, to wit, the amount actually received with unpaid interest, without credit for his stock payments, and that he be relegated to the final distribution of the corporate assets for his dividend upon the latter.' In view of what we have said, it is clear that plaintiff was not entitled to have the note and mortgage canceled upon the payment by him of $386.99."

It is earnestly insisted by respondent on this rehearing that the rule declared and adopted in the foregoing opinion as governing the settlement of the indebtedness of a borrowing stockholder to a building and loan association of which he is a member is contrary to the decided weight of prevailing American authority. Under this insistence, we have given that matter further consideration. It is conceded in the department decision that there are some authorities which declare a rule different from the one there adopted, and it is this line of decisions which counsel for respondent claims announces the more equitable rule to be applied in the adjustment of indebtedness between the borrowing member and the insolvent association and is the one which he further insists is sustained by the decided weight of authority.

The growth of building and loan associations throughout the Union in recent years has been attendant with a vast amount of litigation and the decisions of the courts have not been harmonious with respect to the rule to be applied in settlements between the association and its borrowing members. This diversity has arisen in a large measure through differences in statutory provisions governing the associations in the several states, differences in the rules or by-laws of respective associations and the varied forms of contracts which have been entered into between the association and its members, and have come before the courts for construction. No great difficulty has been experienced in applying an equitable rule of settlement where the questions have arisen between a borrowing member and an association which is solvent. It has arisen principally where the association has become insolvent and in an effort by courts under such circumstances to formulate a rule which may be applied so as to operate equitably as to the creditors and likewise between the borrowing and non-borrowing members of the association. It is well settled by all the authorities that, when insolvency intervenes, the borrowing members must pay up their mortgage indebtedness to the insolvent association at once, notwithstanding such debts by the contract of loan have not matured. It is to such a situation that the courts in the different states have endeavored to apply a rule which would be equitable under the changed conditions produced through the insolvency, and it is in such an endeavor that the inharmony arose in the decisions. This diversity of opinion resulted in the early formulation and application in different jurisdictions of two general rules referred to in the authorities as the Maryland and Pennsylvania rules, respectively; the former so called because laid down by the Supreme Court of Maryland, the latter because announced by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania.

The Maryland rule as early declared in that jurisdiction and which to a limited extent has been applied in other states is that on the insolvency of the association the borrowing member should be charged with the amount loaned him by the association with interest thereon, and credited with all sums paid as dues upon his stock and the premium and interest paid upon his loan. It is this Maryland rule which respondent contends should be applied here and which he insists is sustained by the weight of authority. In support of this claim he cites a line of cases from Maryland of which Waverly v. Buck, 64 Md. 338, 1 Atl. 561, will alone be particularly mentioned. Buist v. Bryan, 44 S. C. 121, 21 S. E. 537, 29 L. R. A. 127, 51 Am. St. Rep. 787; Butson v. Home Sav. & Trust Co., 129 Iowa, 370, 105 N. W. 645, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 98, 113 Am. St. Rep. 463; Cook v. Kent, 105 Mass. 246; Randall v. Natl. Building Ass'n, 42 Neb. 809, 60 N. W. 1019, 29 L. R. A. 133; Building Ass'n v. Tinsley, 96 Va. 322, 31 S. E. 508; Snyder v. Fidelity Sav. Ass'n, 23 Utah, 291, 64 Pac. 870; Interstate S. & L. Socy. v. Cairns, 16 Wash. 215, 47 Pac. 509; Hale v. Stenger, 22 Wash. 516, 61 Pac. 156; Fidelity Sav. Ass'n v. Shea, 6 Idaho, 405, 55 Pac. 1023; Western Sav. Bank v. Houston, 38 Or. 377, 65 Pac. 611; Brownlie v. Russell (Eng.) H. L. 8 App. Cas. 235.

A number of cases from the federal courts are also cited by respondent, but of these cases it may be said (and this will apply equally to a number cited from said courts by appellant) that they need not be considered, as they follow the decisions of the state courts in applying either rule as it is adopted by the higher courts of the states, and, as the decisions of these state courts are cited and relied on by either side, the federal cases, therefore, can aid nothing in determining the prevailing rule.

It will be observed on an examination of the authorities cited by respondent from Nebraska, Utah, Washington, Oregon, and Idaho that in none of the cases in those jurisdictions (save Hale v. Stenger) was there any question as to what rule should be applied between borrowing members and insolvent associations. The question whether the Maryland rule or the Pennsylvania rule shall be applied can only arise when the association has become insolvent. In these Western cases cited the actions were either brought by the association to foreclose mortgages accompanied with assignments of their stock given to the association by borrowing members, or were suits brought by such members seeking a cancellation of their mortgages under a claim that a credit on their loans of the withdrawal value of their stock in the association, but which the association refused to make, was sufficient to satisfy their indebtedness. In all those cases the association was solvent, and, as is common to building and loan associations, it was provided in the by-laws that a member thereof might at any time upon the payment of his indebtedness to the association surrender his stock and be paid its withdrawal value. The right to have such withdrawal value applied on the loan was the question involved in these cases; the claim of the association being that the borrowing members by forfeiture of their stock through nonpayment of dues or for other reasons had lost their interest in the stock, and hence were not entitled to have such withdrawal value applied on their indebtedness. The courts held that these claims of the association which were directed against the right of ownership of the stock by the borrowing members were untenable, and that, as the latter had a right according to the by-laws of the association to be paid the withdrawal value of their stock, they were entitled to have it applied in payment on the loan. There was no discussion of the Maryland rule or any other equitable rule to be applied in cases of insolvency of the association. Of course, where the association is solvent and a member who obtains a loan partially secured by an assignment of his stock is accorded under the rules of the association the right of severing his membership therewith at any time on payment of his indebtedness and to be paid the actual value of his stock, there ought to be little room for questioning but that he has the right to have all that he has paid in—at least the dues on his stock—which goes to make up its withdrawal value applied in satisfaction of his loan, and this is all that the cases in the various states referred to, decided. But where the association becomes insolvent a different situation is presented.

[3] A stockholder may not then withdraw. All that remains to be done is to wind up the affairs of the association. The actual value of its shares cannot be determined until this has been done, its assets collected, and its indebtedness paid. Until then it cannot be said that the stock has any withdrawal value. It is to such a situation as this, proceeding from the insolvency of the association, that the courts have endeavored to apply some equitable rule with a view to fairly conserving the rights of creditors of the association and adjusting the rights of its borrowing and nonborrowing members between themselves which has resulted in the formulation of the respective Maryland and Pennsylvania rules, and only cases which involve the insolvency of the association and where one or the other of these views have been considered and applied can be of any value in determining which rule is sustained by the better reasoning and is the one more generally applied. In this view the authorities just referred to as they deal solely with the right of borrowing members in solvent associations can aid nothing in determining that question.

As to the other authorities cited by respondent, they do, as claimed by him, announce and apply the Maryland rule in cases of insolvency, but an examination of those authorities will disclose that the contract of loan was essentially different from that involved in the case at bar. Either the loan was an advancement in anticipation of the value of the member's stock at maturity and was to be satisfied by a surrender of such stock when it matured, or the contract of loan in express terms or the by-laws which were made part of the contract, provided that the monthly payments on the mortgage loan and the monthly payments on the stock assigned as collateral security should be made until the stock matured, and that upon such maturity the stock should be surrendered to the association in payment and cancellation of the debt.

In Buist v. Bryan, supra, the contract of loan provided that interest and dues should be paid until the shares of stock matured and said shares were then to be surrendered to the association in satisfaction of the loan. In Waverly B. & L. Ass'n v. Buck, supra, and Butson v. Home Sav. & Trust Co., supra, the contracts called for the extinguishment of the loan upon the maturity of the shares of stock. In Cook v. Kent, supra, the contract provided that the borrowing member was to pay dues "until the payment of the dues amounted to the principal sum of the loan." In Hale v. Stenger, supra, it does not appear what the particular contract was, the court saying that "the loan was made in the usual terms and conditions common to loans by building and loan associations to their subscribers." In Brownlie v. Russell, supra, the contract provided that the dues should be credited on the loan and the House of Lords in that case, while conceding that the contract was clearly to the advantage of borrowing members and hard upon the nonborrowing members, sustained a right to the application of the dues to the payment of the indebtedness because "it was the contract."

It was the existence of these express contractual relations as to the loan and its repayment which doubtless entered as an important factor in inducing the Maryland court to the original announcement of the rule by it and its acceptance in the limited number of jurisdictions which have followed it; the reasoning of the American courts being that as the payment of the mortgage debt was by the contract between the borrowing member and the association to be accomplished only by the maturity of the shares, and this was rendered impossible through the insolvency of the association, the contract between them was abrogated ab initio and, that being so abrogated, the simple relation of debtor and creditor between the borrowing stockholder and the association existed from the beginning, and the former was entitled accordingly under the rule of partial payments to a credit on his loan for all payments made to the association prior to the insolvency.

But in the case at bar we have no such peculiar contract as was involved in the several cases just referred to. In the case here under consideration, there is nothing in the note or mortgage, the certificate of stock assigned as collateral security, or the by-laws of the association which, as is said in the department decision, comprehended all the written contract between the parties, which provided that the payment of dues on the stock should be applied to the credit of the loan, or that the stock was anything else than a pledge as collateral security for the payment of the amount borrowed. This is clearly pointed out in the department decision, and, if it be conceded that the Maryland rule for which respondent contends should prevail, even to the extent that it has been applied to particular contracts such as were under consideration in the cases which adopted or followed it, it certainly is not the more generally prevailing or accepted rule which governs contracts and loans between borrowing members and associations such as here involved.

While it is contended by appellant that the Maryland rule is in toto opposed now to the current of recent authority, we perceive no occasion for determining that matter. The whole subject is discussed and considered in many of the cases presently to be cited. That rule certainly has not been extended so as to apply to a contract such as we have here.

In more recent years, as building and loan associations have largely expanded throughout the United States, they have become a source of extensive litigation, their objects and purposes have been more plainly understood, and the courts in the large field of litigation which they have afforded have had occasion to more thoroughly consider than in earlier years the rights of creditors and the relation of borrowing and nonborrowing members to the association and between themselves when a condition of insolvency, which was never anticipated, has occurred. As a result the great weight and prevailing current of authority is that where insolvency occurs the dual relation which the member occupies to the association—that of stockholder and borrower—should be kept separate and distinct. As a borrower he is required to pay back to the association the amount loaned him, with interest. As a stockholder he has subscribed for capital stock of the association upon which he has agreed to pay monthly dues, and has assigned such stock as collateral security for the loan. Under this contract of loan, the payment of dues on his stock is not credited as a payment on his loan. Such payment is on his purchase of the stock. In relation to such stock, he is a stockholder, and not a debtor. Upon the insolvency of the association, his contract to make further payments on his stock subscription has ended, but his relation as a stockholder continues until the liquidation of the association. What he has paid in on his stock, in common with what has been paid in by the other members, with such other sources of revenue, have gone to make up the capital stock of the association which is a trust fund for the benefit of the creditors thereof. From this fund the debts of the association must be paid, and the value of the shares of the insolvent association will be just what the assets of the association amount to after liquidation, and cannot be ascertained until the debts and losses of the association are paid. As a stockholder the borrowing member is liable for his proportion of such outstanding indebtedness. Whatever losses are sustained must be borne by all the stockholders, both borrowing and nonborrowing members. If, however, the borrowing stockholders are to have credited on their loans as a payment thereon of the amounts which they have paid in as dues on their stock, such members escape the burden of paying any of the indebtedness or losses of the association. They get back the full benefit of everything they have paid in as a satisfaction toward their loans, while the nonborrowing members who have paid in the same dues bear all the losses and consequently get not only no benefit from the dues which have been paid in by the borrowing members, but necessarily, as in every case of insolvency, get less than they actually paid in as their stock dues. To prevent what would thus be obviously unfair, the courts have generally adopted as the equitable rule to be applied in such cases the one early announced by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Under that rule of settlement, the borrowing stockholder of the insolvent association must repay to it at once the amount loaned with interest. Payments of dues on his stock will not be allowed as credits on his loan. As to stock payments he is to be treated as a nonborrowing member. After the assets are collected and the indebtedness of the association paid, the fund which may remain is to be distributed pro rata among all the stockholders on the basis of the amounts paid by them, respectively, as dues on their stock, whether they are borrowing or nonborrowing stockholders. Under this rule, the rights of the creditors of the association are protected and the members, both borrowing and nonborrowing, are placed upon an equally equitable footing. In laying down this rule it is said in Strohen v. Ass'n, 115 Pa. 273, 8 Atl. 843 (from which decision the rule is known as the Pennsylvania rule): "The insolvency of the company puts an end to its operation as a building association. To a certain extent it also ends the contracts between it and its members and nothing remains but winding it up in such manner as to do equity to the creditors and between the members themselves. As regards the latter, care should be taken to adjust the burden equally, and not throw upon either the borrowers or nonborrowers more than their respective shares. This result may be reached by requiring the borrower to pay what he actually received with interest. He should then be entitled, after the debts are paid, to a pro rata dividend with the nonborrower of what he has paid on his stock. He will thus be obliged to bear his proper share of loss. To allow him to credit upon his mortgage his payments on his stock would enable him to escape responsibility for his share of the losses and throw them wholly upon the nonborrowers. In other words, the borrower would escape without loss. It will not do to administer the affairs of an insolvent corporation in this manner." The rule as thus laid down is now generally accepted by the text-writers and in the adjudicated cases as sustained by clear equitable considerations. It is the rule laid down in Endlich on Building Associations (2d Ed.) § 477, and Thompson on Building Associations (2d Ed.) § 171, p. 344, where the author declares that the rule laid down in Buist v. Bryan, supra (the case principally cited in support of the Maryland rule), is "an exception to the recent trend of authorities," and which he further declares is against allowing dues on the stock to be credited on the loan as an unjust preference. Several cases are cited in the department decision sustaining this rule in its application to the case at bar which it would be unnecessary to again cite save as an orderly enumeration of the decisions in the several states showing how extensively the rule is being adopted and applied. These authorities are B. & L. Ass'n v. Anneston L., etc., Ass'n, 101 Ala. 582, 15 South. 123, 29 L. R. A. 120, 46 Am. St. Rep. 138; Taylor v. Clark, 74 Ark. 220, 85 S. W. 231; Curtis v. Granite P. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

TITLE INS. & TRUST CO. v. CALIFORNIA DEVELOPMENT CO. et al. (DUNCAN, Intervener). (L. A. 2,651.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 18, 1912.
Rehearing Denied Nov. 16, 1912.)

1. MORTGAGES (§ 469*)—FACT OR CONCLUSION—MORTGAGE FORECLOSURE—RECEIVERS—INSUFFICIENT PROPERTY.

The allegation of the complaint in an action to foreclose a mortgage that the property is probably insufficient to discharge the mortgage debt, without a statement of the value of the property or of facts indicating it, is not a sufficient allegation of fact to justify the appointment of a receiver under the clause of Code Civ. Proc. § 564, subd. 2, permitting it in such action where "the property is probably insufficient to discharge the mortgage debt."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 1376-1381; Dec. Dig. § 469.*]

2. MORTGAGES (§ 468*)—FORECLOSURE—RECEIVERS—INJURY TO PROPERTY—SHOWING.

The purpose of Code Civ. Proc. § 564, subd. 2, providing that a receiver may be appointed in an action for foreclosure of a mortgage, where it appears the mortgaged property is in danger of being lost, removed, or materially injured, being only to preserve sufficient of the security to discharge the debt, it is necessary for plaintiff, applying for a receiver only on the ground of danger of material injury, to show that the injury would so depreciate the value of the property that it would not thereafter afford adequate security.

3. MORTGAGES (§ 463*)—FORECLOSURE—RECEIVERS—APPOINTMENT—DISCRETION.

Though the appointment of a receiver under Code Civ. Proc. § 564, subd. 2, authorizing it in an action to foreclose a mortgage where it appears the mortgaged property is in danger of being materially injured is very largely in the discretion of the court, it is an abuse of discretion to order the appointment where the showing of apprehended injury fails to make it appear that the mortgagee's interests and security will be jeopardized by the injury.

4. RECEIVERS (§ 51*)—BOND—EXECUTION—FILLING IN AMOUNT.

Though the undertaking required by Code Civ. Proc. § 566, where a receiver is appointed on ex parte application, and filed complete before the order of appointment, was blank as to the amount thereof when it was signed and acknowledged by the attorney in fact of the guaranty company, and such amount was filled in, when the attorney in fact was absent, by one authorized by him to do so, it was not invalid, if the power of attorney, as it might, empowered the attorney in fact to have this so done.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Cent. Dig. §§ 85-88; Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 934*)—REVIEW—PRESUMPTION.

That the evidence established the authority for the filling in of the amount of an undertaking by a third person after it had been signed and acknowledged by an attorney in fact will be presumed in favor of the holding by the trial court of the validity of the undertaking; it having had before it the power of attorney and the authorization by the attorney in fact to the third person, and they not being in the record.

6. RECEIVERS (§ 51*)—EX PARTE APPOINTMENT—UNDERTAKING.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 566, providing that, "if a receiver is appointed on ex parte application, the court before making the order must require from applicant an undertaking to pay to the defendant" all damages he may sustain by reason of the appointment and the entry of the receiver on his duties, in case the appointment shall have been procured wrongfully, maliciously, or without sufficient cause, the undertaking must run to, or in favor of, all the defendants; and, the undertaking being only in favor of one of them, the appointment, so far as concerns the interests of other defendants, is improper.

7. RECEIVERS (§ 51*)—EX PARTE APPOINTMENT—UNDERTAKING.

Where the undertaking given on appointment of a receiver on an ex parte application ran only in favor of one defendant, whereas, under Code Civ. Proc. § 566, it should have been in favor of all of them, and the court then ordered plaintiff to file a new undertaking running to all of them, ratifying and confirming the original, and providing that the liability on the new one should relate back to and cover all damages caused by the appointment from the time it was made, the new undertaking in accordance with the order validated the appointment, if not from the beginning, at least from the filing of the new undertaking; and also cured any defects in the manner of the execution of the original undertaking.

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1180*)—REVERSAL—APPOINTMENT OF RECEIVER—REVERSAL AS TO SINGLE DEFENDANT.

The reversal on the ground of abuse of discretion of the order appointing a receiver in an action to foreclose a mortgage, being only on appeal of a single defendant, and that, too, an unnecessary party, it being a holder of a subsequent incumbrance, and not having possession or right of possession of any of the property, will not affect the validity of the appointment as to the other parties, or have any effect on the proceedings, other than that such defendant will be entitled to have its incumbrance paid out of the proceeds of any foreclosure sale in preference to costs and expenses occasioned by the receivership.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by the Title Insurance & Trust Company against the California Development Company and others, Boaz Duncan intervening. From an order, defendant the New Liverpool Salt Company appeals. Reversed as to said defendant.

See, also, 159 Cal. 484, 114 Pac. 838.

Page, McCutchen, Knight & Olney, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Lee C. Gates, O'Melveny, Stevens & Millikin, Walter K. Tuller, and Valentine & Newby, all of Los Angeles, for respondents. J. W. McKinley, of Los Angeles, for receiver.

PER CURIAM. The appeal is from an order appointing a receiver. It is taken by the New Liverpool Salt Company alone.

The action was begun to foreclose the lien of a mortgage or deed of trust made by the California Development Company, to secure the payment of certain bonds issued by it. The order appointing the receiver was made ex parte, and was founded on the complaint and the affidavit of one Henry L. Lyon.

We find it necessary to consider but two objections urged against the regularity of the order: First, that the court abused its discretion in making the order upon the facts shown; and, second, that the order is void as to the New Liverpool Salt Company because it was made ex parte, without exacting any undertaking for the protection of that company, as required by section 566 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] 1. We think the facts shown, though not sufficiently lacking in merit to make the order void for want of jurisdiction, were of so little force and effect that we must declare the making of the order an abuse of discretion. The plaintiff attempted to show the causes for appointing receivers set forth in subdivision 2 of section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure. These are, first, "that the mortgaged property is in danger of being lost, removed, or materially injured"; and, second, "that the property is probably insufficient to discharge the mortgage debt."

The only attempt to establish the second ground mentioned consisted of an allegation in the complaint stating "that, as plaintiff is informed and believes and therefore avers, the aforementioned property is probably insufficient to discharge the mortgage debt aforesaid." Neither the value of the property, nor any facts indicating its value, are set forth in the complaint or in the affidavit. The decision in Bank of Woodland v. Stephens, 144 Cal. 660, 79 Pac. 379, is directly to the point that this is not a sufficient allegation of fact to justify the appointment of a receiver under this clause of the section.

[2, 3] The showing under the first clause is also insufficient. The right of a mortgagee to have a receiver take charge of the mortgaged property during the pendency of the action is founded upon the proposition that such action is necessary in order to preserve or protect the interest of the mortgagee. His only interest is the lien of his mortgage, and its extent is measured by the amount of the debt for which the lien is security. The debt is the substantial thing. Unless the security for its ultimate payment is in some way endangered or impaired, he cannot be prejudiced. The purpose of the subdivision in question is to provide the means for his protection against such danger. The second clause, which we have just noticed, is provided to enable him, when his debt is matured, to obtain and apply to its payment the rents, issues, and profits of the property, and it expressly declares that this may be done only when the mortgage is due, and when it appears probable that the property mortgaged is insufficient to pay the debt. The first clause covers different contingencies and dangers, but its purpose is the same, namely, to preserve sufficient of the security to discharge the debt. It covers the contingencies of loss, removal, and material injury. If all the mortgaged property is lost or removed from the jurisdiction, the entire security is gone, and the prejudice to the rights of the mortgagee necessarily ensues, for he is entitled to have such property remain accessible, whatever its value and although it may far exceed the mortgage debt. But, if the danger is only that it may be "materially injured," the relative value of the property, after such injury has been inflicted, and the amount of the debt, must be considered in order to determine whether or not the mortgagee's interests require the court to deprive the mortgagor of his lawful possession of his own property. If the injury, though considerable in extent, will still leave enough of the property remaining intact to be ample security for the debt, the court should not interfere. In such a case the mortgagee can suffer no injury to his interests. It was therefore necessary for the plaintiff, in applying for a receiver, to show, not only that the property mortgaged was in danger of material injury, but also that such injury would so depreciate its value that it would not thereafter afford adequate security for the payment of the outstanding bonds.

The complaint shows that the bonds issued and unpaid amount to $477,920, with interest from July 1, 1908. The mortgaged property is of vast extent. It consists of 318 acres of land in Imperial county on the Colorado river, known as Hanlon's Heading, a large canal, then in course of construction, to carry the water of the Colorado river from said Heading to a point in California over fifty miles distant, to be there sold to the Imperial Water Company and others, the said water company taking 400,000-acre feet per year at the yearly rate of 50 cents per acre foot; a right to take water from said river and also from Volcano Lake in Mexico to supply such purchasers; practically all of the capital stock of a subsidiary company organized under Mexican laws to hold the property and conduct the necessary operations of the system in Mexico, which said Mexican company also holds title to 100,000 acres of land in Mexico; the right to sell the entire capital stock of said Imperial Water Company at $8.75 a share, and appropriate the proceeds to its own use, said company having a capital stock of 100,000 shares; also the easements pertaining to said water system, all buildings, structures, tools, and personal property used in connection therewith, and all lands, rights, franchises and property which the Development Company should thereafter acquire. This mortgage, or deed of trust, was made in 1900. The suit was begun on December 13, 1909. Whether or not the proposed water system had been completed, or how far it has been constructed, does not appear, except by inference. Nothing is said as to the value of this property, or any part thereof, nor as to the extent of the canal.

The only facts tending to show the danger of material injury were those stated in the affidavit of Lyon. From this it appears that somewhere on the Development Company's canal there is a place called "Sharp's Heading," that the "structures" at that heading "are wooden and are old and weak, and that there is imminent danger that said structures may be washed out at any time," unless the same are further protected, that "the only way for the protection of said canal and water system" is to put in new and permanent structures and collateral works, all of which would cost more than $250,000. The affidavit then proceeds as follows: "That said structures at Sharp's Heading are the only suitable place for the handling or putting of the water of said canal into said irrigation system; that, if the same be washed out and destroyed, the irrigation system of said California Development Company would be in a condition that it would be useless, and that water could not be supplied to the Imperial Valley for many months because it would take several months to reconstruct the said structures; that there are other points in said system of irrigation works that are of temporary character of construction; that the same are in constant need of repair; that through flood or other natural causes the same are liable to displacement and destruction, and the effect thereof would deprive irrigators of water and residents of domestic water and materially injure the property; that the only way for the protection of said canal and water system is the construction of permanent and new structures costing, with all collaterals, over $500,000."

This shows that the new structures required to make the system secure against washouts would cost $500,000. But it does not state the value of the existing structures, nor the value of the entire system, nor the value of the other property covered by the mortgage, nor how much that value would be reduced if the apprehended washouts and injuries actually occurred. The injuries from washouts would doubtless be substantial both in value and in character. But neither the extent, the present condition, nor the values of the remaining portions of a system of irrigation works which is probably larger than any other in the state, or of the property of the Mexican company, appears, and it may well be that, even with the injuries accomplished, the property remaining will far exceed the amount due on the bonds, and will constitute abundant security for the payment thereof. If so, there would be no necessity for the appointment of a receiver to incur additional expense to keep the system in operation. The water users would be interested in having that done for their protection, but the bondholders, being otherwise fully secured, would have no interest sufficient to justify such action. The decision of such matters is very largely within the discretion of the lower court. This court should be slow to interfere, with an exercise thereof. But where the showing of apprehended injury fails to make it appear that the mortgagee's or bondholders' interests and security will be jeopardized, it is a clear abuse of discretion to make such an order.

[4, 5] 2. Before the order appointing the receiver was made, the plaintiff, under the direction of the court, procured and filed an undertaking of the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company in the sum of $3,000, in form as provided in section 566 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This undertaking was dated December 13, 1909. It was signed by Catesby C. Thom as attorney in fact for the Guaranty Company, and it was acknowledged by him, as such, on that day in Los Angeles county, and was filed on the same day in Imperial county. At the time it was so signed, the amount of the obligation was not inserted therein. Before it was filed the words "three thousand dollars" were inserted in the appropriate place by a person authorized by said Thom to do so, the same being made at the courthouse in Imperial county, in the absence of said Thom. The person who wrote these words presented to the court written evidence of his authority to do so, and thereupon the undertaking was accepted and approved by the court and the order was made appointing the receiver.

These facts do not invalidate the undertaking. We have not before us the power of attorney whereby Thom was made the attorney in fact of the Guaranty Company, nor the instrument purporting to authorize the other person, in his absence, to write in the amount. Both were sufficient to satisfy the court below of the validity of the undertaking. As error is not presumed, but must be affirmatively shown in order to warrant a reversal of the action of the lower tribunal and no such showing is made, the conclusion of the court on these points must stand. It is legally possible that Thom was empowered by the Guaranty Company to substitute another person as agent to write in the words aforesaid, and, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, it is to be presumed that the evidence presented to the court below established this authority.

[6] The undertaking was that the said surety "does hereby undertake and promise to and with the defendant, California Development Company," that plaintiff would "pay to said defendant all damages it may sustain," etc. It did not purport to run to or in favor of any other defendant. Section 566, Code of Civil Procedure, provides as follows: "If a receiver is appointed upon an ex parte application, the court, before making the order, must require from the applicant an undertaking, with sufficient sureties, in an amount to be fixed by the court, to the effect that the applicant will pay to the defendant all damages he may sustain by reason of the appointment of such receiver and the entry by him upon his duties, in case the applicant shall have procured such appointment wrongfully, maliciously, or without sufficient cause; and the court may, in its discretion, at any time after said appointment, require an additional undertaking." The purpose of this clause was to provide security to each defendant for the recovery of any damages he might suffer from the appointment of a receiver procured wrongfully, maliciously, or without sufficient cause. The undertaking should therefore be in such form that any defendant would have a right of action thereon if he is damaged by the appointment. Consequently the approval of the undertaking running to the California Development Company alone was irregular, and the effect is that the appointment, so far as the interests of the New Liverpool Salt Company are concerned, was improperly made.

[7] It appears that subsequently, on March 24, 1910, this defect in the undertaking was called to the attention of the court below, and that thereupon it ordered the plaintiff to procure and file a new undertaking in the same penal sum, running to all the defendants, ratifying and confirming the original undertaking, and providing that the liability on the undertaking last filed should relate back to and cover all damages caused by the appointment from the time it was made. This was immediately done. It is unnecessary to say whether or not this undertaking operated to make the appointment of the receiver valid from the beginning. At all events it would operate to make it valid from the time of the filing of the second undertaking, and it would also cure any defects in the manner of the execution of the original undertaking.

[8] As the receivership is still pending in the court below and the receiver is, presumably, in charge of the property and operating it for the benefit of the other parties, it is proper to consider the effect of a reversal of the order appointing him when such reversal is upon the appeal of a single defendant. The New Liverpool Salt Company was not a necessary party to the action. The only interest it has, so far as the record shows, is its claim that it has some right or interest in the premises described in the deed of trust, which interest or right is subsequent and subordinate to the lien created by said deed. It is not claimed or suggested that it has either the possession or the right of possession of any of the said property. At the time the action was begun the California Development Company was in possession. A receiver to take charge and control of the property could, therefore, have been appointed without making the Salt Company a party to the action, or giving it any notice thereof. The result of the omission to do so would be that its rights or interests would not be bound for any costs or expenses occasioned by the appointment of the receiver or his proceedings thereunder. If, as appears to be understood, it is a holder of some of the bonds or of a subsequent incumbrance on a part of the property, it would have the right to have such incumbrance or bonds paid out of the proceeds of any foreclosure sale in preference to the costs and expenses occasioned by the receivership. The reversal of the order upon this appeal upon the grounds above mentioned will, therefore, not affect its validity as to the other parties to the action, or have any effect upon the proceedings other than as above stated. It will inure only to the benefit of the said Salt Company as its interests may appear.

The order is reversed, in so far as it affects the New Liverpool Salt Company, but not as to the other parties.

PEOPLE'S WATER CO. v. LEWIS et al.
(Civ. 946.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, Sept. 6, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 209*)—SCOPE OF REVIEW—QUESTIONS NOT RAISED AT TRIAL.

Where, in ejectment, defendant did not object at the trial to any alleged infirmity in the proof of plaintiff's legal record title, defendant could not object on appeal that there was no proof that the railroad company under which plaintiff claimed the land which was part of a railroad grant had complied with the terms of the grant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1290-1300, 1302½, 1303; Dec. Dig. § 209.*]

2. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 114*)—PATENT—PRIMA FACIE CASE.

Where, in ejectment, plaintiff introduced proof of a conveyance of the land in controversy from a railroad company to which the land had been granted by an act of Congress, the patent constituted prima facie evidence that the railroad company had performed all the conditions of the grant so as to entitle it to a patent; the burden of proving the contrary being on defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. §§ 314-322; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

3. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 116*)—RAILROAD LANDS—LAND GRANT—PATENT—EJECTMENT.

Where agricultural land was granted by the United States government to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and, after the filing of the location of the road, was patented to it without reservation, the patent was a conclusive determination by the government that the land was subject to the grant and that the conditions had been complied with, unless it appeared that the patent was absolutely void on its face on the ground that it was issued without authority, was prohibited by statute, or that the land had been reserved from sale, or dedicated to a special purpose, etc.

4. EJECTMENT (§ 86*)—LEGAL TITLE—POSSESSION—PRESUMPTION.

Where plaintiff in ejectment established the legal title to property it would be presumed that he had possession of the land within the time required by law, and that defendant's occupancy was in subordination to plaintiff's legal title, which presumption could be overturned only by sufficient evidence that defendant held the property adversely for five years prior to the commencement of the action, provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 321.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. §§ 238-245; Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

5. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 86*)—PAYMENT OF TAXES.

Where defendant in ejectment claimed land adversely and testified that he attempted to have the land assessed for taxes to him but failed and it appeared that he had neither paid nor tendered the taxes assessed on the land for the required five years he did not acquire title by adverse possession under the statute, providing that in no case shall adverse possession be considered established, unless it is shown that the claimant or his predecessors paid all the taxes levied and assessed on the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 504; Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Action by the People's Water Company against John Doe Lewis (Edward William Lues) and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Edward William Lues appeals. Affirmed.

P. M. Bruner, of Oakland, and F. W. Taft, of San Francisco, for appellant. Tom M. Bradley and Harry E. Leach, both of Oakland, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The facts of this case are few and simple, and the law involved therein is plain and well settled. The complaint in ejectment was in the usual form. The answer denied to plaintiff ownership of any part of the property or any interest therein, admitted possession by appellant, set up title by prescription, and pleaded the statute of limitations. The appeal is from the judgment in favor of plaintiff.

At the trial, without objection, contest, or contradiction, the legal record title was shown to be in respondent. By mesne conveyances it was connected directly with a United States patent, embracing the land in controversy, issued December 21, 1901, to the Central Pacific Railroad Company. The only claim made by appellant in the court below was that he had acquired title by adverse possession.

[1] In this court there is an additional contention that there was an infirmity in the proof of the legal record title, inasmuch as it was not shown that the said railroad company had complied with the terms prescribed by the act of Congress as the condition upon which the land should be granted by the government. It would be singular, indeed if a litigant were permitted to keep his lips closed in the trial court and to speak loud enough to be heard in the appellate tribunal, and to maintain such an attack upon a patent issued with all the formalities of law. These solemn instruments of conveyance are surely entitled to greater consideration than is implied by appellant's argument.

[2] Even if the objection had been made at the trial, manifestly the patent would be at least prima facie evidence of the facts therein recited, and, if said recitals could be controverted at all in such proceeding as this, the law would impose the burden of proof upon the one assailing the integrity of the instrument.

[3] The effect of a patent to land issued by the government is fully discussed in Standard Quicksilver Co. v. Habishaw, 132 Cal. 115, 64 Pac. 113, and it is probably sufficient to refer to that case with the authorities therein cited. The aptness of the following quotation, therein made from Gale v. Best, 78 Cal. 235, 20 Pac. 550, 12 Am. St. Rep. 44, can hardly be disputed: "The rule is well settled by numerous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that, when a law of Congress provides for the disposal and patenting of certain public lands upon the ascertainment of certain facts, the proper officers of the Land Department of the general government have jurisdiction to inquire into and determine those facts, that the issuance of a patent is an official declaration that such facts have been found in favor of the patentee, and that in such a case the patent is conclusive in a court of law, and cannot be attacked collaterally."

* * * Our opinion is that where a patent issues for public land, under a law which provides for its disposal as agricultural land—either to a railroad company, or to pre-emption or homestead claimants—and there is no reservation in the law except a general one of mineral lands, and no reservation at all in the patent, then the patent must be considered as a conclusive determination by the government that the land is agricultural; and afterwards, in an action in a court of law, it is not competent to reopen the question of the character of the land." Of course, as pointed out in the Habishaw Case, there is a well-known exception to the foregoing doctrine recognized by the decisions where the department has no jurisdiction to dispose of the lands—"that is, if a patent be absolutely void upon its face, or were issued without authority or were prohibited by statute, or if the lands had been reserved from sale, or dedicated to special purposes, the patent may be collaterally impeached; that is, it may be shown by anyone to be void." It is clear that there is nothing disclosed here to bring the case within the exception, even if the point had been made in the court below. The fact is that it is made manifest by the recitals of the patent that the title to the property vested in the railroad company in 1870 as in that year the demands of the grant by the act of Congress had been fully met. It is said in Southern Pac. R. R. Co. v. Whitaker, 109 Cal. 272, 41 Pac. 1084, "that the grant to the railroad company was a grant in present, and operated to vest in the grantee a perfect title to the granted lands, when the map of the definite location of the road was filed in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office is no longer an open question. It has been so held by numerous decisions rendered in similar cases by the Supreme Court of the United States and by this court. And thereafter the grantee could have maintained an action for the possession of any such lands, without waiting for the issuance of a patent therefor. Curtner v. United States, 149 U. S. 675 [12 Sup. Ct. 985, 1041, 37 L. Ed. 890], and cases cited; Forrester v. Scott, 92 Cal. 402 [28 Pac. 575]; Jatunn v. Smith, 95 Cal. 154 [30 Pac. 200]."

[4] After proving as aforesaid the record legal title, plaintiff introduced evidence showing that the property was assessed from the year 1898 to 1910, inclusive, and then rested. From a judicial standpoint, then, this situation was presented: Plaintiff, having established a legal title to the property, is presumed to have been possessed thereof within the time required by law and the occupation of the property by defendant to have been under and in subordination to the legal title, and this presumption can only be overcome by sufficient evidence on the part of appellant that he had held and possessed the property adversely to such legal title for five years before the commencement of the action. Section 321, Code Civ. Proc.; Ross v. Evans, 65 Cal. 440, 4 Pac. 443; McNoble v. Justiniano, 70 Cal. 395, 11 Pac. 742; Southern Pacific Railroad Co. v. Whitaker, supra; Standard Quicksilver Co. v. Habishaw, supra. The elements that constitute this "adverse" holding are quite familiar and need not be re-stated. Sec. 325, Code Civ. Proc.; Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 586, 49 Am. Rep. 100.

As to these, it may be said that it would at least be a fair inference that appellant's occupancy was not under a claim of right in view of his testimony that "I went to the assessor's office, Henry Jones, and told him I was living on the land and I would like to have the land assessed to me, and he asked me if I had title to the land and I told him no, and he said he could not assess it to me then." It is no doubt true that the "acts and declarations of the party respecting his claim at any time while in possession before commencement of the action, whether within or after five years after the commencement of his possession would be admissible as tending to show the character in which he claimed during the whole time," and whether the possession is adverse must be determined from all the evidence in the case. Cannon v. Stockton, 36 Cal. 535, 95 Am. Dec. 205.

[5] This feature of the case, however, may be passed without further comment, as it is plain that the lower court was entirely justified in concluding that appellant had utterly failed to satisfy the requirement of the Code "that in no case shall adverse possession be considered established under the provisions of any section or sections of this Code unless it shall be shown * * * and the party or persons, their predecessors and grantors, have paid all the taxes, state, county or municipal, which have been levied and assessed upon the land." Appellant testified: "I have known the lands for about 12 years. They were not occupied by an person when I first became acquainted with them, and I then settled upon them. I went to the land office and tried to file on it and they would not let me file on it. I went twice to file on it, and they would not let me file on them." He detailed also the improvements that he made on the land, and in the cross-examination the following questions and answers appear: "Did you ever pay any taxes on it? A. There was none assessed against me to pay on it. Q. Did you ever pay any taxes on it? A. There was none assessed on it to me, I couldn't pay it. Q. Did you ever pay any taxes? A. Not on the land I didn't." It is thus to be seen that appellant, in one vital respect, has fallen short of establishing his title by prescription. He attempts to excuse his failure on the ground that he was prevented from making the required payment. This explanation is sought to be shown by an affirmative answer to the leading question of his counsel: "I understood you to say that you had offered to pay all taxes that were assessed?" But it does not appear in any manner when or to whom this offer was made or whether it was ever repeated. The witness probably referred to the occasion aforesaid when he requested that the property be assessed to him. No case has been cited, and it is believed none could be found in which it has been held that, under similar circumstances, there has been a compliance with the plain provision of the statute.

The decisions upon which appellant relies can afford him no comfort, and in their facts are so unlike this as to be hardly instructive. As pointed out by respondent, the sentence quoted by appellant from McNoble v. Justiniano, 70 Cal. 395, 11 Pac. 742, relates to a supposititious case different from the one before us. As to that, even, the Supreme Court ventured only the tentative suggestion that a different question "might" have been presented. It is hardly necessary to add that a legal doctrine cannot be safely anchored to a "perhaps" or "might have been." But the statement which seems to afford to appellant some satisfaction is preceded by the declaration of the necessity for the payment of the taxes by the defendant, and it was held that he was not relieved of the duty by reason of the fact that the property was assessed to others in with a larger tract, it being said that: "Under the circumstances the defendant was not relieved of the consequence of a failure to pay the taxes by the fact (if such be the fact) that after the assessment was made he could not pay the taxes on the land of which he claimed the possession without paying those assessed on the larger tract including such land."

In Cavanaugh v. Jackson, 99 Cal. 672, 34 Pac. 509, the claimant had paid the taxes as required by the statute, and the vital question was as to whether the payment by the owner of the record title rendered ineffective the payment by the defendant who claimed title by prescription, and the court held that "The fact that the owner of the land has also had the land assessed to him during the five-year period, and has paid the taxes levied thereon, does not affect the rights of the adverse possessor, who has continuously paid or tendered the taxes assessed to himself, regardless of the time or priority of payment of taxes by them respectively." In Owsley v. Matson, 156 Cal. 401, 104 Pac. 983, the taxes were also paid by the claimant for the term prescribed by the statute. The principal question involved grew out of the circumstances that there was a redemption of the property by the adverse possessor and also a double assessment of the property. It was rightly held by the Supreme Court that: "Where a tax on the land adversely possessed is allowed to become delinquent and a sale has taken place, and, so far as appears, a redemption has been made thereof in good faith by the adverse possessor or his successor in interest while in undisturbed possession, such redemption operates as a payment of the tax, within the terms of the statute requiring the adverse possessor to pay the taxes upon the property claimed." As to the other question, the McNoble Case was followed in holding that it was immaterial that the land was also assessed to the owner of the record title and the taxes paid by him. In Glowner v. De Alvarez, 10 Cal. App. 194, 101 Pac. 432, the decision was against the adverse claimant for the reason that he had paid the taxes for only four years, and the levy for the fifth year was paid by the owner of the record title. Therein it was said that "title by adverse possession cannot be established by merely showing that the land has been occupied and claimed for five years continuously, when all taxes assessed against the property are paid by the possessor for four years only, and the taxes for the fifth year have been paid by the owner, though assessed against the possessor." It was properly held that the assessment for taxation is of the property, and not against the owner or possessor, and that "the adverse possessor must be as vigilant to pay all taxes assessed against the property as in holding the possession of the land, and, if he fails by reason of the payment of one tax by the owner before his title has accrued, he fails entirely."

In consonance with the plain terms of the law, there is no doubt that for five consecutive years the claimant must pay all the taxes assessed against the property or at least tender such payment during the same period.

To so hold is to affirm the judgment of the lower court, and it is so ordered.

MOORE v. WILLIAMS, County Auditor.
(Civ. 1,021.)

{District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 5, 1912. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 4, 1912.)

1. INFANTS (§ 12*)—DEPENDENCY—DELINQUENCY—APPLICATION OF STATUTE—PERSONS UNDER 21 YEARS OF AGE—"MINORS."

The fact that Civ. Code, §§ 25, 27, defines minors as males under 21 and females under 18 years of age, did not deprive the Legislature of the right to pass Juvenile Court Law (St. 1911, p. 658), declaring that various acts shall constitute dependency and delinquency, and shall apply to all persons under 21, whether male or female.

2. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 48*)—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS—VIOLATION.

Before an act will be declared unconstitutional, it must be made clearly apparent that the act is violative of some provision of the Constitution and inconsistent therewith, since, if there is a reasonable doubt as to the validity of the act, its constitutionality must be upheld.

3. STATUTES (§ 109*)—TITLE—SUBJECTS.

Const. art. 4, § 24, providing that every act shall embrace but one subject which shall be expressed in its title, was designed mainly to prevent Legislatures and the public from being entrapped by misleading titles to bills, whereby legislation relating to one subject might be obtained under the title relating to another, so that, where the provisions of the act are generally germane to the title, it will not be held violative of such provision.

4. STATUTES (§ 111*)—TITLE—JUVENILE COURT LAW.

Juvenile Court Law (St. 1911, p. 658), entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act concerning dependent and delinquent minor children, providing for their care, custody and maintenance until 21 years of age,' etc., and providing in the body of the act for jurisdiction over delinquent and dependent females until they arrive at the age of 21, or are married with the consent of the court, was not unconstitutional as containing matter not within the subject in violation of Const. art. 4, § 24, in that the title refers to all persons sought to be included in the act as minors, while females are declared, by Civ. Code, §§ 25, 27, to become adults at the age of 18 years.

5. STATUTES (§ 105*)—TITLE.

The title of an act is no essential part of it, and but for Const. art. 4, § 24, declaring that every act shall embrace but one subject which shall be expressed in its title, no title would be necessary.

6. STATUTES (§ 78*)—SPECIAL LEGISLATION.

The Legislature having absolute power to classify persons by their age for the purpose of dealing with them as dependent or delinquent persons within a regulatory statute, Juvenile Court Law (St. 1911, p. 658) was not violative of Const. art. 4, § 24, as special legislation, in that there was no natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction justifying the classification by making such act applicable only to persons under 21 years of age.

Application for a writ of mandate by Mrs. J. H. Moore against L. P. Williams, as county auditor of Sacramento county. Writ granted.

W. H. Devlin, of Sacramento, for petitioner. R. Platnauer, of Sacramento, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Mandamus. The petition shows that plaintiff is and at all times herein mentioned she was the duly appointed and acting assistant probation officer of the county of Sacramento, with a salary fixed by law at $100 per month, as provided by section 10f of the act of the Legislature approved April 5, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 658); that, by reason of the provisions of said act, she was entitled to receive a warrant from defendant on the 1st day of July, 1912, for the sum of $100 for her services as such officer for and during the month of June, 1912; that the county of Sacramento is a county of the sixth class, as provided in said act; that defendant is the duly qualified and acting auditor of said county and as such it is his duty, on the 1st of each month, to issue a warrant, drawn on the county treasurer of said county, to each person holding an office therein in payment of his or her salary as fixed by law; that on July 1, 1912, plaintiff demanded of defendant a warrant for said sum in payment of her said salary for June, but defendant refused to issue the same on the ground that said act is unconstitutional and furnishes no authority to comply with said demand; that there are funds in the treasury of said county available for the payment of said warrant to which plaintiff is entitled.

The constitutionality of the act referred to is raised by a general demurrer to the petition and is challenged on two grounds: First. The subject-matter thereof is not expressed in its title, as required by section 24, article 4, of the Constitution. Second. The act, in so far as it creates a class amenable to its provisions, namely, persons under the age of 21 years, is special legislation, and is in contravention of section 25 of article 4 of the Constitution. Third. It is also contended that the provisions of the act creating the office of assistant probation officer and fixing the salary of such office cannot stand, if the provisions relating to "delinquent and dependent persons" are unconstitutional.

1. The "Juvenile Court Law," as it is designated by the act of 1911, is in all its essential features, and in respect of its principal objects and purposes, substantially the same as the act of 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 213), of which it is a re-enactment, except in this particular, namely, section 1 of the act of 1909 provides that it "shall apply to children under the age of eighteen years" while section 1 of the act of 1911 provides that the act "shall apply only to persons under the age of twenty-one years." In section 1 of the act of 1909 it is provided that: "For the purposes of this act, the words 'dependent child' shall mean any person under the age of eighteen years," who is found doing certain enumerated acts or who is in a certain defined condition, set forth in sixteen different subdivisions of the section; and, by the same section, it is provided that, "The words 'delinquent child' shall include any person under the age of eighteen years," who violates any law of the state or ordinance of any city, county or town, defining crime. The act of 1911 contains some amendments of the act of 1909, increasing the number of assistant probation officers in some counties, changing the salaries of officers, leaving some unchanged and adding some counties to the list of counties classified in respect of the number of officers and their salaries; but, in its general scope, in its scheme, and in the provisions of the various sections for the betterment of the class of persons sought to be dealt with and to promote the general welfare, the act of 1911, in no essential respect, which can in the slightest degree affect its constitutionality, differs from that of 1909, except in the one particular above pointed out. And in this particular the only objection made is that the act embraces females over 18 years and under 21 years, whereas the title of the act, as is claimed, refers only to "minor children." The argument is that these terms must necessarily mean minors as defined by the Civil Code; that is, males under 21 and females under 18 years of age (Civ. Code, §§ 25, 27), and hence follows the violation insisted upon.

The title of the act of 1909 is repeated in the title of the act of 1911, which latter is as follows: "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act concerning dependent and delinquent minor children, providing for their care, custody and maintenance until twenty-one years of age; providing for their commitment to the Whittier State School and the Preston State School of Industry, and the manner of such commitment and release therefrom, establishing a probation committee and probation officers to deal with such children, and fixing the salaries of probation officers; providing for detention homes for said children; providing for the punishment of persons responsible for, or contributing to, the dependency or delinquency of children; and giving to the superior court jurisdiction of such offenses, and repealing inconsistent acts,' approved March 8, 1909." The act of 1909 has been before the appellate courts of the state in the following cases: Nicholl v. Koster, 157 Cal. 416, 108 Pac. 302; In re Sing, 13 Cal. App. 736, 110 Pac. 693; In re Sing, 14 Cal. App. 512, 112 Pac. 582; In re Magennis, 43 Cal. Dec. 187, 121 Pac. 723. The principal question now presented, however, did not arise in any case, so far as we have discovered. But the purposes and objects aimed at by the act were before the courts and were clearly stated. These juvenile courts, which are in fact but an extension of the jurisdiction of the superior courts, are the creation of modern philanthropic endeavor and are designed to and in fact do provide a most excellent means of restraining and reforming wayward persons who, unchecked, may become a menace to society. Mr. Justice Shaw, in Nicholl v. Koster, 157 Cal. 416, 110 Pac. 693, said: "The main purpose of the act is to provide for the care and custody of children who have shown, or who from lack of care are likely to develop, criminal tendencies, in order to have them trained to good habits and correct principles. To accomplish this, it gives additional jurisdiction and power to the superior courts of the state and provides officers necessary for the execution of that jurisdiction and power. It is an exercise of the police power of the state, through the judicial department. It is a matter which concerns the whole state as much as any other exercise of the judicial system. These have been held to be matters of state policy." All this is equally true of the act of 1911 in so far as it applies to males under the age of 21 years, and in so far also as it applies to females under the age of 18, for they are minors, as above defined, and it is conceded that if the act of 1911 had been limited to the sexes of these ages, respectively, the act would have been valid.

[1] Putting aside for the moment the statutory definition of minority, we do not doubt the power of the Legislature, as we shall endeavor to show further along, to make the provisions found in this act equally applicable to males and females under the age of 21 years, for, when we come to consider what the act declares shall constitute "dependency" and "delinquency," it will be seen that the sex of the person or, for that matter, the age, is a negligible quantity. Briefly, as appears by section 1, in case of a "dependent person," he is any person (1-2) found begging; (3) or is a vagrant; (4) or is found wandering without any settled abode or any proper guardianship; (5) or who has no parent or guardian, or none capable or willing to exercise parental control; (6) or who is destitute; (7) or whose home, by reason of neglect, cruelty or depravity of his parents or guardian, or person having care of him, is an unfit place; (8) or who frequents the company of reputed criminals, vagrants or prostitutes; (9) or who is found living in a house of prostitution; (10) or who visits, habitually, saloons without parent or guardian; (11) or who persistently refuses to obey the reasonable orders of parents or guardian; (12) or who is incorrigible—that is, beyond the control of parent or guardian by reason of the vicious conduct or nature of such person; (13) or whose father is dead or has abandoned his family or is a habitual drunkard or such person is destitute and without a suitable home or means of making an honest living, or is in danger of leading a dissolute and immoral life; (14) or is an habitual truant, within the meaning of a certain designated law; (15) or who habitually uses intoxicating liquor as a beverage, or habitually smokes cigarettes or habitually uses opium, cocaine, morphine or other drug without the direction of a physician; (16) or who from any cause is in danger of growing up to lead an idle, dissolute or immoral life. In the case of a "delinquent person," he is any one who violates any law of the state, or ordinance of any city, town, or county defining crime.

These provisions of the law are mentioned at this point to show that sex has little to do with the purpose of the act and that they are equally applicable to males and females of like age.

It seems to us that the general aim and purpose of the legislation must be kept in view when we approach the precise question now under discussion on which the defendant relies. It is important to remember that this aim and purpose were the same in both acts with the single exception that the class of persons on whom the law was to operate was slightly enlarged.

Section 24, art. 4, of the Constitution, is as follows: "Every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title. But if any subject shall be embraced in an act which shall not be referred to in its title, such act shall be void only as to so much thereof as shall not be expressed in its title."

[2, 3] Before the courts will declare an act unconstitutional, it must be made clearly apparent that the act is violative of some provision of the Constitution and inconsistent with it. If there is a reasonable doubt as to the validity of the act, its constitutionality must be upheld. Deyoe v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 476, 74 Pac. 28, 98 Am. St. Rep. 73. This provision of the Constitution has had frequent examination by our Supreme Court. In the recent case of In re Maginnis, 121 Pac. 723, Mr. Justice Sloss quoted from Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 226, 24 Pac. 383, as follows: "The constitutional provisions with respect to titles of acts were designed mainly to prevent Legislatures and the public from being entrapped by misleading titles to bills whereby legislation relating to one subject might be obtained under the title to another." The importance of the question justifies our referring to its more elaborate treatment in Ex parte Liddell, 93 Cal. 633, 29 Pac. 251. The act in that case was entitled: "An act to establish a state reform school for juvenile offenders, and to make appropriation therefor." We quote: "The object of the provision is to prevent legislative abuse—to prevent the passage of acts bearing deceitful and misleading titles. It is intended to protect the members of the Legislature, as well as the public, against fraud; to guard against the passage of bills the titles of which give no intimation to the members of the Legislature or to the people of the matters contained therein. * * * In Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 229 [24 Pac. 383], we held it was not necessary that the title of the act should embrace an abstract of its contents. The cases cited therein show that such is the view taken by the courts of other states; and, on reflection, it must appear that this conclusion is based upon the soundest principles of constitutional construction. It certainly was not intended that the title should be a repetition of the provisions found in the body of the bill. The object was to prevent deception by the inclusion of matters incongruous with the subject specified in the title. If the title contains a reasonable intimation of the matters under legislative consideration, the public cannot complain. It has always been the custom to state the subject of a bill in general terms and with the fewest words, and the framers of the Constitution doubtless intended the Legislature to conform to that custom. [Citing cases.] Numerous provisions having one general object fairly indicated by the title may be united. When the general purpose of the act is declared, the details provided for the accomplishment of that purpose will be regarded as necessary incidents. * * * The title of the act clearly shows what the Legislature intended to accomplish, and the provisions referred to simply conduce to that object. They are auxiliary to and promotive of the main purpose of the act, and have a 'necessary and natural connection' therewith. They are germane to the subject stated in the title of the act. There is no attempt to conceal the purpose or scope of the act; and no attempt in the act itself to blend diverse and independent subjects. It is admitted that the constitutional provision under consideration has always been given a liberal construction; and this must be so, because the Constitution itself does not define the degree of particularity with which a title shall specify the subject of a bill. The matter must therefore be left largely to legislative discretion. [Citing authorities.] While it is the duty of the court to place such a construction upon this constitutional provision as will prevent mischievous and vicious legislation, we should guard against such a rigorous interpretation of the language as will impale upon its sharp points the good with the bad." Mr. Black says: "It is sufficient if the title is comprehensive enough to reasonably include, as falling within the general subject, and as subordinate branches thereof, the several objects which the statute assumes to effect." Again: "But the courts in dealing with a question of this kind will not be solicitous to overthrow the statute. On the contrary, they will give the Legislature the benefit of every doubt, and will endeavor to so read the title and the act as to make the one adequate to express the subject of the other. * * * Hypercriticism is utterly out of place, the only requirement being that the title of the statute shall express its object in a general way, so as to be intelligible to the ordinary reader"—citing cases. Black on Constitutional Law, p. 329. With these rules as a guide, let us look at the title and the body of the act, for both are to be consulted.

[4] The stress of defendant's argument is placed upon the use of the words "minor children," and the fact that only children "under the age of 18" are dealt with in the act of 1909, i. e., minors. But the title expressly states that the act concerns "dependent and delinquent minor children, providing for their care, custody and maintenance until twenty-one years of age." And section 20 of both acts provides that the court "shall retain the jurisdiction of any person who is found delinquent until such person attains majority, or if a girl, until she attains the age of twenty-one years, unless she is married with the consent of the court, or until said court is satisfied that said person has fully reformed and that further direction and supervision under this act are unnecessary for said person's reformation." Similar provision is found in the act creating the Whittier State School. Act March 11, 1889 (St. 1889, p. 111), and amendatory acts. Amendment April 19, 1909 (St. 1909, p. 988) §§ 16, 16a. The act of 1909 clearly contemplated that, when the court had once obtained jurisdiction of a female, it could retain that jurisdiction beyond the period of minority, for, as we have endeavored to show, the chief object of dealing with delinquents was reformation. If jurisdiction could be thus retained of a female beyond the period of minority we can see no reason why, under the same title, the Legislature might not in the first instance give the court jurisdiction and extend it beyond the period of minority. The act shows by its title that it had for its subject the conferring upon the superior court new and important jurisdiction over new and important matters, to wit, the power to commit persons to certain reformatory institutions then in existence—the Whittier State School and the Preston State School of Industry, providing for detention homes for persons, establishing a probation committee and probation officers to deal with the persons affected by the act. It is true that the title mentioned dependent and delinquent minor children as one of the subjects of the act, but even this did not include all minor males, for the act of 1909 applied only to persons under the age of 18 years. We cannot see how members of the Legislature or ordinary readers could justify a claim that they were misled or hoodwinked into the belief that the title concerned only minors as defined by the Code, and, relying on this supposed fact, looked no further and offered no opposition. The title gave warning that these subjects of the act—minor children—including females, were to be cared for, taken into custody and maintained until 21 years of age. Thus the title was specific enough to notify all persons that it was proposed to exercise some sort of supervision over females until 21 years of age. But the title also embraced other important subjects which challenged notice and forbade the legislator from withholding his attention on the bare assumption that the proposed act related only to minors as defined by the Code and hence need not interest him.

[5] The title to an act is no essential part of the act, and but for the constitutional provision would not be necessary at all. The Constitution makes it necessary to give the act a title, and it is for the purpose above shown. We are not to exalt the title to a dignity and importance beyond its purpose reasonably regarded. We are not permitted to select a single word in the title and ignore the remaining subjects in order to build up a theory on which to declare the act void, but we must look at the entire title to discover whether the Legislature or the public were entrapped by its misleading language, and were thus led to permit legislation to pass unchallenged which was incongruous with the subjects specified in the title. We think it may be safely said of the provisions of the act in question as was said of the state reform school act, in Ex parte Liddell, supra: "The title of the act clearly shows what the Legislature intended to accomplish, and the provisions referred to simply conduce to that object. They are auxiliary to and promotive of the main purpose of the act, and have a 'necessary and natural connection' therewith. They are germane to the subject stated in the title of the act. There is no attempt to conceal the purpose or scope of the act, and no attempt in the act itself to blend diverse and independent subjects." Plaintiff suggests that the word "minors," as used in the title, may be rejected as surplusage. This we are not permitted to do; but we are permitted to regard it in its relation to the other subjects of the title and to the general purpose and scope of the act, in order to determine whether it was misleading to such extent as to render the entire act void. We are authorized "to so read the title and the act as to make the one adequate to express the subject of the other," and to see whether "the title of the statute shall express its object in a general way, so as to be intelligible to the ordinary reader." Black on Const. Law, supra. Defendant, on the other hand, would read the title of an act of the Legislature as though it were a contract to be strictly construed regardless of the rules of construction applicable in ascertaining the force which must be given to this provision of the Constitution, and regardless of the purpose which commentators and the courts have uniformly held to be the object to be attained by it. We think the subject of the act is sufficiently expressed in its title to meet the requirements of the Constitution.

[6] 2. The objection that such a law is violative of section 25, art. 4, of the Constitution, as special legislation, is based on the assumption that there is no natural or intrinsic or constitutional distinction justifying such a classification. It is admitted that a classification based on the age of minority of the sexes would not violate the Constitution, as has been held, at least inferentially, in sustaining the act of 1909. But it cannot be doubted that the Legislature may enact that any person, male or female, under the age of 21 years, is a minor, and, if such were the law, it is conceded that this act could stand. It is illogical, therefore, to say that the Legislature can deal with a person as a delinquent or dependent who has been declared by the Legislature to be a minor of the age of 21 years, but cannot deal with a person of that age as a dependent or delinquent who has not been declared to be a minor. Such a position is wholly untenable for the reason that whether the person is or is not a legally declared minor is beside the question. The natural or intrinsic distinction which must characterize the classification in the case here is doubtless much the same as exists as the basis for classifying persons as minors. This distinction the Legislature has said, and its constitutionality is not doubted, exists as to females at the age of 18 and as to males at the age of 21. It is not necessary to explore the reason for this distinction or the reason for the difference in age between the sexes. Suffice it to say that there is not, physiologically or otherwise, a difference which would forbid our holding that a female may be dealt with as a dependent or delinquent under the age of 21 equally with a male. The road to ruin is as accessible to a female under the age of 21 as it is to a male. To accomplish the beneficent objects of the law, the state may properly reach out its saving hand to rescue males and females alike who are on the downward path. No sound reason can be suggested why the state may not do this to save a female under the age of 21 if it may do so to rescue and save a male of that age. There is no sound reason why a female of equal age with the male may not be declared to be a "delinquent" for violating a state law defining crime. A female at the age of 19 or 20 years cannot be said to differ much from the day she was 18, and at 18 she is about the same as she was the day before. It cannot be said that the Legislature, in fixing the maximum age at 21 at which it would deal with persons for "dependency" or "delinquency," was acting any more arbitrarily than in fixing the limit at 18. The period of majority for both male and female is a matter within the legislative discretion to determine. We can see no reason why the Legislature may not classify persons by their age for the purpose of dealing with them as dependent or delinquent persons within the provisions of a regulatory statute such as the juvenile court law.

The Legislature has placed the age of consent by the female at 16 years. She becomes an adult at 18. She cannot vote until she is 21. She may become a party to the violation of her chastity at 16 and the sharer in her undoing escape punishment for what would have been a crime the day before she had reached that age. She may enter into contract at 18, but she cannot, by her vote, aid in making laws or in selecting officers to administer them until she is 21 years of age. It is idle to speculate as to the reasons for these distinctions. They are made and the power to make them is no longer disputed. It would be equally idle to speculate as to the reason impelling the Legislature to place delinquent and dependent females on the same footing with males and fixing the limit of age of both at 21 years.

Counsel for defendant has ably presented his points, and it must be admitted that his view has much force. We think, however, that it rests upon a too technical application of the rules of construction and overlooks the broader interpretation of those rules which should be resorted to in upholding laws admittedly of great public importance.

Inasmuch as we find no ground for holding the law to be unconstitutional it becomes unnecessary to consider defendant's third point. Clearly, the Legislature had the power to provide all the officers necessary for the due execution of the law. Ex parte Liddell, supra; Nicholl v. Koster, supra.

Let the writ issue.

TUBBS v. DELILLO. (Civ. 958, 954.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, Sept. 6, 1912. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 4, 1912.)

1. CONTRACTS (§ 312*)—BUILDING CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION—BREACH.

Where a building contract provided for payments as the work progressed, and that, if the owner delayed in making any payment for more than five days after it became due, such delay, at the contractor's option, should be deemed a prevention by the owner of the performance of the contract, and it appeared that at the time the fifth installment was demanded a considerable portion thereof, in addition to the amount paid thereon, was payable both on the contract and for extras, the owner's refusal to make further payment of such installments placed him in default, and entitled the contractor to recover the balance due for the work performed.

2. CONTRACTS (§ 316*)—BUILDING CONTRACT—BREACH BY OWNER—WAIVER.

Where a building contract was breached by the owner's refusal to make payments as provided for, the contractor's continuance of the work for a few days after the time for such payment expired was a mere favor to the owner, and did not waive the contractor's right to treat the owner's failure to pay as a breach of the contract.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1033*)—FINDINGS—PREJUDICE.

Where a building contractor testified as to the value of various items of extras, all of which amounted to $643, the owner was not prejudiced by a finding that they were only of the value of $577.20, which was the sum allowed.

4. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 10*)—DEMAND FOR ARBITRATION—EFFECT.

Where a building contract provided that any dispute respecting the valuation of extra work done or work omitted should be referred to and decided by arbitrators, and, on the owner's breach of contract, the contractor made and repeated a written demand for arbitration, which was ignored, the arbitration provision was no objection to the contractor's right to sue.

7. CONTRACTS (§ 335*)—BUILDING CONTRACT—ACTION—PLEADING.

In an action by a building contractor for work, labor, and materials seeking to recover against the owner only a personal judgment for the reasonable value thereof, independent of lien, the complaint was not defective for failure to allege that the materials furnished were actually used in the construction of the building, or that it had been completed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by C. T. Tubbs and others against Rosario Delillo and J. Kramer and others, interveners. From a judgment for plaintiff for less than the relief demanded, he appeals, and defendant prosecutes a cross-appeal. Modified and affirmed.

W. C. Cavitt, of San Francisco, for appellant. Chas. M. Bufford, of San Francisco, and Dave Cosgrove, of Fresno, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. There are two appeals in this case, which, by stipulation, have been submitted on the same record and they will receive consideration in one opinion.

There is a sharp controversy as to some of the facts, but the following are undisputed and are probably sufficient for a general understanding of the case: On the 14th day of March, 1908, C. H. Tubbs and Rosario Delillo entered into a contract in writing, whereby Tubbs agreed to furnish all the labor and material (including tools, implements and appliances) necessary for the construction on a lot of land owned by Delillo in a workmanlike manner of a three-story frame dwelling house and to complete the construction of the same on or before the 11th day of July following, and Delillo promised to pay therefor the sum of $5,000 in seven installments as follows: (1) When the foundation was in, $350; (2) when the frame was up and the roof on, $1,000; (3) when the plumbing was roughed in, $500; (4) when the brown coat of mortar was on, $500; (5) when the white coat of mortar was on, $1,000; (6) when the building was completed, $450; (7) thirty-five days after completion, $1,200. Under said contract each installment was payable on the contractor's written statement showing that the necessary amount of work had been done and materials furnished to entitle him thereto. It was also agreed that, if Delillo delayed the making of any payment for more than five days after the same became due, such delay, at the contractor's option, was to be deemed a prevention by the owner of the performance of the contract. It was further provided that should the owner, at any time during the progress of the work, request any alterations or deviations in, additions to, or omissions from the contract or plans or specifications the contractor should be at liberty to make them and the same should in no way affect or make void the contract; but the amount thereof should be added to or deducted from, the amount of the contract price by a fair and reasonable valuation, and any dispute "respecting the valuation of extra work, work done or work omitted" should be referred to, and decided by, arbitrators. The work was not completed by the contractor, and one of the main points of controversy is whether his relinquishment of further operations on the building should be charged to his default or to that of the owner, and this question invites consideration at the outset. The court found: "That commencing on the 18th day of March, 1908, pursuant to said covenants, specifications, and unwritten understanding, plaintiff Tubbs did excavate defendant's said lot, and did furnish suitable labor and materials, and with them did proceed with the construction of said building upon said lot in a good and workmanlike manner, and, except as the same were altered, as hereinafter set forth, in all respects in accordance with said plans, drawings, and specifications, and on or before the 28th day of May, 1908, had put in the foundation of said building, erected the frame thereof, put on the roof, roughed in the plumbing, and placed the brown and white coats of mortar thereon, and on the 8th day of June, 1908, was still proceeding as aforesaid with said work; that on the 28th day of May, 1908, plaintiff Tubbs did personally deliver to defendant a notice in writing, subscribed by him, and in words and figures as follows: 'San Francisco, Cal., May 28, 1908. Mr. R. Delillo, San Francisco, Cal.—Dear Sir: I hereby notify you that the white coat of plaster is now on your building at South Park and that your payment of $1,000 is now due. * * *' That at all times after the 28th day of May, 1908, plaintiff Tubbs was demanding of defendant the payment of the 5th installment of the contract price of their said contract, but defendant wholly failed to pay any other or greater sum than the sum of $138.85 hereinbefore set forth, and denied that he owed plaintiff Tubbs anything whatsoever on said contract, or for extras, or for deviations, or otherwise." It is not disputed that the owner refused to make any further payment to Tubbs, and it must be said that the record contains evidence to justify the refusal. In view of the decision of the lower court, however, we must, of course, look diligently to find support for the inferences favorable to the contractor's position.

[1] Following this course and without setting out the figures, we reach the conclusion that at least a considerable portion of the said fifth installment, in addition to the said $138.85, was payable at the time the demand therefor was made. The owner's refusal to make any further payment, in the purview of the contract, placed him in default and entitled the contractor to recover the balance due for the work performed.

[2] It would make no difference that the contractor continued to work a few days longer than he was required as this would be rather a favor to the owner.

As to this vital feature of the case, the dispute arises principally from the consideration of the claim of the contractor that he had furnished extras and made changes for which he was entitled to additional compensation. Herein is involved the inquiry whether he was authorized to do this extra work, and, if so, whether he actually performed it, and when he was to be paid and how much, if anything, was due therefor. As we have seen from the contract, the extra work was to be done on the request of the owner. It is found by the court that certain deviations from the plans and specifications and certain additional work were requested by the owner and the contractor followed the request. These are specified in the findings, and the various items are assailed by the owner as unsupported. We deem it unnecessary to set out the evidence seriatim as to these various changes, but it is sufficient to say that the record does contain a substantial showing that all were done and made by the contractor on the request of the owner.

[3] As to the compensation for these extras, the contract provided that a fair and reasonable valuation should be allowed, and the court determined that in the aggregate they were worth the sum of $577.20. There is a slight variance between the evidence for the contractor and the finding as to some of the items of these extras, but the contractor, in his testimony, enumerated the various improvements, giving the value of each, which, according to his estimate, amounted to the sum of $643. As is apparent, this is in excess of the total sum allowed by the court, and the said inaccuracy as to some of the items is entirely without prejudice. The contract did not provide when payment should be due for the extra work, but the contractor testified that: "I stated to Mr. Delillo that it was customary generally to pay for extras when they were completed and that all the extras would have to be paid for; that I had taken the job close and that I couldn't afford to give him any extras. He said all right, he understood that." Including, then, the value of the extras that were completed prior to said May 28th, there was ground, as already stated, for the demand by the contractor for an additional payment.

[4] As to the provision in the contract in reference to arbitration, it may be said that a written demand in proper form was made by the contractor upon the owner for such arbitration, and it was afterward repeated, but it was entirely ignored by the latter.

[5] Reaching the conclusion, therefore, that it is a fair inference from the record that the contractor was justified in withdrawing from further prosecution of the work, the inquiry arises: How much was he entitled to recover? The court found "that the value estimated by the standard of the contract price of plaintiff Tubbs' contract with defendant, of the work and materials bestowed by plaintiff Tubbs in constructing said building, before he ceased work as aforesaid, including the value of unused materials then on the ground, but exclusive of the value of deviations, alterations, and extras done and furnished by plaintiff Tubbs as aforesaid, was the sum of $4,125," that the reasonable value of removing certain old lumber from the premises by the contractor was the sum of $10, and that the value of said extras was the sum of $577.20. The contractor was charged with various payments made to him by the owner amounting to the sum of $2,988.85, with the payment by the owner to materialmen in the sum of $300 and to workmen of $112.35. The balance of the account as stated is $1,311, and the court found that the contractor was entitled to a personal judgment for this amount against the owner, subject, however, to a deduction therefrom of the whole amount of certain liens of other parties that were sustained by the judgment. It may be said that the integrity of this account finds support in the record. It is contended, however, by the contractor that the court should have allowed him compensation for the reasonable value of the work done by him, independent of the contract price. This would be, in accordance with one of the findings, the sum of $4,950, but, as the court credited him with only $4,125 for the work, it would follow that the judgment in favor of the contractor should be increased by $825, and should be rendered for $2,136, instead of $1,311. This is in keeping with the rule laid down in Adams v. Burbank, 103 Cal. 646, 37 Pac. 640, and many other decisions of various jurisdictions. In the Adams Case a landlord entered into a valid contract for the construction of a building upon his land, and, after the partial completion thereof, ousted the contractor and appropriated to his own use the materials already put upon the ground by said contractor. The court held that the contractor was entitled to treat the contract as rescinded, and to recover the reasonable value of the work performed and materials furnished at the request of the owner, and that he was not bound by the contract price agreed upon for the work, and was not limited in his recovery to the payments due on the contract at the time he was prevented from completing it.

In Porter v. Arrowhead Reservoir Co., 100 Cal. 500, 35 Pac. 146, a contract for the construction of a wagon road called for payment in monthly installments, and, upon the failure of the owner to pay an installment when due, the contractor stopped work and sued the owner on a quantum meruit for the value of the work, already done. It was held that, in order to recover, it was necessary for the plaintiff only to show a substantial failure on the part of the owner to comply with the agreement, and in the opinion various cases cited in support of the position, among them being Schwartz v. Saunders, 46 Ill. 18, in which the owner failed to pay the contractor, in the erection of a building, an installment of the contract price, the Supreme Court of that state saying: "That he had a right to abandon the work under the circumstances seems a proposition so plain as to require no argument." And the court concludes that: "A failure to pay an installment of the contract price as provided in the contract is a substantial breach of the contract, and gives the contractor the right to consider the contract at an end, cease work, and recover the value of the work already performed." In McConnell v. Corona City Water Co., 149 Cal. 60, 85 Pac. 929, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1171, the contractor undertook to run and timber a tunnel and the owner agreed to furnish all the timber needed for the purpose, but, after a partial completion of the work, the owner failed to furnish lumber for the balance, and, in discussing the situation of a contractor under such circumstances, the Supreme Court said: "One who has been injured by a breach of contract has an election to pursue any of three remedies. He may treat the contract as rescinded and may recover upon a quantum meruit so far as he has performed; or he may keep the contract alive, for the benefit of both parties, being at all times ready and able to perform; or, third, he may treat the repudiation as putting an end to the contract for all purposes of performance and sue for the benefits he would have realized if he had not been prevented from performing."

[6] As to the other points made by the owner, so far as deemed worthy of consideration, we are in accord with the views expressed by counsel for the contractor in their brief, and we may as well adopt substantially their method and reasoning. Whether right or wrong, the order overruling the demurrer to the complaint for uncertainty in that it was not averred whether the contract sued upon was written or oral was entirely without prejudice for the reason that the contract was pleaded in the cross-complaint and was received in evidence without objection as the basis of the contractor's demand.

[7] There was no specific allegation by the contractor that the material furnished by him was actually used in the construction of the building or that said building had been completed, but this is immaterial in view of the fact that no lien was allowed Tubbs. His complaint is manifestly sufficient on a quantum meruit, and authorized a personal judgment in his favor for the reasonable value of his services.

[8] The point that Tubbs was a necessary party defendant to certain lien claimants' action consolidated with this cannot be considered, since it was not raised in the court below.

[9] There seems no good reason why a mechanic's lien may not be foreclosed through the agency of a complaint in intervention. In Mars v. McKay, 14 Cal. 127, it was held that: "A suit to enforce a particular lien under the mechanic's lien act is a proceeding to enforce all the liens against the property. And an intervention in a suit already pending, if filed within the six months, is as much a compliance with the act as an original suit." It was said by the court that the "interveners having filed their intervention and become parties to the suit within the prescribed period of six months, and during the existence of their lien, the effect of their position is precisely the same as if they had commenced an original action." The foregoing quotation from the Mars Case suggests the answer to the owner's contention that the complaints in intervention relate to the date of the commencement of the original action and since the original action was begun before the interveners filed their notices the complaints in intervention are affected by this infirmity and must be held to have been prematurely filed. The logic of this contention would virtually preclude intervention at all in such suits. But, as stated in the Mars Case, the position of the interveners is the same as though they had brought a new action, and the situation must be viewed in the light of the facts existing at the time the complaint in intervention was filed.

As stated by the contractor, the cases cited by the owner in reference to this point relate to an entirely different situation involving an amended or supplemental complaint. It is undoubtedly true that, where a complaint is filed and an action begun before the cause of action attempted to be stated has accrued, the plaintiff in that action cannot cure the defect by filing an amended complaint. The status must be determined as of the date of the beginning of the action. If, however, an amended complaint sets up an entirely different cause of action, to that extent it would be analogous to a complaint in intervention. This is illustrated by the case of Anderson v. Mayers, 50 Cal. 525, wherein it is held that: "If a complaint on a judgment is amended so as to state a cause of action on a promissory note, the action on the note is not commenced until the amended complaint is filed, and the statute of limitations on this note commences running at the time last mentioned."

So in Atkinson v. O. & S. Canal Co., 53 Cal. 102, it was held that, where the action was trespass and an amended complaint was filed for the purpose of including a parcel of land inadvertently omitted from the original complaint, the filing of the original complaint did not stop the statute of limitations from running against the trespass upon the omitted parcel. So likewise a complaint in intervention sets up a new cause of action, and admittedly also in favor of a third party, and the doctrine of relation does not apply. To determine, therefore, whether the action has been brought prematurely or whether the statute of limitations has run against it we must look to the date of the filing of the complaint in intervention and not of the filing of the original complaint. As we view the whole case, therefore, the evidence supports the findings, and they, in turn, authorize the judgment with the additional award of $825 to the contractor. According to the allegations of his complaint, he was entitled to the sum of $1,888.95 only. As it was not amended in that respect, the relief accorded to him should not exceed that amount.

The judgment is modified, by increasing the amount of the personal judgment in favor of the contractor, Tubbs, to $1,888.95, and, as thus modified, it is affirmed, respondent to recover costs in case No. 958, and each party to pay his own costs in case No. 954.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

HAYES v. WESTERN FUEL CO. (Civ. 937.)
(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 7, 1912.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 120*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—APPLIANCES—MASTER'S DUTY TO PROVIDE.

Plaintiff, a stevedore, while unloading a coal hatch, was injured by the overturning of a bucket and the emptying of the contents thereof back into the hold on plaintiff, due to the defective condition of the bucket, causing the latch to become loosened and the bucket to overturn in mid-air. Held, that plaintiff was injured by defendant's failure to furnish reasonably safe appliances and to exercise reasonable care to keep the appliances furnished in reasonably safe condition, which failure constituted actionable negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 211; Dec. Dig. § 120.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 288, 289*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—ASSUMED RISK.

Plaintiff, a stevedore engaged in shoveling coal into buckets in the hold of a vessel, was injured by one of such buckets overturning while being hoisted, and spilling the contents back into the hold on plaintiff. The bucket was defective, in that the rim was so broken that the latch that held it upright would not hold, and had previously been rejected by the foreman of a gang working in a different hold of the vessel, but had been pressed into service by the foreman of the gang with which plaintiff was employed. There was no evidence that plaintiff had any knowledge of the defect or of the danger incident thereto. Held, that plaintiff did not assume the risk, and was not himself negligent as a matter of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1068-1090, 1092-1132; Dec. Dig. §§ 288, 289.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 208, 217*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—DEFECTIVE TOOLS AND APPLIANCES—PRESUMPTIONS.

A master being bound to furnish suitable tools and appliances, a servant is entitled to presume that that duty has been performed, and does not therefore assume the risk arising from the use of unfit and improper appliances, nor is he bound to make an examination or inquiry at his peril to ascertain the fitness of the tool or appliance provided for the work intended, though, if he discovers the unfitness of a tool or appliance and appreciates the dangers incident to its use, and nevertheless continues without complaint in the prosecution of the work and injury results, he cannot recover.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 551, 574-600; Dec. Dig. §§ 208, 217.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 103*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES.

Where plaintiff, a stevedore, was injured by the overturning of a loaded coal bucket, due to a defect therein, as it was being hoisted from the hold of a vessel, and there was evidence that it was the custom of the foreman of each hatch to obtain a supply of buckets for the use of workmen, the court properly charged that the master was bound to furnish suitable appliances, and keep them in repair, and that such duty could not be delegated to another so as to exonerate the master from liability to an employé who was injured by an omission to perform such duty, or by its negligent performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 175; Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 265*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ASSUMED RISK.

Where, in an action for injuries to a stevedore by the overturning of a loaded coal bucket because of a defect therein, defendant claimed that plaintiff assumed the risk, the burden was on defendant, not only to show that plaintiff actually had or ought to have had knowledge of the defective condition of the bucket, but that he also comprehended and appreciated the dangers incident thereto, as provided by Civ. Code, § 1970.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 877-908, 955; Dec. Dig. § 265.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1056*)—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—PREJUDICE.

Where, in an action for injuries to a stevedore by the overturning of a loaded coal bucket due to a defect therein, plaintiff did not count on the absence of a bolt as one of the defects in the bucket, the exclusion of a question asked of an alleged expert as to whether the absence of such bolt would produce such a looseness as would cause the bucket to dump was not prejudicial to defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4187-4193; Dec. Dig. § 1056.*]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1058*)—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE—CURING ERROR.

Error, if any, in the sustaining of an objection to a question, was cured where the subject was fully covered by the witness in answer to other questions.

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 295*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—DEFECTIVE MACHINERY—INSPECTION—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where a stevedore was injured by the overturning of a defective coal bucket as it was being hoisted, loaded, from the hold of a ship, an instruction that, while a servant assumes all ordinary risks of the business in which he is employed, he does not assume the risk of defective premises, machinery, or structures furnished by the master if the defect was either known to the master or could have been discovered by him by the exercise of reasonable inspection, was not objectionable as charging that defendant was liable in case the bucket was defective, and defendant knew, or could have known, of the defect by reasonable

9. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 295*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMPTION OF FACTS.

Such instruction was also not objectionable as charging that plaintiff did not assume the ordinary risks of the business which were known to defendant or could have been known by him; the court having further charged that an employer was not bound to indemnify his employé for losses suffered by the latter in consequence of the ordinary risks of the business in which he was employed.

10. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 293*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—REQUEST TO CHARGE.

In a suit for injuries to a stevedore by the overturning of a coal bucket as it was being hoisted, loaded, from the hold of a ship, due to a defect in the bucket, defendant requested an instruction that if the buckets furnished by defendant were of the kind ordinarily used for the purpose by employés in the same line of business in the community, and if defendant employed a blacksmith to keep the buckets in repair, or kept on hand a number of buckets in good repair, ready for use, any one of which could have been used by the employés at the time complained of, and it was the duty of the employés to select for use buckets in good repair, and discontinue the use of any bucket that became defective while in use, then defendant performed its whole duty toward plaintiff, and was not responsible, though the employés selected for use a defective bucket from those in good repair, or even though the employés continued to use the bucket after it became obviously defective. Held, that such instruction was properly refused as nullifying the defendant's duty to furnish suitable appliances in the first place, and as implying that he might relieve himself of that responsibility by delegating the task to an employé.

12. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 297*)—GENERAL VERDICT—ANSWER TO SPECIAL INTERROGATORIES.

Where in an action for injuries to a stevedore by the overturning of a loaded coal bucket as it was being hoisted from the hold of a vessel, due to a defect in the bucket, a general verdict for plaintiff was sustained on the theory that defendant was negligent in leaving the defective bucket on the deck of the vessel whence it was taken by the foreman of plaintiff's gang and put to use in the hold, it was not material whether the jury's negative answer to a special interrogatory whether it was the duty of the stevedores employed by defendant to select buckets that they were to use in their work from a number of buckets in good repair kept on hand by defendant was sustained by the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Eugene Hayes against the Western Fuel Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. H. Wilson, of San Francisco, for appellant. Eugene D. Sullivan and O. K. Cushing, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. Respondent was awarded by a jury a verdict for $5,000 for personal injuries received while employed in filling buckets with coal in the hold of a vessel belonging to appellant. The circumstances of the accident, the extent of the damage, and the particular ground for charging responsibility to defendant are disclosed in the following allegations of the complaint: "That on said 26th day of March, 1907, while plaintiff was so employed by defendant, and while he was so engaged in the performance of the duty for which he was employed, to wit, filling said buckets with coal in the hold of said vessel, defendant was hoisting from the hold of said vessel one of said buckets filled with coal, and the same overturned above said hatchway and at a great height, to wit, 75 feet above and directly over the place in said hold where plaintiff was working, and the contents of said bucket, to wit, over 1,000 pounds of coal, fell upon and around said plaintiff, and broke and splintered the bones of one of plaintiff's legs so badly that part of said bones had to be removed, and broke two of plaintiff's ribs and otherwise greatly bruised and injured plaintiff and thereby caused him great pain and suffering. That said bucket which overturned and emptied its contents upon plaintiff as aforesaid was at the time and long prior thereto defective and broken; that the rim on the upper rear part of said bucket was cracked, thereby causing the latch which is fastened to the bail of said bucket at one end, and to the clutch on the rear of said bucket at the other, and which prevents said bucket from dumping before reaching the defendant's bunkers, to become loosened, and thereby causing said bucket to overturn in mid-air." It is also alleged that the defendant had knowledge of the defective condition of the bucket, but negligently continued to use it till plaintiff was injured. The answer expressly admitted the employment and the allegations concerning the nature of the work, the character of the accident, and the extent of the injury, but denied the other material averments of the complaint, and set up as an affirmative defense that the injury was caused by the fault and negligence of the plaintiff, and, furthermore, that said injury was chargeable to the risks of plaintiff's employment at the time of the accident, "which said risks had been and were duly assumed by the plaintiff."

[1] From the standpoint of respondent, the case involves primarily the application of the familiar legal doctrine, declared in the decisions over and over again, that it is the duty of the master to furnish reasonably safe appliances to the servant for the prosecution of his work and to exercise reasonable care in keeping said appliances in a safe condition for use, and, if an injury results to the servant from the failure of the master to perform this duty, the latter is liable for the consequences. Speaking generally, it may be said that in the record there is found ample support for this theory of respondent. From the direct and circumstantial evidence a rational inference may be drawn that the said coal bucket was defective as alleged in the complaint, that it was furnished to plaintiff in that condition by appellant, that the defect was of such character as to render it unsafe to use the bucket for the purpose intended; in other words, that it was not reasonably safe to operate it as plaintiff was required to do in the prosecution of his work, and that the accident with the consequent injury would not have occurred had it not been for said defect.

[2] But, of course, it does not necessarily follow that plaintiff was entitled to recover. However, in reference to the affirmative defenses of appellant, it is confidently believed that the jury was justified in holding that the accident was not due to any contributory negligence of plaintiff, and that, in a legal sense, there was no such assumption of risk by him as to relieve defendant from liability. These considerations will receive more specific attention as notice is given to the various contentions of appellant. Of these, in the foreground of the discussion and manifestly constituting a proposition of vital importance in the determination of the appeal, the assertion is made by counsel that the case comes within the rule "that, where a master provides and keeps proper tools or appliances for the use of his servants and delegates to them the duty of selecting such as they require, then the master is not responsible if the servant voluntarily uses a tool or appliance that has become obviously defective and unfit for use, and is injured by reason thereof." Concerning this statement of the rule and the propriety of invoking it in the case before us, several suggestions seems not inappropriate. In passing, it may be said that there is some inaccuracy in the language used. It rather implies that, if the master provides and keeps only proper tools or appliances for the use of the servant and the servant voluntarily selects therefrom one obviously unfit, the master is not liable. Where only proper tools are supplied, it is manifest that no room can be found for the unfit. But, interpreting the rule, as no doubt intended, to contemplate the case where a proper tool has become unfit from use and is then selected by the servant, it is clear, upon principle and under the authorities, that the rule must be applied with great caution. Otherwise, we will find the problem embarrassed by the presence of two antagonistic and irreconcilable principles.

[3] Since the master is bound to furnish suitable tools and appliances, the servant may assume, of course, that the master will perform that legal and moral duty. It necessarily follows that the servant does not assume the risk that comes from the use of unfit and improper appliances. Nor is the servant required to distrust the fidelity of the master to this obligation, nor does the law demand of the servant that he make an examination or inquiry at his peril to ascertain the fitness of the tool or appliance for the work intended. This would be in contravention of the doctrine of the master's responsibility for the character of the tools. Of course, however, the law, as well as common sense and common justice, demands that the servant shall comport himself as upright and reasonable men ordinarily do, and if he discovers the unfitness of the appliance and appreciates the danger incident to its use, and, nevertheless, he continues without complaint in the prosecution of the work and injury results, the law, in consonance with the judgment of fair-minded men, exacts of him the penalty for his folly and attributes the consequences to his own negligence rather than to that of the master. Furthermore, there may be instances where the defect or unfitness of the appliance is so palpable and obtrusive and the danger incident to its use, under the circumstances disclosed, so palpable, that knowledge of these facts, even in the absence of direct evidence to that effect, must be imputed to the servant. No circumstance, however, should be permitted to obscure or derogate from the importance of the initial and primary obligation of the master to furnish suitable tools and appliances. It may be well to notice how the subject has been treated by some of the authorities.

In 1 Bailey's Personal Injuries, § 251, it is said: "It is well settled that it is the duty of the master to provide suitable and safe machinery and appliances for the use of his operatives, and it is also settled that the duty does not stop here, but that it is likewise his duty to keep such machinery in proper repair and in safe working order, and if these duties or any of them are negligently performed, and one of the servants thereby sustains an injury, the master is liable, even though he may have intrusted the performance of such duties to subordinates, by whatever name they may be called." In Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (5th Ed.) § 194, the authors, after stating the familiar personal duty of the master to furnish proper tools and implements, declare: "The master is not entitled to time to discover defects in things which are defective when put in use. He should examine them before putting them in use. He cannot evade his responsibility in these respects by simply giving general orders that servants shall examine for themselves, before using the place, materials, etc., furnished by him." In section 194a it is said: "The master is also personally bound, from time to time, to inspect and examine all instrumentalities furnished by him, and to use ordinary care, diligence, and skill to keep them in good and safe condition." In Daves v. S. P. Co., 98 Cal. 19, 32 Pac. 708, 35 Am. St. Rep. 133, it is said: "The duties which a railroad corporation owes to its servants and which it is required to perform are to furnish suitable machinery and appliances by which the service is to be performed and to keep them in repair and order. * * * The performance of these duties cannot be shifted by it to a servant so as to avoid responsibility for injury caused to another servant by its omission. Nor is their negligent performance one of the ordinary risks of the service impliedly assumed by the employé by his contract of employment." The doctrine is more elaborately considered and presented in Sanborn v. Madera Flume, etc., Co., 70 Cal. 261, 11 Pac. 710, and Tedford v. Los Angeles Electric Co., 134 Cal. 76, 66 Pac. 76, 54 L. R. A. 85.

Respondent's classification of the cases upon the subject, while probably somewhat arbitrary, possesses merit, and it may be of assistance in the consideration of apparently conflicting decisions. It is thus claimed that "the cases where the servant is injured as a result of some defect in appliances furnished by the master fall into three general classes, as follows: (1) Where there are defects or breaks in appliances furnished by the master which should not be defective or broken. Such is the case here. (2) Where the injury results from some defect in the adjustment or preparation of the appliance, and where the adjustment or preparation is to be done by the servant, and is a part of the work that he is employed to do—obviously different from the case at bar. (3) Where the defect in the appliance is one necessarily attendant upon the use of the appliance and which is usually repaired by the workman himself and to repair which suitable materials are supplied, or where the appliance is of such a character that the use of it results in a gradual deterioration which ultimately renders it unsafe, as for example, the wearing of a rope, the loosening of a bolt or the dulling of an instrument—also clearly different from the case at bar." Under the first class are cited the following cases: Jager v. California Bridge Co., 104 Cal. 542, 38 Pac. 413, where plaintiff was injured by the falling upon him of a cross-beam or headblock which became detached from its proper position at the top of a pile driver, and wherein, in holding defendant responsible for the condition of the appliance, the court said: "It is not necessary to cite authorities to the point, for the rule is elementary that the same duty devolves upon the master in subsequently maintaining the appliance in a safe and suitable condition as rested upon him when it was originally furnished to his servant"; Alexander v. Central L. & M. Co., 104 Cal. 532, 38 Pac. 410, wherein plaintiff was injured by falling from a platform and the same rule was declared as to defendant's duty to provide a suitable scaffold and platform and to use care afterward in its inspection and supervision for the purpose of discovering the defects that may subsequently appear; Pacheco v. Judson Manufacturing Co., 113 Cal. 541, 45 Pac. 833, wherein the plaintiff was injured by the breaking of a pair of shears, part of which fell upon him, the court reversing a judgment of nonsuit upon the ground that "the evidence was such that the jury might have deduced as inferences therefrom that previously to the breaking which was the immediate occasion of injury to plaintiff the shears were cracked and weakened, that this condition was so far to be reasonably anticipated as to render prudent the adoption of measures for its discovery, and would have been detected by the application of reasonable and not impracticable tests, that such tests were not applied," and that, therefore, the defendant might legally have been held responsible for the accident; and Higgins v. Williams, 114 Cal. 176, 45 Pac. 1041, involving an injury to plaintiff by the falling upon him of an iron bucket which was being used to hoist earth from a trench in which he was working. It appeared that the bucket fell by reason of a pin coming out of a block that held the cable and the pin should have been kept in place by a key, but there was no key. The court said: "Wilson (the foreman) knew of this defect, or should have known of it, and his knowledge was the knowledge of defendants. In performing his duty he acted not as a fellow servant with plaintiff, but as representative or agent of defendants and for his negligence they are responsible."

In the second class are placed the following cases cited by appellant: Burns v. Sennett, 99 Cal. 363, 33 Pac. 916; Kerrigan v. Market St. Ry., 138 Cal. 509, 71 Pac. 621; Leishman v. Union Iron Works, 148 Cal. 275, 83 Pac. 30, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 500, 113 Am. St. Rep. 243; Manning v. Mining Co., 149 Cal. 35, 84 Pac. 657; Kelley v. Norcross, 121 Mass. 509; Fraser v. Red River Lumber Co., 45 Minn. 237, 47 N. W. 785; Treka v. Burlington, etc., Ry. Co., 100 Iowa, 209, 69 N. W. 422. The interesting and specific review of these cases by respondent might well be reproduced if time and space would permit.

The other cases cited by appellant are assigned by respondent to the third class, of which we mention only those from this state as follows: Callan v. Bull, 113 Cal. 593, 45 Pac. 1017; Helling v. Schindler, 145 Cal. 305, 78 Pac. 710; Towne v. United, etc., Co., 146 Cal. 769, 81 Pac. 124, 70 L. R. A. 214, 2 Ann. Cas. 905. Of these, the Towne Case is particularly relied upon by appellant as decisive of the controversy here. This position, it is believed, cannot be maintained, on account of the vital difference between the facts of that case and this. Adopting substantially the language of respondent, we find the Towne Case to be as follows: A lineman, in the employ of the defendant, was injured by the falling of an electric light pole which the plaintiff and others were removing from the street. The men were furnished with pike poles, which were about 10 or 12 feet in length, about 2 inches in diameter, one end having an iron ferrule and an iron pike at the end, about 1½ inches in length, to be used in bracing the poles to be removed, and to keep them from falling while the man engaged in removing the wires was up the pole. Plaintiff was directed to climb and clear the wires from one of the poles, and another man was directed to brace the pole on its unprotected side with a pike pole. This man took from the pike poles, which were then and there on the ground within reach, a pole which had become dull and worn at the point, and forced the barbed portion thereof into the electric light pole, about eight feet from the ground, and rested the other end of the pike pole on the ground for the purpose of forming a brace. While plaintiff was at the top of the electric light pole it fell, and thereby plaintiff was injured. The pole fell because it was decayed at the ground, and because the pike pole, being dull, did not penetrate it a sufficient depth to hold but broke out or slipped, thus letting the pole fall to the ground. The judgment was reversed on the ground that it was the duty of the servant to know when the pike poles were dull and in need of sharpening, and to select one in good order, and not to use a dull one. That the Towne Case presents an exception to the general rule is pointed out by the Supreme Court in Fogarty v. S. P. Co., 151 Cal. 794, 91 Pac. 652, wherein the court, through Mr. Justice Angellotti, says: "This rule (the rule in the Towne Case) is a qualification of the general rule relative to the duty of the employer to furnish an appliance that is reasonably safe, and to use reasonable care to keep the same in proper repair, and, as stated in Helling v. Schindler, 145 Cal. 303 [78 Pac. 710], it relates only to such slight defects attendant upon the operation of machinery as from their nature require remedying at the hands of the operators themselves and as a part of the proper operation of the machine." Additional emphasis is given to the point, it may be said, by respondent's analysis of the cases cited as authority in the Towne decision.

But there are certain vital facts, deducible from the view that we must take of the evidence, some of which will be specified, that render it clear that the rule of the Towne Case has no application here. One decisive circumstance is that the bucket in its defective condition was furnished by appellant to plaintiff when he began his work. We have a right to infer that it was not selected by plaintiff; furthermore, that it was not his duty to select it, and that there was no change in its condition during his employment. The accident occurred the day he was employed and when he began his work, and the manner in which the defective tub was supplied is related by the witness Carlson as follows: "I was not foreman in the hatch where plaintiff was working, but I was foreman on the other hatch. When I found that tub was broken, I took it out of the hatch and landed it on the deck. That was the first day we started to work on that steamer. Hayes was hurt the next day. Before he was hurt, Ben Cline's gang came and took that tub from the deck where I had put it and went aft to their hatch. Ben Cline was foreman of the Hayes gang. I do not know what that gang did with the tub after I saw it run to their own hatch. Q. And it was while Cline had the gang of men unloading coal from the hatch next to yourself that he came and took that tub away, was it? A. Yes, sir." There is no evidence that Hayes was among the "gang" that took the tub. From circumstances, which we will not stop to detail, it is fairly inferable that he was not. But, at any rate, the tub was placed on the deck by the foreman of one hatch, who knew and apparently gave no warning of its defective condition, whence the bucket was taken, under the direction of the foreman of the hatch in which plaintiff was employed and there put to use without the latter's attention having been called to any defect or unfitness in said appliance.

[4] The jury were justified in concluding that it was the duty and the custom of the foreman of the hatch to obtain and supply the buckets for the use of the workmen, and they were correctly instructed that the obligation of the master to furnish suitable appliances and to keep them in repair and order "is a duty which cannot be delegated to another so as to exonerate the employer from liability to an employé who is injured by omission to perform the duty or by its negligent performance. In respect to such act or duty, the servant who undertakes or omits to perform it is the representative of the master. The act or omission is the act or omission of the master, irrespective of the grade of the servant whose negligence caused the injury, or of the fact whether it was or was not practicable for the master to act

[5] Again, the burden was upon appellant to show that respondent actually had or ought to have had knowledge of the defective condition of said bucket. From the record we can say that neither inference is so imperative as to exclude any other rational conclusion. Indeed, there is no direct evidence upon the subject of plaintiff's actual knowledge, neither party having seen fit, apparently, to question him concerning it. One of the fellow workmen, so he testified, discovered the defect before the accident occurred, but there is no evidence that he directed to it in any manner the attention of respondent, nor can we say that the blemish was so obvious as to require plaintiff to be held to the responsibility of actual knowledge. On the contrary, incomplete as the record is in this respect, considering the fact that plaintiff was at work in the hold of the vessel and for only a few hours, with nothing apparently to excite his special attention to the bucket or to arouse his suspicions, the inference is quite fair and reasonable and not subject to legal stricture that he was without knowledge of said imperfection.

In brief, therefore, under the settled principles of appellate practice, the record presents us the case of a master furnishing his servant with a defective appliance, not only with the presumption of knowledge which the law imposes, but with actual knowledge of its unfitness, and giving no information of its condition to the servant who does not know and is not required to know that the appliance is otherwise than normal, and injury subsequently resulting from the use of said appliance. Hence the general rule contended for by respondent is rendered clearly applicable.

Besides, the law of the servant's responsibility in operation at the time of this accident was somewhat different from its condition when the Towne Case was decided. In 1907 section 1970 of the Civil Code was amended, in addition to other respects, by adding the provision that "knowledge by an employé injured of the defective or unsafe character or condition of any machinery, ways, appliances or structures of such employer shall not be a bar to recovery for any injury or death caused thereby, unless it shall also appear that such employé fully understood, comprehended and appreciated the dangers incident to the use of such defective machinery, ways, appliances or structures, and thereafter consented to use the same, or continued in the use of the same."

There is not only no evidence that plaintiff "fully understood, comprehended and appreciated" the dangers incident to the use of said defective bucket, but it is quite reasonable to hold that, if he knew of the defect, he believed there was no additional danger incident thereto. Indeed, defendant denied under oath, not only that the bucket was broken or defective, but also that it ever turned by reason of any broken or defective condition, and an effort was made at the trial to show that the defect did not add to the peril of plaintiff's situation. Legally, respondent had as much right as appellant to be mistaken in that particular.

[6, 7] This effort to prove that the bucket could be safely operated has given rise to one point of controversy in reference to a ruling of the court. The witness Olinder, a blacksmith, who had been in the employ of defendant for several years and whose duty it was to repair the tubs and machinery generally, after stating that following the accident he discovered that a bolt was missing from the tub, was asked the question: "Will the absence of the bolt produce such a looseness that it would dump?" Assuming that the question involved a matter of expert testimony, it is entirely apparent, as pointed out by respondent, that the ruling sustaining an objection was not prejudicially erroneous for the reason that plaintiff in his complaint did not count upon any such defect, and for the reason that the ground was entirely covered by the witness in answer to other questions.

There are two assignments of error in relation to the instructions.

[8, 9] As we understand the law of negligence, one phase of it was correctly given by the court as follows: "While the servant assumes all the ordinary risks of the business in which he is employed, he does not by reason of his employment assume the risk of defective premises, machinery, or structures furnished by the master, if the defect was either known to the master, or could have been discovered by the master by a reasonably careful inspection." Appellant's objection to the instruction is stated in this language: "This instruction tells the jury that the defendant is liable in this case if they find that its tub was defective, and that it knew of or could have discovered the defect by a reasonably careful inspection, and that the plaintiff did not assume the ordinary risks of the business which were known to the defendant or could have been discovered by him." In this appellant is clearly in error. The court was not dealing with the ordinary risks of the business, but with the extraordinary condition occasioned by the act of the master in supplying defective appliances. Since it is the duty of the master to furnish safe appliances, he must be primarily and legally accountable for the consequences of his failure to observe his duty in that respect. The other contingency suggested by appellant was covered by the court in additional instructions, one of which contained this statement: "An employer is not bound to indemnify his employé for losses suffered by the employé in consequence of the ordinary risks of the business in which he is employed."

[10] Appellant complains of the action of the court in refusing to give the following instruction: "If you find from the evidence that the tubs furnished for the use of the defendant's employés were of the kind ordinarily used for the purpose by employers in the same line of business in the community, and if you find that the defendant at the time complained of employed a blacksmith to keep the tubs in repair, and if you further find that defendant kept on hand a number of tubs in good repair, ready for use, any one of which could have been had and used by the employés at the time complained of and if you further find that it was the duty of defendant's employés to select for use tubs in good repair and discontinue the use of any tub that became defective while in use, then I charge you that the defendant performed its whole duty toward the plaintiff, and is not responsible in this case even though you find that the employés selected for use a defective tub from among those in good repair kept on hand by defendant, or even though you find that the employés continued to use a tub after it became obviously defective. In such case, your verdict must be for the defendant." There are several objections to the instruction, as suggested by respondent. Probably the vital one is that it ignores and virtually nullifies the importance of the duty of the master in the first place to furnish suitable appliances. It also implies that he may relieve himself of this responsibility by delegating the task to an employé, although another employé in a different line of work may be injured in consequence of the act of the one who represents the principal in the selection of the appliance. There is a formal objection also that it lacks simplicity and was likely to be misunderstood by the jury.

[11] Again, it is apparent that the particular phase of the law of negligence intended to be reached by said instruction was fully covered by other instructions which were certainly exceedingly favorable to appellant. Indeed, the charge of the court, taken in its entirety, seems to have left nothing lacking for the faithful guidance of the jury.

[12] We are convinced that there is support in the evidence for the negative answer of the jury to the question: "Do you find from the evidence that it was the duty of the stevedores employed by the defendant to select a tub or tubs that they were to use in their work from a number of tubs in good repair kept on hand by the defendant?" But, even if not supported, the circumstance would not require a reversal of the case, since the general verdict could be sustained upon the theory of defendant's negligence in leaving the defective bucket upon the deck of the vessel whence it was taken and put into use in the hold.

It would be pleasing to follow more closely and completely the interesting argument of counsel, but the length of this opinion already invites apology.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

tract. The Secretary of State has certified to the county clerk of Los Angeles county that he is the Republican nominee for member of the assembly from said district. It is alleged that he is ineligible for that office by reason of nonresidence. The county clerk has been requested to strike his name from the official ballot as such candidate, and has refused. We are asked to issue a writ of mandate compelling the clerk to comply with that demand. The Constitution of the state (article 4, § 7) reads as follows: "Each house shall choose its officers, and judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its members." By that article the assembly is made the exclusive judge of the qualifications of its members. The law providing for an official ballot cannot be held to have changed the intent of the people in adopting that constitutional provision that the assembly should be the sole and exclusive judge of the eligibility of those whose election is properly certified. For this court to undertake to try the question of eligibility and to deprive the candidate of any chance to be elected would simply be to usurp the jurisdiction of the assembly.

The petition is denied.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Ellen M. Colton, deceased. From an order granting Helene M. B. Sacher's application for partial distribution, Caroline Colton Dahlgren and others appeal. Reversed.

J. F. Riley and Charles W. Slack, both of San Francisco, for appellants. Edward C. Harrison and Maurice E. Harrison, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal from a decree of partial distribution given under the following circumstances: Contest having arisen over the will of Ellen M. Colton, deceased, all of the parties in interest compounded their differences and entered into a written agreement which provided for the distribution of the estate "after paying the debts, if any, of the decedent, and the necessary costs of administration." Application for partial distribution was made upon behalf of Helene M. B. Sacher, to whom, under the agreement, was to be distributed one-fourth of the estate. At the time of her petition for partial distribution and the time of the hearing thereof, the necessary costs of administration of the estate had not been paid, and the greater part of the estate consisted of a claim against the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company appraised at $300,000, for the enforcement of which the executors had brought suit, which suit was and still is pending and undetermined. The application was for the distribution to Helene M. B. Sacher of one-fourth of the claim against the California Safe Deposit & Trust Company. The court decreed distribution as prayed for, and from its decree the executors and Caroline Colton Dahlgren, to whom, under the agreement, was to be distributed one-half of the estate, appealed.

Upon the appeal two propositions are advanced: The first that the decree is in violation of the written agreement of the parties, who by their agreement covenanted that such distribution should not be made until the necessary costs of administration had been paid, and that these costs, in fact, had not been paid; second, that, in view of the condition of the assets of the estate, it was error for the court to decree partial distribution. Upon both of these propositions appellants' position is well taken. Respondent relies upon the provisions of section 1661 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and construes those provisions as a mandate upon the court to order distribution when the conditions contemplated by the section are found to exist. Generally speaking, this is true, but it is quite within the powers of the parties (and here the parties were all the parties in interest), or for a single party to estop himself by contract or conduct from insisting upon the enforcement of this rule. Estate of Glenn, 153 Cal. 77, 94 Pac. 230. The written contract of these parties into which they advisedly entered was that distribution should be postponed until the necessary costs of administration had been paid. No attack is made upon this agreement; it is not sought to be avoided upon any legal or equitable grounds, and it stands, therefore, as a binding covenant upon all the parties to it. We need not be at pains to consider the advantages to be derived by one or another of the parties by the enforcement of the agreement, whether either or any will sustain any financial detriment or advantage by its enforcement or nonenforcement. Suffice it that the contract is one within the power of the parties to make, one by the parties advisedly made, and it is binding upon the court in probate unless adequate cause be shown for setting aside its provisions. No such cause is shown. We have said that it is unnecessary to consider the advantages or disadvantages which might result to one or another of the parties to this agreement should the court see fit to enforce, or, as here, to disregard, its terms. The contract was based upon a sufficient consideration, the mutual surrender of asserted legal rights, and, this being the case, any party to it is entitled to insist upon the fulfillment of its terms, regardless of any question of financial gain or loss. Indeed, the real consideration may not be financial at all. Solely by way of illustration it may be said that a father or mother might enter into such a contract to delay distribution to the end of postponing the time when a wayward son might take his legacy in the belief that, if the son took the property immediately, he would squander it, and, if possession was delayed, a reformation might have intervened. This, as we say, is only to illustrate the innumerable reasons which might prompt the execution of such a contract as this, aside from reasons purely of financial gain, but, whatever the reasons may have been, we repeat, no cause having been shown why the contract should not be observed, the parties to it were entitled to insist upon its terms.

[1] As little doubt may be entertained upon the second proposition. What the court has done without adequate or any cause therefor shown (excepting, perhaps, the belief entertained by the court that it was acting under compulsion of section 1661, Code Civ. Proc.) is to distribute an indivisible chose in action, a chose in action actually in litigation, a claim in suit which could not from its very nature be divided without great embarrassment to the executors in the due conduct of that litigation. Indeed, it may be said, not, of course, as a proposition of law, but as a statement of fact for the guidance of courts in probate, that, generally speaking, claims in litigation should not be distributed unless with the full assent of all the parties interested and under circumstances where it is apparent to the court that no embarrassment will result to the administrators, or to the administration, in the orderly effort to reduce such a claim to judgment and possession. In re Kittson, 45 Minn. 197, 48 N. W. 419; Murff v. Frazier, 41 Miss. 408. By this court it has been said that, when an estate is in the condition here shown, it is not ready for distribution; our language being: "If the assets are merely claimed to exist, and the right to them is involved in litigation, either by an action brought by the executor or administrator to recover them for the estate, or by an action against the executor or administrator to recover them from the estate, then the estate is not ready for distribution." The very existence of the property as assets is uncertain and contingent upon the determination of the suits. Estate of Ricaud, 57 Cal. 421. Such was the precise situation here presented, and the distribution was made under the opposition of other parties in interest and the opposition of the executors.

[2, 3] The right of Caroline Colton Dahlgren, as a party aggrieved, to appeal is beyond question. She not only possessed rights under the contract which were injuriously affected by the decree, but she possessed an interest in the estate which, for the reasons indicated, were liable to suffer detriment because of the decree. The test laid down in Adams v. Woods, 8 Cal. 306, "Would the party have had the thing if the erroneous judgment had not been given? If the answer be 'yea,' then the person is the party aggrieved," however satisfactory to the case then under consideration, by no means affords a complete definition of the phrase "party aggrieved," nor has it ever in this state been held to afford such a complete definition. Under our decisions, any person having an interest recognized by law in the subject-matter of the judgment, which interest is injuriously affected by the judgment, is a party aggrieved and entitled to be heard upon appeal. As to the appeal of the executors, there can be no doubt of their right to appeal from any order which is embarrassing to the due administration of the estate. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 938, 963, 1660; Estate of Kelley, 63 Cal. 106; Estate of Ryer, 110 Cal. 556, 42 Pac. 1082; Estate of Heydenfeldt, 117 Cal. 551, 49 Pac. 713. That a decreed made under these circumstances is so embarrassing has already been declared.

The decree appealed from is therefore reversed.

PER CURIAM. In this case the discussion in the opinion in Department 2 relating to the first proposition advanced by the appellant, namely, that the decree is in violation of the written agreement of the parties, is withdrawn. The court is satisfied with the discussion and decision upon the second proposition, and that the case was properly reversed upon the grounds therein stated.

Petition for rehearing is denied.

In re WOMERSLEY'S ESTATE. (L. A. 3,090.)

1. WILLS (§ 487*)—CONSTRUCTION.

Civ. Code, § 1340, provides that when, in applying a will, it is found that there is any imperfect description, or that no person exactly answers the description, mistakes and omissions may be corrected if the error appears from the context of the will or from extrinsic evidence, but evidence of testator's declarations as to his intention cannot be received, and section 1318 provides that, in case of uncertainty arising upon the face of the will as to the application of its provisions, testator's intent is to be ascertained from the language, in view of the circumstances under which it was made, exclusive of his oral declarations. A will executed by W. provided: "I give and bequeath to my wife, E. W., all the real estate I die possessed of, wherever located, for her sole and separate use during the period of her natural life, and direct that at her death the said real property be equally divided among the heirs of the W. family, share and share alike, my said wife, E. W., to have all the income from said property during her life." Testator was an Englishman, and with his brothers and sisters inherited from his father; the brothers and sisters being his sole heirs at law if he died intestate. Held, that the use of the words "heirs of the W. family" did not involve a latent ambiguity to be resolved under section 1340, but should be construed in view of the circumstances under which the will was made, excluding testator's oral declarations.

2. WILLS (§ 506*)—CONSTRUCTION—"HEIRS."

The clause requiring equal division of the remainder among "the heirs of the W. family" meant that the remainder was to be given to those of testator's family who would be his heirs if he died intestate, such use of the word "heir" being a common and colloquial use, so that the widow of testator's brother cannot claim as a remainderman (citing 4 Words and Phrases Judicially Defined, 3252).

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of James N. Womersley. From a decree decreeing distribution of the estate as prayed for in the executor's petition, an appeal was taken. Affirmed.

Williams & Rutan, of Santa Ana, for appellant. E. E. Keech, of Santa Ana, for respondent. Wm. M. Brown, of Orange, for executors and other heirs.

HENSHAW, J. By his last will James N. Womersley, deceased, devised his real property as follows: "Secondly, I give and bequeath to my wife Emily A. Womersley, all the real estate I die possessed of, wherever located, for her sole and separate use during the period of her natural life, and direct that at her death the said real property be equally divided among the heirs of the Womersley family, share and share alike, my said wife, Emily A. Womersley, to have all the income from said property during her life." The executor of this will filed his final account and a petition for the distribution of the estate showing the ownership by the estate of the real property devised, and showing, further, that the heirs at law of the deceased were Emily A. Womersley, his widow, John Womersley and William Womersley, brothers, and Sussana Ray, Maud Catherine Savory, and Minna Clarke, sisters. The petition sought a decree distributing a life estate in the realty to the widow with a remainder over to the brothers and sisters. Florence Aimee Blake was the widow of Harry E. Womersley, a brother of James N. Womersley. Her husband died some years before the death of James, testator. She filed objections to the distribution prayed for, and sought to share equally with the brothers and sisters under the construction which she gave to the second clause of the will above quoted. A demurrer to the objections and petition of Florence Aimee Blake was interposed by Emily A. Womersley, the widow. The demurrer was sustained and the court decreed distribution as prayed for in the executor's petition. The whole controversy revolves about the true construction of the second paragraph, and the question is whom did the testator mean by "the heirs of the Womersley family."

[1] There is here no latent ambiguity to be resolved under section 1340 of the Civil Code. The phrase used by the testator undoubtedly requires construction, but, if that phrase contain any uncertainty, it is one which arises upon the face of the will, and is to be construed by taking in view the circumstances under which the will was made, excluding the testator's oral declarations. Civ. Code, 1318. Those circumstances disclose that deceased was an Englishman, that he with his brothers and sisters inherited from his father, that the brothers and sisters were those above named, and in the event of his intestacy were (with his widow) his sole heirs at law. There seems to be no difficulty in arriving at the intent of the testator from the words expressed in the will.

[2] Plainly the words mean that the remainder was left to those of his, the Womersley, family, who would be his heirs in the event that he died intestate. This use of the word "heirs" is not strained, but is a common colloquial use recognized both by lexicographers and lawwriters. Standard Dict. "heirs"; 4 Words and Phrases, 3252; 1 Underhill, Wills, p. 498; 14 Cyc. 28. Appellant, Florence Aimee Blake, did not belong to the class thus designated. She would not have been an heir of James N. Womersley had he died intestate.

The contention advanced upon the appeal of the widow that the uncertainty in the second clause of the will is such and so great as to avoid it is, for the reasons already given, untenable.

The decree appealed from is therefore affirmed.

GORDON et al. v. COVINA IRR. CO.
(L. A. 2,776.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 252*)—RIGHT TO WATER.

Where an irrigation ditch was constructed by defendant company under a contract requiring it only to transport for so-called old users water delivered by them from their appropriation to defendant's ditch, not to exceed, however, a certain amount, plaintiffs' right to receive water from such ditch for the irrigation of certain parcels of land subject to irrigation therefrom was not affected by a so-called compromise agreement subsequently entered into, to which plaintiffs were not parties and which was not signed by all the irrigators in the original district.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 252*)—IRRIGATION COMPANY — OBLIGATION TO FURNISH WATER.

Where an irrigation company, in order to consolidate an existing ditch, agreed to transport for so-called old users through defendant's ditch at a prescribed charge, the amount of water furnished to defendant's ditch by such old users not to exceed a specified quantity, and to divide its own waters among its stockholders pro rata according to their stockholdings, and to sell any surplus, defendant was under no obligation to carry or deliver to any of the old users any water except that received for them, nor to furnish to such users any part of its own water acquired for its stockholders and for sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 156*)— EASEMENT IN GROSS — APPURTENANCES RUNNING WITH LAND.

Defendant irrigation company, to obtain a right of way for its ditch over land belonging to B., accepted a deed providing that B. should have the right to purchase and use the water in the ditch on the same terms and conditions as the stockholders of defendant corporation. Defendant's by-laws provided for distribution of the water to stockholders in proportion to their stock, either for use or sale by them, and that any surplus remaining and not needed for stockholders' use might be sold for the benefit of the company. B. conveyed the land which subsequently passed by mesne conveyances to plaintiff, but for nearly 20 years no one had claimed the right to water under B.'s deed, it being furnished during two seasons to one claiming under his stockholding. Held, that the provision in the deed was an easement in gross for the personal benefit of B. only, and did not pass with the land on his conveyance thereof to plaintiff.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by J. T. Gordon and another against the Covina Irrigating Company. Judgment for plaintiffs for less than the relief demanded, and they appeal. Affirmed.

Ward Chapman, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Anderson & Anderson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. We have in this case appeals by the plaintiffs (husband and wife) from the judgments and orders denying a new trial in two separate actions brought to have it determined that the plaintiffs are entitled to be furnished by defendant with water for irrigating purposes upon certain lands. In one action Emma T. Gordon sought such a determination as to a tract of land described as the north 20½ acres of the west 24½ acres of the S. W. ¼ of section 25, township 1 N., range 10 W., S. B. M., which we shall hereinafter designate as parcel "A." In the other action J. T. Gordon sought such a determination as to a 10-acre tract, being lot 2, section 27, of the same township and range, hereinafter designated parcel "B," an adjoining 8-acre tract in section 23 of the same township and range, hereinafter designated parcel "C," and a 42½-acre tract, originally the property of one J. G. Bower, hereinafter designated parcel "D." In Mrs. Gordon's action the trial court concluded that she was entitled to water from defendant for only 9.23 acres of parcel "A," and as this right had never been denied by defendant, and was expressly conceded by the answer, gave judgment that plaintiff take nothing by her action without prejudice to her right to begin an action against certain other persons (termed "old users") and this defendant jointly to assert any right she may claim to water for a greater acreage. In the other action the court concluded: As to parcel "B," that Gordon had acquired by prescription the right to water for the southerly three acres only at the rate of one inch for eight acres measured under four-inch pressure; as to parcel "C," that Gordon was entitled to receive water at the same rate for 1.6 acres only; as to parcel "D," that he was not entitled to receive any water. As to parcels "A," "B," and "C" the alleged rights of plaintiffs are based on certain contracts.

The defendant, Covina Irrigating Company, was originally named the Azusa Water Development & Irrigation Company; its name having been changed to the Covina Irrigating Company since the execution of the various contracts hereinafter referred to. It was organized in the early 80's, and is a private mutual water company, its water, under its articles and by-laws, being distributed pro rata among its stockholders; only such surplus as is not needed for its stockholders being for sale for the benefit of the company. Prior to its organization, the ordinary flow of the San Gabriel river had been diverted during the irrigating season on both the east and west sides for irrigation purposes. On the east side, some of the water was taken out by an old ditch, known as the "public water ditch," and used by a large number of irrigators who were known in subsequent transactions as "old users." None of the land described in the complaints was susceptible of irrigation from this old ditch but a small portion of parcel "C"; the evidence being such as to support a conclusion that 1.6 acres had been irrigated by means of a lateral ditch connecting therewith. In 1882 J. T. Gordon and many others, being desirous of obtaining water for irrigating purposes from such river, began the construction of a ditch that would run from the river through their lands. Before the completion of this new ditch, the defendant began the construction of a cement ditch to carry water that it was developing by means of a tunnel in the San Gabriel canyon. The Gordons, and probably all who were interested in the new ditch then in process of construction, executed deeds to defendant of a right of way over their lands for such cement ditch, the same to conform as near as possible to the line of the new ditch then being constructed; the grantors being given the right to use such ditch in common with the defendant for conveying such water as they themselves owned or subsequently acquired, whether from the old public ditch or elsewhere. The cement ditch was completed by defendant in 1885 or early in 1886. About 14 or 15 acres of parcel "A," 4 or 5 acres of parcel "B," and about 3.5 acres of parcel "C" lie below this cement ditch. Water was at once turned into the ditch, but the evidence is such as to support a conclusion that at no time prior to 1890 was more than 9 acres of parcel "A" irrigated, or more than the southerly 3 acres of parcel "B," or more than 1.6 acres of parcel "C." In June, 1888, a contract was entered into between defendant and some 70 or 80 persons, including the plaintiffs, who had been using water from said river by means of said ditch on certain lands. This agreement recited that the right of each of these persons to a pro rata share of the water flowing in the Azusa water ditch (except  $\frac{7}{24}$ ) for irrigation and domestic use on their lands (which were described and included all of parcels "A," "B," and "C") had been recognized by the water commissioners. The agreement then acknowledged the right of each of these individuals to take from the San Gabriel river "the quantity of water heretofore used by them for irrigation and domestic use in and upon the hereinbefore described lands; the quantity of water so claimed as aforesaid being the quantity distributed to each by the aforesaid water commissioners from the said public ditch for use upon the premises aforesaid." It recited that defendant was willing to allow such persons to run said water through its cement ditch to said lands, and to acknowledge that the quantity agreed to be delivered by it to them "belongs in the whole to" them, as appurtenant to said lands. Defendant agreed to receive at the mouth of its water ditch in San Gabriel canyon all the water belonging to them, and permit the same to flow through its ditches to its laterals nearest said lands; said persons to there receive it with sufficient pipes or ditches. Said individuals, or old users, as they are generally styled, agreed to deliver at the mouth of said ditch their pro rata share of said waters. Defendant agreed that, if such water was so delivered, it would carry and deliver it "in quantities of one miner's inch to each and every eight acres of land," and when there is any water so received, flowing into or through said ditch, would give such old users the preference of use in the proportions hereinbefore stated, "provided always, however, that, should the amount of water belonging" to such old users, received at the mouth of the ditch, be less than the pro rata share belonging to them which formerly flowed through the Azusa public ditch, then the defendant agreed to deliver such lesser quantity as shall bear the same relation to one to eight acres as the water received bears to the pro rata share heretofore distributed to said users from the public ditch. It was stated that the pro rata share claimed by each party was " $\frac{1}{124}$  part of all the waters theretofore flowing in the Azusa public water ditch, less  $\frac{7}{24}$  of the whole." Defendant agreed "to receive the aforesaid water and to deliver at all times so long as it continues to receive such water, as herein agreed, one miner's inch to each eight acres of land described herein." The agreement fixed the price to be paid by the users for such service. By a supplemental agreement between the same parties, dated February 13, 1889, it was stipulated that the company would carry out its agreement even if it should develop that one or more of such persons should own and be able to deliver less than  $\frac{1}{125}$  of all the Azusa ditch water, less  $\frac{7}{24}$ , but that no one shall be entitled to more than one inch of water for each eight acres for which he has turned over to defendant the old user right for water, and that "no water shall be required of" defendant, "nor shall any of said parties have any right under this agreement in excess of the amount of water furnished by such old user to the company."

What was called the "compromise agreement," purporting to be an agreement of all parties claiming the waters of the San Gabriel canyon, bearing date January 26, 1889, was introduced in evidence. This agreement was not recorded until November 2, 1889. The agreement provided for the division of all the waters of such canyon. The parties were as follows: The Azusa Water Company was the party of the first part. The defendant, under its old name, was the party of the second part. The Duarte, etc., Company and the Beardslee, etc., Company (west side companies) were the parties of the third part. The Azusa Land & Water Company, the Azusa Agricultural Water Company, and Kate S. Vosburg and Louise S. Macneil were the parties of the fourth part. Individuals signing the agreement, "and known as old users," were the parties of the fifth part. It was agreed that so long as there may be an amount of water equal to the flow of 1,700 inches miners' measurement under four-inch pressure, or any lesser amount, at the point of division between the parties of the third part and the other parties,  $\frac{72}{720}$  should be taken by defendant,  $\frac{216}{720}$  by the parties of the third part,  $\frac{126}{720}$  by the parties of the fourth part, and  $\frac{306}{720}$  was to be "divided into as many parts as there were acres in the tract hereafter agreed to be known as 'the Azusa Water District,' and taken by parties of the fifth part, and by the parties of the first and second parts, pro rata in proportion to acreage represented therein by said first, second, and fifth parties." It was stipulated that the first and second parties shall "represent all the acreage and take the water of all lands of the so-called old users who have turned over to such corporation the management and control of the water to which they are entitled." The first, second, and fifth parties agreed on the boundaries of the acreage constituting the tract to be known as the Azusa Water District, the same being set forth. Provision was made for the division among the parties of all water in excess of 1,700 inches. Provision was made as to the place whence the various parties might take their water, and also for the payment by the several parties of their proportion of the expenses. A committee of nine was provided for, one of whom was to be selected by defendant, and two by the fifth parties, to represent all the parties and to have full charge from the source of supply to the point of division with the third parties (the west side users). Neither of the plaintiffs joined in the execution of this agreement or was by name designated as a party thereto. Only 9.23 acres of parcel "A" (the Mrs. Gordon tract) were included within the boundaries of the district described therein, while some 14 acres thereof lay below the cement ditch and could be naturally irrigated therefrom. No part of either parcel "B" or parcel "C" was included in such boundaries. About 4 or 5 acres of parcel "B," and about  $3\frac{1}{2}$  acres of parcel "C" lay below such ditch and could be irrigated therefrom.

Mr. Gordon made known to defendant his objection to having his lands excluded from the compromise agreement, and a proposed contract was prepared by Mr. Wicks, a large stockholder of defendant, between the Gordons and the parties of the first, second, and fifth parts (the last being the old users) in the compromise agreement, reciting that the Gordons are "old users \* \* \* through the old main ditch," and are entitled to share in the compromise, and stipulating that all of parcels "B" and "C," and an additional six acres more or less in parcel "A," "which can be irrigated from the cement ditch," is entitled to a water right equal to any similar area in said Azusa Water District, and that the Gordons shall be supplied with water from the cement ditch "out of the  $\frac{306}{720}$  of the first 1,700 inches, and out of the  $\frac{226}{720}$  of the water above 1,700 inches." This agreement was executed by the defendant, by the Azusa Irrigating Company, and by only 9 of the some 75 old users who had joined in the execution of the compromise agreement. This contract was delivered by defendant to Mr. Gordon, but there was testimony sufficient to support the conclusion that Mr. Wicks informed the board of directors of defendant, in the presence of Mr. Gordon, "that, in order to make the contract effective, all the irrigators in the old district would have to sign it to make it binding on the company."

Ever since the execution of the compromise agreement, the committee of nine provided for therein has had entire charge of the distribution and delivery of water to the various companies, and the trial court found that "the only water permitted by said committee of nine to flow to the defendant for use by old users under contract with the defendant \* \* \* has been water appurtenant to lands and for use upon lands within the boundaries of said Azusa Water District," except that water for 1.6 acres of parcel "C" was permitted to so flow and has been received by defendant. Ever since 1890 from  $14\frac{1}{2}$  to 15 acres of parcel "A" (the Emma J. Gordon tract) has been under cultivation, and water was delivered to it without objection, on the basis of one-eighth of an inch to the acre, on the theory that it was entitled to a 15-acre user water right under the compromise agreement from 1890 until the year 1902, when it was cut down to a  $\frac{923}{100}$  acre right. Such water the court finds was received by Mrs. Gordon, "not from the stock water of the defendant, but from the old user water which was carried by the defendant, and to which the old users under contract with the defendant, and owning land within the boundaries of the Azusa water district, were entitled." As to parcel "C" (the 8-acre tract), no use of water was required or shown subsequent to the compromise agreement until "some time in 1901 or 1902," when water was delivered for one season to a tenant. There was a conflict of evidence on the proposition whether this was stock or old-user water, and the court found that it was "stock water to which the plaintiff was entitled by virtue of stock of defendant company," but that plaintiff at that time demanded old-user water therefor. A subsequent demand for old-user water for another season was never complied with. In 1906 Gordon set out this tract in orange trees. His demands for old-user water for this tract have never been complied with. As to parcel "B" (the 10-acre tract), the evidence was such as to support a conclusion that no water was ever received by Gordon for more than 3 acres. His demands for a larger portion of "old-user" water, repeatedly made since May 12, 1902, have always been denied. These actions were commenced May 10, 1905. In addition to other findings, the court found in response to allegations to that effect made by the answers, first, that the other parties to the contract of June, 1888, and the contract supplemental thereto, were necessary parties to a determination of the questions involved relating to parcel "A," but not as to parcels "B" and "C," and, second, that the causes of action set forth in the complaints are barred by the provisions of sections 318, 337, and 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] It is clear that whatever rights plaintiffs acquired under the contract of June, 1888, and the supplemental contract of February 13, 1889, to receive water for irrigation on parcels "A," "B," and "C," as against defendant, cannot be held to be affected by the so-called compromise agreement dated January 26, 1889. They were not parties to that agreement, and, of course, if they had been given rights by the prior agreements, those rights could not be affected by an agreement to which they were not parties. Nor can they be held to have acquired any additional right by virtue of such compromise agreement (except as to the 9.23 acres of parcel "A" included in the water district described therein), or the attempted agreement of February 23, 1889, purporting to give them rights under the compromise agreement. As to the compromise agreement, the provision relied on by appellants to the effect that the defendant shall represent all the acreage and take the water of all lands of the so-called old users who have turned over to such corporation the management and control of the water to which they are entitled clearly had reference only to the acreage included in the water district specifically described in such agreement, and the old users on such acreage. The attempted agreement of February 23, 1889, on its face contemplated an execution by all the old users who had signed the compromise agreement. Its provisions were of such a nature that it could not be effectual as against any of such old users who did not join in its execution. By its express provisions, the additional water to be given to Mrs. Gordon, and all of the water to be given to Mr. Gordon, was to be taken from the portion allotted by the compromise agreement to the acreage embraced in the water district described therein. So much of their land "as can be irrigated from the cement ditch" was to be added to and made a part of such water district, and thus made entitled to receive water belonging under the compromise agreement solely to the acreage described therein. As we have seen, the evidence was sufficient to support the conclusion that Mr. Gordon was informed that, to make the attempted contract effective against defendant, all the irrigators in the old district would have to sign it. But, independent of this the attempted contract was such on its face as to show the necessity for this.

[2] The material question, then, is as to the rights of the plaintiffs against defendant under the contract of June, 1888, and the supplemental contract of February 13, 1889. We are of the opinion that it must be held, as was practically held by the lower court, that the defendant simply undertook to take such water as might be delivered to it by the so-called old users, and carry it for them through its ditch to their lands, at a prescribed charge; the amount to be furnished any old user, however, not to exceed more than one inch of water for each eight acres of land, or such lesser quantity as shall bear the same relation to one to eight acres as the water received bears to the pro rata share theretofore distributed to said users from the public ditch. Practically, the defendant made itself a carrier of their water for the old users, and its liability in that connection to any such user was dependent on receiving water to be carried from or for him. Whatever uncertainty may exist in the provisions of the contract of June, 1888, on this point is removed by the clear and explicit provision in the supplemental contract that none of said parties "shall * * * have any right under this agreement in excess of the amount of water furnished by such old user to the company." By the agreement, the old users expressly undertook "to deliver" to defendant, at the mouth of the ditch, their pro rata share of the water, and defendant agreed that, "if the aforesaid water is delivered to them as aforesaid, * * * they will carry and deliver" it, etc. There was no obligation on the part of defendant to carry or deliver to any of the old users any water except that received for them, and certainly no obligation on its part to furnish to either of plaintiffs any of its own water acquired for its stockholders and for sale if there was a surplus over the amount required for the stockholders.

There can be no doubt as to the purpose of the compromise agreement so far as the intent to exclude plaintiffs from any participation in the waters of the San Gabriel canyon, except as to the 9.23 acres of Mrs. Gordon included in the water district described therein, is concerned. This agreement purported to cover all the waters of such canyon, and to provide for their division in a specified way, to the exclusion of plaintiffs, except as to said 9.23 acres of Mrs. Gordon. The old users joining in the execution thereof formally declared that the only acreage entitled to any old users' water was that described therein. Plaintiffs had full notice of this claim and of the subsequent acts of the parties under it.

The agents of the parties provided for in such agreement, the committee of nine, at all times thereafter had actual possession of all the waters of the canyon for the purposes of distribution and delivery, and there was enough in the evidence to support the conclusion of the trial court that the only water permitted by said committee to flow to defendant for use by old users, except water for 1.6 acres of parcel "C," has been water for acreage included within the limits of the water district described in such agreement. Whatever may have been the right of the Gordons as against those appropriating to their own use waters in fact belonging to them (the Gordons), if they so did, it would seem to necessarily follow that the Gordons did not deliver to defendant, either personally or by agents, old-user water to be carried to their premises (except as to the 9.23 acres of parcel "A" and the 1.6 acres of parcel "C"), and that, in the absence of such delivery, there is no liability on the part of defendant to deliver to them any of such old-user water. As we have seen, the only obligation of defendant under the contracts with plaintiffs was in respect to such old-user water, and there was no obligation on its part to furnish any of its own water to them. As to the excess over 9.23 acres of Mrs. Gordon's land furnished with water from 1890 to 1902, between five and six acres, such water being furnished from the old-user water and as water to which she was thought to be entitled under the compromise agreement, it may be that Mrs. Gordon acquired the right to have such supply continued, but we think it very clear that the other old users were necessary parties to the determination of that question, and that the defense of nonjoinder of necessary parties in that regard was properly sustained by the lower court. As already noted, the judgment expressly provided that it was without prejudice to the right of Mrs. Gordon to prosecute another action against the old users referred to in the answer and against the defendant as the distributor of their waters, and to assert and enforce such rights as she may have. In view of what we have said, it is apparent that the complaint of appellants in regard to the conclusions of the trial court as to parcels "B" and "C," owned by Mr. Gordon, cannot be held well founded.

[3] As to parcel "D," originally the Bower tract, an altogether different question is presented. The sole claim of Mr. Gordon as to this land is based on the provisions of a deed dated September 10, 1883, executed by James G. Bower, the then owner of such tract, to defendant. By this instrument, Bower, for an expressed consideration of \$10, remised, released, and quitclaimed to defendant a right of way over the land of Bower in the N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of section 26, Township 1 N., Range 10 W., S. B. M. (which included this land), and on a line sufficiently described, for a water ditch of sufficient capacity to convey 5,000 inches of water, the same to be so constructed as not to obstruct any roads of Bower, defendant to construct and maintain crossings over said ditch where necessary for Bower's use, and "said first party (Bower) to have the right to purchase and use the water of said ditch upon the same terms and conditions as the stockholders of said corporation." Defendant's ditch has been constructed along the line designated in the deed. Bower conveyed this tract of land to one J. S. Slauson, Slauson to Henry Martz on April 29, 1887, Martz to one George W. McKennon on January 9, 1900, and McKennon to plaintiff, John T. Gordon, on January 9, 1902. All of the deeds were in the form of grant, bargain, and sale deeds, and conveyed the land "together with the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging or in any wise appertaining," but contain no special reference to any right to water from defendant. The trial court found upon sufficient evidence that no water was ever furnished for irrigation of said land, except that for two seasons (1890 and 1891) water was delivered to a tenant in possession of said premises, but that the same was delivered to such tenant under and by virtue of stock of defendant company held by the tenant or his lessor, and was not delivered as water to which said land was entitled under the terms of said contract or any contract. It further found that neither the deed executed by Bower to the predecessor in interest of plaintiff, nor any of the mesne conveyances, contained any assignment or grant by Bower of any right held or claimed by Bower to take or use water from said ditch. It also found that only about five acres of said land are below the cement ditch or can be irrigated therefrom. It also found that plaintiff's claim as to this land was barred by the provisions of sections 318, 337, and 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The question in this connection is as to the meaning and effect of the provision that Bower is to "have the right to purchase and use the water of said ditch upon the same terms and conditions as the stockholders of said corporation." The claim of Mr. Gordon is that this created a right appurtenant to the land of Bower over which the ditch was constructed, entitling the owner thereof to purchase and use thereon the waters of this ditch to the extent of the requirements of such land, upon the same terms and conditions as the stockholders of defendant. Defendant, on the other hand, claims that the right created was one personal to Bower, an easement in gross, and that such right did not pass by simple transfer of the land. So far as the record shows, as claimed by defendant, the water of defendant "is not made appurtenant to any land, but is distributed to the shareholders in proportion to their stock, and * * * can be used and * * * is used by stockholders upon any land that they may choose, either their own, or upon sale by them to other landowners." Section 2 of article 9 of its by-laws is as follows: "All water developed or acquired by this company shall be divided pro rata in proportion to the amount of stock they severally hold amongst the stockholders, provided that, if there be a surplus not needed for the stockholders' use, it may be sold for the benefit of the company."

In the light of the facts as to the rights of stockholders of defendant corporation in regard to the water of the company, it is apparent that the provision relied on is very uncertain and indefinite in its terms. The intent to limit the effect of the provision to any particular land is by no means clear. The land in fact owned by Bower in the 160 acres constituting the N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of the N.  $\frac{1}{2}$  of section 26, township 1 N., range 10 W., S. B. M., is not described in the deed, and the "right to purchase and use the water of said ditch" is not, in terms, limited to the land owned by him or to any other particular land. The only prescribed limitation on the right is expressed in the words "upon the same terms and conditions as the stockholders of said corporation." The right is given simply to the "said first party" (James G. Bower). According to the evidence, the right of a stockholder to use water is not appurtenant to any land, but he may change his place of use as he sees fit. According to findings sufficiently supported by the evidence, there has been no practical construction by any of the parties in favor of the theory that it was intended to make this right appurtenant to the land. In fact, under such findings, the only practical construction shown was opposed to such theory. For nearly 20 years no one apparently claimed the right to water under this contract, and, in the two seasons in which water was furnished for use on this land, it was demanded and received upon stock of the company. In view of all the circumstances, we are of the opinion that the trial court was warranted in concluding, despite the presumption that an easement is to be deemed appurtenant to some other estate whenever it can fairly be construed as such, rather than one in gross, that the right created was one personal to Bower, and not an appurtenance to any particular land. If this be true, it admittedly follows that there has been no assignment of the right, and that Mr. Gordon acquired no interest therein by reason of the conveyance of the land to him in the year 1902, which was the year when the dispute commenced between plaintiff and defendant as to water rights. We appreciate the force of the argument of learned counsel for Mr. Gordon to the effect that treating the provision as one personal to Bower, and placing him in the exact position of a stockholder of defendant, by reason of the fact that he did not own any stock there would be no way of determining the proportion of water which he was entitled to purchase. But, assuming that no measure of his right in this regard can be found in the deed, we do not think that such fact alone would compel the construction sought by plaintiffs to be given to this provision. It may be that the provision, construed as it was by the lower court, would be void for uncertainty, and still remain that no other construction might fairly be given to it. But it is suggested by counsel for defendant that, construing the provision as one personal to Bower, it might reasonably be held that there was a limitation on the amount of water he might purchase, and that he could take only such amount as would suffice to irrigate such of his land as lay below the ditch, with the right to make such use of the same as he saw fit. However, it is not necessary to determine as to this.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Replevin by John B. Chase against W. H. Holmes and others, doing business under the firm name and style of W. H. Holmes & Co. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Charles W. Hatton, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Ray L. Chesebro, of Los Angeles, for appellee.

ALLEN, P. J. The action was one in claim and delivery. The facts as found by the court are these: Plaintiff, the payee of a promissory note for $2,000, intrusted same with defendants, a collection agency, with authority to collect, upon an agreement to pay 15 per cent. on all moneys collected thereon. The note was assigned to defendants for collection and a suit instituted, pending which a settlement was effected through which the payor paid in money to plaintiff $547.50, transferred 10 shares of corporate stock, and executed a new note to the original payee for $600. Plaintiff paid to defendants the sum of $81 as commission on such collection, and transferred the certificate of stock for 10 shares under an agreement that 15 per cent. thereof, or 1½ shares, should be transferred to defendants, and the remaining 8½ shares to plaintiff. The court finds that this payment and transfer were in full settlement of all accounts due defendants for effecting such settlement; that on the date of such settlement plaintiff delivered said $600 note to defendants upon the further agreement that they should retain 15 per cent. of any sum collected thereon. Defendants were unable to collect said note, or any part thereof, and, shortly after its maturity, plaintiff demanded possession thereof, which was refused; hence this action.

ment and an order denying a new trial. More than six months having elapsed after entry of the judgment, the appeal therefrom cannot be considered.

The only matter requiring attention relates to the action of the court in denying a new trial. The specifications of error are as to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the finding with reference to the original agreement through which 15 per cent. of the moneys received should constitute defendants' compensation, and that the sum of $81 and the transfer of 1½ shares of stock were received by the defendants in full satisfaction of their commission. We find evidence in the record sustaining the findings of the trial court; in fact, defendants' evidence goes far in that direction, were that of the plaintiff to be disregarded. The note in controversy was delivered to defendants and a receipt given therefor which states that the same was received for collection.

[2] Defendants incurred no expense other than that defrayed by plaintiff, and, under the agreement evidenced by this receipt, had no interest or claim other than the right to retain a per cent. upon moneys collected. Defendants collected nothing and were not agents with power coupled with interest, and the agency existing was one revocable under section 2356, Civil Code. Plaintiff having revoked this agency, he was entitled to possession of the note.

We see no error in the record warranting a reversal of the order denying a new trial, and the same is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Teofil Klempeke was convicted of second-degree burglary, and appeals from a judgment and order denying a motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

P. C. Kibbe, of San Luis Obispo, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., of Los Angeles, for the People.

ALLEN, P. J. Appellant was convicted of burglary in the second degree. From the judgment pronounced he appeals.

There can be no serious question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict. Positive testimony appears in the record to the effect that defendant was seen emerging from a car used as a habitation by certain employes of a railroad company; that entrance thereto had been effected through force; that defendant, after leaving said car, had in his possession property belonging to the men living therein. His arrest immediately followed, while he still retained possession of the property.

Appellant seeks a reversal of the judgment on account of certain rulings of the trial court which he claims were erroneous and prejudicial. The defendant was shown to be a native of Russia and to have been in this country only 18 months. Evidence was admitted tending to show that defendant, through the use of the English language, made certain incriminatory statements with reference to the property in his possession shortly after his arrest. A witness, shown to have had but a limited acquaintance and means of observation with reference thereto, was asked if defendant could speak the English language; counsel announcing that by such evidence he expected to prove that defendant could not speak the English language. An objection was interposed to this question, which was sustained by the court, and this ruling is claimed to have been erroneous. It is certain that the witness could not of his own knowledge state as a matter of fact that defendant could not speak or understand a given language. His answer could only be in the nature of an opinion.

[1] It may be that one, after an extended acquaintance, with opportunities for observation and proper tests, would be a competent witness to give an opinion as to the inability of another to speak or understand a given language, but it is for the trial court in the exercise of a sound discretion to determine the qualification of such witness so to be heard. In the case under consideration the court determined that such witness was not so qualified, and we cannot say that any abuse of this discretionary power is made to appear.

[2] The court upon another occasion sustained an objection to a question asked of a witness as to the number of times as a peace officer he had been called upon to testify in criminal cases. This evidence could have no effect other than that of affecting the credibility of the witness, and we are unable to see how the testimony of a peace officer could be affected by proof of the fact that he had in other cases been called upon to testify as a witness.

[3] We see no error in the action of the court sustaining an objection to a question propounded to a witness as to his knowledge of defendant's honesty and integrity. The question was too general, and did not purport to show his reputation in the community in which he lived. People v. Murphy, 146 Cal. 506, 80 Pac. 709. Numerous exceptions and specifications of error relate to the exclusion of evidence going to show want of motive.

[4] The commission of a crime by defendant was clearly established by positive evidence, and the motive therefore became unimportant. People v. Besold, 154 Cal. 369, 97 Pac. 871. Numerous exceptions are specified as to the action of the trial court in the matter of instructions to the jury. An examination of the record discloses no prejudicial error in relation thereto. Certain of these instructions refused, which were specific in their character, were covered by the general instructions, while a portion thereof purported to instruct as to matters not in evidence. The court in our opinion fairly and fully instructed the jury as to the law of the case presented by the evidence. We see no prejudicial error based upon the statements or acts of the district attorney, nor of the trial court. Nothing therein in our opinion was of such character as to warrant a reversal on account thereof. The record discloses a verdict, and judgment proper under the evidence, and no miscarriage of justice can be said to have resulted.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Action by F. H. Hecker against R. M. Baker. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles M. Ackerman, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Lucius M. Fall, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. The action was one to recover for certain services rendered by plaintiff to defendant. Defendant by his answer denies the performance of the services, their value, or that any services were performed at defendant's request or for his benefit. Findings and judgment went for defendant, and plaintiff appeals under the alternative method.

[1] Objection is made by respondent to a consideration of the transcript because the notice required by section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, was not given in time. Whether or not the notice of entry of the judgment was in fact given was a question of fact for determination by the judge to whom the transcript was presented for certification. It is true that the record discloses that the transcript was signed by a judge other than the trial judge, but a stipulation appears in the record to the effect that the transcript should be signed by the presiding judge, and it is so signed. Being signed in the manner agreed upon, and no objection being made at the time to the delay in the notice of the entry of judgment, it must be presumed, in support of the record, that the question of fact was determined adversely to respondent, and that the presiding judge properly authenticated the transcript as he was authorized to do by the stipulation. It was the duty of respondent, if he desired to object to the authentication of the transcript and have reviewed the action of the court below in relation to the certification, to have presented the matter to this court upon a bill of exceptions, under which only can questions of fact be reviewed. It is not within our province to consider affidavits attached to the record and not embodied in a bill of exceptions.

[2] Considering the appeal, then, upon its merits, we find evidence in the transcript tending to show that defendant, the owner of certain premises, proposed to plaintiff to engage with him in business as occupants of such premises, defendant to fit up the premises in a proper manner, and when ready for business defendant to be allowed a rent for the room and fixtures. The stock was to be bought on joint account, and the profits, after payment of expenses, to be divided. This plaintiff agreed to, on the condition, however, that he was to be permitted to purchase all furniture and fittings, for the reason that he could buy cheaper than another by reason of already being in the business. The parties had various consultations over the purchases during the progress of fitting up the room, a part of which furniture consisted of an expensive soda fountain purchased by plaintiff and paid for by defendant. After the room was fitted for business, plaintiff declined to enter into the joint possession of the premises upon the plea that it would interfere with an established business then being conducted by him. He, however, when defendant remonstrated with him upon his failure to carry out his original plan, suggested that he would gladly show defendant, or those in his employ, how to conduct the business, and would give him the directions as to the preparation of certain articles designed for sale in the business. Plaintiff did give some instructions in the preparation of certain articles for the market and made occasional visits to the place, but it is obvious, if the trial court accepted as true the statements of defendant and his witnesses, that such services were rendered without any intent on plaintiff's part to charge a compensation therefor; in fact, there is to be found in the record declarations of plaintiff to that effect. The circumstances surrounding the parties when the various services were rendered, together with the evidence in the record in connection with their performance, we think, clearly justifies the court in finding the same to have been gratuitous upon the part of plaintiff, and that the settlement had between the parties was intended to be and was a full and final adjustment of all differences between them.

We see no error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

1. REPLEVIN (§ 68*)—AMENDMENT TO COMPLAINT.

The allowance of an amendment to the complaint in replevin excluding some of personality claimed in the original complaint was within the court's discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Replevin, Cent. Dig. §§ 251-256; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

2. PLEADING (§ 236*)—AMENDMENTS—CONFORMITY TO PROOF.

In replevin to recover personality claimed to have been purchased in connection with real estate sold to plaintiff by defendants, husband and wife, there was evidence that the wife was not the actual vendor, but represented to plaintiff that she had no interest in the property but that it belonged solely to her husband, and after the evidence was in, but before submission, the court permitted an amendment to the complaint setting up an estoppel as against her to deny her husband's ownership of the personality by reason of her representations to plaintiff that he owned it. Held, that there was no abuse of discretion in permitting the amendment to make the complaint conform to the proof.

3. ESTOPPEL (§ 83*)—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL—MISREPRESENTATIONS.

In replevin to recover personality claimed to have been purchased from defendant under representations by his wife, also a defendant, that he owned the property, it appeared that during the negotiations the wife deliberately led him to believe that her husband owned the personality and frequently told him that she did not own any of it, and that plaintiff believed such statements and acted upon them, and upon such belief purchased the property. Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3, provides that whenever one has, by his own declaration or act, intentionally and deliberately led another to believe a particular thing to be true and to act upon such belief, he cannot, in litigation arising therefrom, be permitted to falsify it. Held, that the wife was estopped from denying that her husband owned the personality purchased by plaintiff.

4. EVIDENCE (§ 460*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—EXPLAINING CONTRACT—SALE.

A memorandum of the sale of personality which merely recited that it included "all personal property on said ranches, live stock, hay, grain, and farm and dairy implements, furniture, etc., except 14 head horses, two dozen chickens, and piano and parlor table and hall piece, one saddle and bridle," was incomplete so that parol evidence was admissible to identify the property described as sold with that described in the complaint; such evidence not varying the memorandum.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 994*)—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Any inconsistencies in the evidence of a given witness is a matter solely for the consideration of the jury and trial court.

6. REPLEVIN (§ 93*)—VERDICT—CONFORMITY TO PLEADINGS.

Where the answer in replevin did not ask for the return of property included in the original, but omitted from the amended complaint, there was no issue as to such property, so that the verdict need not find for defendants for its return.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; James F. Lodge, Judge.

Action by Robert M. Mills against Thomas J. Jackson and another. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court; Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

Jas. F. Farragher, of Yreka, for appellants. J. M. O'Neill and L. E. Coburn, both of Yreka, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was in replevin. It grew out of the purchase by plaintiff of certain real and personal property for the sum of $35,000. At the time of the agreement for the sale a memorandum was drawn up by Mr. Mills and signed by Mr. Jackson, as follows: "March 8th, 1911, received of Robt. M. Mills $500, being part of the purchase price, for the ranch, known as the Arbaugh Ranch and the Arenburgh Ranch and also the ranch known as the French Ranch in McCloud or Squaw Valley ranch, containing in all 965 acres with all appurtenances, also all personal property on said ranches, live stock, hay and grain, farm and dairy implements, furniture, etc. Except 14 head horses, 2 doz. chickens, and piano and parlor table and hall piece, one saddle and bridle. Consideration for the three above named ranches thirty-five thousand dollars to be cash payment." The balance of the consideration was afterwards paid by plaintiff, but a dispute arose as to the articles of personal property covered by the agreement, and hence this suit. Before trial plaintiff was permitted to amend his complaint by excluding some of the personal property claimed therein, and, after the evidence was in, but before submission of the case, another amendment was allowed setting up an equitable estoppel against defendant Emma H. Jackson. The jury trying the case found the following verdict: "We, the jury impaneled to try the case wherein Robert M. Mills is plaintiff and Thomas J. Jackson and Emma H. Jackson are defendants, do find for the plaintiff and fix the value of the property mentioned in the complaint at the sum of $833."

We deem unnecessary elaborate treatment of the points made by appellant, as the principles involved are elementary and familiar. Neither do we feel called upon to set out the evidence, as it is known to the parties and can be of no particular importance to any one else.

[1] That it was within the discretion of the court to permit the plaintiff to file the said amendments to his complaint we entertain no doubt. The purpose was to promote the determination of the cause upon its merits with as little expense and trouble as possible, and the proceeding was clearly within the letter and the spirit of our reformed procedure. No reason is apparent why a party who brings an action and subsequently discovers that he is entitled to only a portion of that for which he sues should not be permitted, by amendment to his complaint, to invoke the judgment of the court or jury upon the real issue between the parties. It seems difficult to understand why he should be compelled to try the title to something to which he has found out before trial that he had no title and when he has concluded not to assert title to it. Of course, if defendants had been taken by surprise or put to additional expense, no doubt the court, upon a proper showing, might and would have imposed terms upon plaintiff, but no such case is presented.

[2] It is equally clear that, upon principle and authority, the court was justified in allowing an amendment to conform to the proof. The complaint was framed upon the theory that the property was sold to plaintiff by the defendants. There was evidence at the trial that defendant Emma H. Jackson was not an actual vendor but that she represented to the purchaser that she had no interest in the property, but that it belonged solely to her husband, defendant Thomas J. Jackson. It was to meet this theory that the amendment was allowed. The equitable estoppel thereby pleaded was undoubtedly germane to the issue of ownership, which was before the jury for determination. Upon this branch of the case it is deemed sufficient to cite the following authorities: Sections 469 and 470, Code of Civil Procedure; Hedstrom v. Union Trust Co., 7 Cal. App. 278, 94 Pac. 386; Jackson v. Jackson, 94 Cal. 462, 29 Pac. 957; Firebaugh v. Burbank, 121 Cal. 193, 53 Pac. 560.

[3] Appellants' claim that the equitable estoppel was not sufficiently pleaded is unwarranted. Plaintiff, following substantially the language of subdivision 3 of section 1962, Code of Civil Procedure, averred: "That at the time of making such purchase by the plaintiff as aforesaid and prior thereto, during the negotiations that led up to said purchase, she deliberately led the plaintiff to believe that the said Thomas Jackson was the owner of said personal property. That she frequently told this plaintiff during such negotiations, and at the time that said purchase was completed, that she did not own any of said property, but that the said defendant Thomas J. Jackson did own the same and the whole thereof, and that the plaintiff did believe said statements of said defendant and did act upon them and upon such belief, and, acting upon such belief and statements, he did purchase such property as aforesaid." We find thus presented clearly all the elements of equitable estoppel, or an instance of what the Code classifies as conclusive presumptions. Section 1962, Code Civ. Proc. It appears that by her acts and declarations she deliberately and intentionally led plaintiff to believe that her husband was the owner of said property and to act upon said belief in its purchase. It would follow that she is estopped from denying said ownership.

[4] The court did not err in allowing parol evidence of the negotiations between the parties. The effect of this was not to vary the terms of any written contract. It is apparent that the written memorandum received in evidence is quite incomplete as to the personal property. There was no attempt therein to enumerate or specify the articles definitely, and hence parol evidence was proper and necessary for their identification—in other words, for the purpose of showing that the personal property described in the complaint was identical with that intended to be and actually sold. Habenicht v. Lassak, 77 Cal. 139, 19 Pac. 260. Since Emma H. Jackson also participated in these negotiations, the evidence was admissible against her, since it is admitted that she did not sign said written instrument. This would be so, upon either theory, that she was a part owner, or that by her acts and declarations she was estopped from denying the ownership of her husband. Since a part of the purchase money was paid at the time of the sale and afterwards the balance, she is in no position to urge, in opposition to this view, the statute of frauds as prescribed in section 1624 of the Civil Code.

The original complaint, as we have seen, alleged that plaintiff purchased the property "from the defendants." The complaint was in this form when a motion for nonsuit was made by appellant Emma H. Jackson. While the more plausible view of the case is that presented in the complaint as finally amended, there is found in the record substantial support for the action of the court in denying said motion. So it may be said as to the verdict of the jury and the final judgment that they are legally justified.

[5] Appellants criticize with considerable asperity the testimony of plaintiff, and it must be admitted that the transcript discloses some apparent inconsistencies and contradictions therein, but this was a matter solely for the consideration of the jury and trial court. After a reading of all the testimony, it is sufficient for us to say that it affords legal support for the finding against appellants. The evidence as to the value of the personal property is indeed meagre, but this feature of the case is unimportant in view of the fact that plaintiff, at the time of the trial, had the property in his possession; the evidence showing that he had taken it by auxiliary process as provided in section 509 et seq., of the Code of Civil Procedure. There is some general criticism of the action of the court in the matter of instructions. We think, however, that the law was fully and fairly disclosed therein, and we can see no ground for appellants' complaint.

[6] It is claimed that the jury should have found in favor of appellants for the return of the property included in the original but omitted from the amended complaint. No such verdict, however, was demanded in the amended answer, and therefore no issue was presented as to these articles. The reason why no such demand was made is probably because said property had been returned by plaintiff. It is stated by respondent in his brief, and not denied by appellants, that said property had been restored to defendants before the trial of the action. This being true, and the plaintiff having abandoned all claim to them, they were, of course, eliminated from further consideration. The situation in Howell v. Foster, 65 Cal. 169, 3 Pac. 647, was quite different, as is apparent from a reading of that case. No other point is deemed of sufficient importance to merit specific attention.

We find no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BLAIR. (Cr. 184.)

1. EMBEZZLEMENT (§ 11*)—ELEMENTS—DEMAND FOR RETURN OF PROPERTY.

To constitute the crime of embezzlement, a demand for the return of the embezzled property is not necessary where the fraudulent appropriation is established by other sufficient proof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Embezzlement, Cent. Dig. §§ 9, 10; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

2. EMBEZZLEMENT (§ 39*)—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

On a trial for embezzlement, the admission of evidence as to the disposition of the property made by accused after his arrest, not for the purpose of showing embezzlement subsequent to his arrest, but as relating back and showing his intention, if he did embezzle it before, was proper.

3. EMBEZZLEMENT (§ 44*)—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence on a trial for embezzlement held sufficient to support a conviction although no demand had been made that the property be returned by accused or applied by him to the purpose for which it was delivered to him.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ERROR FAVORABLE TO APPELLANT.

On a trial for embezzlement, the court charged that one who acts as the agent of another and in such capacity is intrusted with and receives into his care any money for the use of another person, and fraudulently appropriates it to his own use or to any use or purpose not in due and lawful execution of his trust, was guilty of embezzlement, and that, if the jury found that accused did unlawfully, fraudulently, and feloniously convert, embezzle, and appropriate the money mentioned in the information to his own use and contrary to his trust as agent, he should be found guilty. A requested instruction which was erroneous as requiring a demand for the return of the property or its application to the purpose for which it was delivered to accused was given by the court so modified as to charge that it was the duty of accused to apply the property to such purpose within a reasonable time, that the jury were the judges under the circumstances of what was a reasonable time, and that if no demand for its return was made, and if an unreasonable time had not elapsed, the jury should acquit. Held that, if this instruction was erroneous as weakening the force of the correct instruction given and as making accused's guilt or innocence depend upon performance of his duty within a reasonable time, such error was favorable to accused, and hence not ground for reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

William T. Blair was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Leslie E. Johnston, of Napa City, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, of Sacramento, for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant was tried and convicted on an information charging him with the crime of embezzlement, committed at the county of Napa about June 19, 1911. He appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

It is contended: First, that the evidence fails to show that defendant was guilty of embezzlement; and, second, that the court erred in refusing to give the only instruction requested by defendant and in giving it as modified by the court.

1. Upon the first point defendant contends that the complaining witness, Mrs. Booker, "intrusted the sum of $3,500 to defendant with which to buy a farm or ranch. No time was specified within which the purchase was to be made; no place was specified as to where the ranch or farm was to be purchased. The amount defendant was to pay for the ranch was not mentioned, and no demand was ever made upon defendant that he return the money or carry out the trust." The evidence was that no demand had been made upon defendant for a return of the money; that defendant received the money about June 19, 1911, deposited it in a bank in Napa, and about that date drew it out and departed from Napa with it, and was not afterwards seen by Mrs. Booker until after his arrest in January, 1912. It does not appear that Mrs. Booker had any opportunity to make a demand upon defendant otherwise than by letter, and, as he told her in a letter written by him July 20, 1911, from some place in Arkansas, that he was about "to start to Sacramento" and that he wanted her "to leave off writing until" she heard from him, there was no opportunity after that date even by letter.

[1] But upon this point we think defendant is in error in his contention that a demand was necessary in order to make the conversion of the money embezzlement. The law is very well stated in the case of People v. Hatch, 125 Pac. 907, wherein the opinion refers to at least two of the cases relied upon by defendant. We quote: "It is claimed that no demand was shown to have been made upon defendant for the money involved with which it was his duty to comply. In the first place, the guilt or innocence of defendant does not necessarily depend upon the question whether or not any demand has been made upon him for the money involved. The real question is, Does the evidence show a fraudulent appropriation by defendant of the money involved? Neither People v. Page, 116 Cal. 387, 48 Pac. 326, nor People v. Royce, 106 Cal. 173, 37 Pac. 630, 39 Pac. 524, lays down the rule that a demand is necessary as a matter of law to constitute an embezzlement. In each of these cases the court discussed the evidence and held that it was insufficient to support a verdict of guilty, and in so doing adverted to the fact that no demand had been made, and in each case also adverted to the fact that it had not been shown that the defendant had in fact or at all appropriated the money involved to his own use, or that he did not have it on hand at all times to meet any demand if one had been made. 'No doubt embezzlement may be established under certain circumstances without proof of a demand, as where other evidence clearly shows an appropriation by an employé of his employer's funds, with intent to do so fraudulently and feloniously.' People v. Royce, supra. In some cases, in the absence of other sufficient proof, a demand may be necessary to fix the fact of the fraudulent appropriation; but the real test always is, Does the whole evidence establish the crime charged—that is, a fraudulent appropriation as charged in the indictment? People v. Ward, 134 Cal. 301 [66 Pac. 372]." It thus appears that it is only in the absence of other sufficient proof that a demand may be necessary to fix the fact of the fraudulent appropriation; the true test being: "Does the whole evidence establish the crime charged?"

The complaining witness, Mrs. Booker, is a widow of 75 years, and in the month of March or April, 1911, resided at St. Helena. She hired defendant to work for her at that time, and later, while in her service, she intrusted $3,500 to defendant for the purpose of purchasing a farm, mentioning Kansas, Arkansas, Missouri, and Colorado as the states in which he was to make the purchase. The evidence would justify the inference that Mrs. Booker's understanding was that defendant would purchase a ranch for her and for her support while she lived and to go to defendant at her death. Defendant journeyed through these states and wrote Mrs. Booker four letters which were introduced in evidence. One of them was dated Cord, Arkansas, June 28th, in which he speaks of liking Colorado better than Arkansas. The next letter was dated at the same place, July 8, 1911, acknowledging the receipt of a letter from Mrs. Booker, and informs her that he may come to Napa. The third letter was dated "Cabool, July 20," and informs Mrs. Booker that he will start for Sacramento soon and tells her to "leave off writing" to him until she hears from him. The last letter is dated Holden, Missouri, August 5th in which defendant wrote: "Mrs. Booker—Dear Ma: I will be in Sacramento, Cal., soon. Then I will write and tell you what to do. I want to see you enjoy life. I will locate in Ogden, Utah, on Salt Lake as that is the best climate I have been in since I left you. Now cheer up and don't think the time long for I have had a hard time. Good bye. As ever, Your Will." We next hear of defendant under arrest in January, 1912, at Camas, a small town near Vancouver, state of Washington, and of his extradition for the offense here charged. Of his movements after August, 1911, nothing appears except as shown by his own statements to the arresting officers and the officers sent from this state. To one of these he stated that he came to Napa and tried to find Mrs. Booker, and from there he went to St. Helena. No account of his subsequent whereabouts or what he was doing appears. He did not find Mrs. Booker and she did not know of his return, and whether he made any effort to find her is not shown. Defendant introduced no evidence. To the officer who brought him back from Vancouver he stated: That when arrested he had $2,050, in a belt around his body, of the money intrusted to him by Mrs. Booker; that he went to a bank with the sheriff who arrested him and deposited the money; that he "put one over on Cressep, the sheriff of Clark county, in reference to the possession of the money," which he further explained was done by giving a lawyer at Vancouver checks for all of this money. Concerning the intrusting of the money to him by Mrs. Booker, he said: "She called him in the house and gave him $50, two $20 bills and a $10 bill, then subsequently she gave him $3,500 and he was to buy a ranch some place in the east, he was to buy a ranch, and they were going to be married when he got the ranch. When he said that I said, 'What did you do with the rest of the money? You only had $2,000, that was $1,500 shy?' Well, he said if he could get to talk with Mrs. Booker 15 minutes he could settle the matter all right. He said he had property that he bought for $1,000 some place, when he could see Mrs. Booker he could explain it. That was in substance the conversation we had with reference to the money."

[2] Objection was made to testimony relating to what defendant did with the money after his arrest. The court correctly, we think, admitted the evidence, not to show embezzlement of the money subsequent to his arrest, but as "relating back and showing his intention if he did embezzle it before."

[3] We think there was sufficient evidence to justify the jury in concluding that the crime of embezzlement was committed by defendant. If he returned to Napa at all, of which we know only from what he said to the extradition officer, it is inconsistent with any theory of innocence that he should make no effort to find his benefactress while at her place of residence or to communicate with her in any way, but, on the contrary, should betake himself to another state where she would be the least likely to know anything about him. He severed all connection with her in August, 1911, and wrote her to cease writing to him, and falsely led her to expect he would meet her in Sacramento in a short time. The case exhibits a wanton violation of the trust reposed in him by this old woman, whose examination as a witness shows her to have been a person easily victimized through her own credulity.

[4] 2. The defendant requested the following instruction which was given, with modifications indicated in italics: "I instruct you, gentlemen of the jury, that if you shall find from the evidence that on or about the 19th day of June, 1911, the complaining witness, Mrs. Caroline Booker, instructed (intrusted?) the defendant William T. Blair with the sum of $3,500, lawful money of the United States of America, upon the express trust or agreement that said Blair was to use said moneys for the purpose, and none other, of purchasing a farm or ranch for said Mrs. Booker, but that no time was fixed as to when said purchase was to be made or place designated where said ranch or farm was to be purchased, it was incumbent upon defendant to perform said contract within a reasonable time after receiving said money, and you are the judges under all of the circumstances shown in this case what would have been a reasonable time within which to purchase such farm. And if you shall further find that neither Mrs. Booker, or any one in her behalf, ever demanded of defendant before the date of his arrest that he return said sum of money to her or that he forthwith purchase said ranch or farm, and that an unreasonable time had not elapsed after defendant received the money up to the time of his arrest, then I instruct you that the failure of defendant to purchase such ranch or farm, if you shall find from the evidence that defendant did fail to make such purchase, or his failure to repay or return to Mrs. Booker said money prior to the date of his arrest, is not sufficient to charge him with embezzlement, and your verdict must be not guilty." As requested, the instruction assumed that, if the money was intrusted to defendant to purchase a farm, and neither the time nor the place was fixed for the purchase, there could be no embezzlement unless before his arrest there had been a demand made upon him for the return of the money or the purchase of the farm. This assumption ignores the doctrine clearly laid down in the Hatch Case, supra, that, "The real test always is, Does the whole evidence establish the crime charged—that is, a fraudulent appropriation as charged in the indictment?" The court would have been justified in refusing the instruction.

The court correctly instructed the jury as follows: "I instruct you that one who acts as the agent of another, and in such capacity is intrusted with and received into his care any money for the use of another person and fraudulently appropriates the same to his own use or to any use or purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his trust, is guilty of embezzlement; and in this case, if you find from the evidence to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did unlawfully, fraudulently, and feloniously convert, embezzle, and appropriate the money mentioned in the information, or any part thereof, to his own use and contrary to his trust as such agent, then your verdict must be guilty." If the modified instruction had any effect, its tendency was to weaken the force of the correct instruction given by the court and to defendant's advantage. Defendant's criticism is that the instruction made the guilt or innocence of defendant to turn upon the question whether he had performed his trust within a time found by the jury to have been "reasonable" or "unreasonable," and that the question of time was a false quantity. Conceding this, still it gave defendant an added chance for escape of which he cannot complain. However, after a consideration of the entire record, including the evidence, we cannot say that the error which crept into the instruction complained of, if it be error, has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Am. to the Constitution, § 4½, art. 6.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PRESTON. (Cr. 182.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 17, 1912. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 15, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 742*)—TRIAL—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

On a trial for statutory rape, where the prosecutrix gave as an excuse for not replying to questions that she was ashamed to tell and asked several times how she should express it, it was a question for the jury whether her apparent unwillingness to testify was due to her immature age and innate modesty, or to the fact that the testimony called for was false.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1098, 1138, 1719-1721; Dec. Dig. § 742.*]

2. RAPE (§ 57*)—TRIAL—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

On a trial for statutory rape, testimony of the prosecutrix, although given reluctantly and nowhere in direct terms charging accused with having sexual relations with her, held to present a question for the jury whether she meant to, and in fact did, testify that he had such sexual relations with her.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. § 87; Dec. Dig. § 57.*]

3. RAPE (§ 52*)—EVIDENCE—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY.

On a trial for statutory rape, the act of sexual intercourse may be proved by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 71-74, 76; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

4. RAPE (§ 52*)—EVIDENCE—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY.

On a trial for statutory rape, evidence held sufficient to support a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 71-74, 76; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 472*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

On the trial of a married man 45 years old for statutory rape on a young girl, where she had testified that an unsigned note addressed to her and asking her to meet the writer in secret was handed her by accused, although such note was then admissible in evidence to show the relations between the parties, it was proper for the state to show by expert evidence that accused was the author of the note.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1059; Dec. Dig. § 472.*]

6. RAPE (§ 62*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where the evidence on a trial for statutory rape was sufficient to support a conviction, accused was not prejudiced by the failure of the state to have an examination of the vagina of prosecutrix made by a physician for the purpose of ascertaining whether she had had criminal intercourse with any one, especially where he made no motion for such an examination.

7. RAPE (§ 43*)—EVIDENCE—PHYSICAL EXAMINATION.

A court has inherent power on motion of a person accused of statutory rape to order an examination by a physician of the vagina of the prosecutrix for the purpose of ascertaining whether she has had criminal intercourse with any one.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 62, 65; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 742*)—TRIAL—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

On a trial for statutory rape, where the testimony of the prosecutrix was not inherently improbable, it was a question for the jury whether contradictions and inconsistencies therein impeached her statement as to the act of intercourse, and an appellate court could not substitute its judgment for that of the jury and trial court on this question.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1098, 1138, 1719-1721; Dec. Dig. § 742.*]

9. RAPE (§ 54*)—EVIDENCE—CORROBORATION—NECESSITY.

There is no rule requiring the prosecutrix in a prosecution for rape to be corroborated.

10. WITNESSES (§ 352*)—EVIDENCE—CHARACTER OF FEMALE.

On a trial for statutory rape, evidence that the prosecutrix during her whole life had been subjected to bad or immoral influences and surroundings, offered as tending to show that her reluctance to testify was not due to modesty, delicacy, or shame regarding the sexual relation, but to the fact that she had been coached to tell a fabricated story, was properly excluded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; Jas. F. Lodge, Judge.

Wallace A. Preston was convicted of statutory rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Mark L. Burns, of Dorris, and Taylor & Tebbe, of Yreka, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, of Sacramento, for the People.

HART, J. The defendant prosecutes this appeal from the judgment of conviction rendered against him and from the order denying him a new trial on an information charging him with the crime of statutory rape. The crime is alleged to have been perpetrated in the county of Siskiyou, in the month of November, 1910.

The principal point urged by the defendant is that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. There is, however, another point, which was particularly pressed at the oral argument and which involves an attack on the rulings of the court disallowing certain testimony proposed by the defendant. The child, Mabel McNames, upon whom the crime of which the defendant was convicted is alleged to have been committed, is the daughter of a Mrs. Stephenson by William McNames, her former husband, and was, when the alleged acts of criminal intimacy between her and the defendant took place, but a little over 12 years of age. The defendant was of about the age of 45 years at the times that his illicit relations with Mabel are claimed to have been maintained, and was a married man, having a wife and a young daughter. He was the owner of some land situated in the "Sleepy Creek" section of Siskiyou county, and not far distant from the place of one Cal. McNames, at whose home the Stephensons resided. It appears that the defendant, during the haying season of the year 1910, went to the McNames ranch for the purpose of assisting the Stephensons in harvesting and gathering their hay, with the understanding that, in consideration of and return for the services thus given, Stephenson would later assist him (Preston) in constructing a levee on or near the latter's ranch. It was only a short time after the defendant commenced working for Stephenson when, according to the story told by Mabel, he began paying inordinate attention to the child, and finally succeeded in securing sexual relations with her.

Preston, it appears, while engaged in working for the Stephensons, occupied a sleeping room in their house. The girl slept in the kitchen. During that time, so Mabel testified, he visited her room every night after the rest of the family had gone to sleep, and would get into her bed. After he ceased working for the Stephensons, he would often go to their house late at night, remove his shoes, and, leaving them outside the door, go to the room of the child and get in her bed, it appearing that the outside doors to the house were always left unlocked. On one occasion, she said, she went with him in a buggy to his house, situated a short distance from where her family resided, and there (his own family then being in Dorris) he had illicit connection with her. The fact that she went to his house on the occasion referred to was corroborated by the child's mother. Mabel declared that the defendant had had such relations with her as much as 19 different times, and perhaps more than that number of times.

Now, the only testimony in the record tending to establish the guilt of the accused, aside from a couple of circumstances, one of which, if coming about under ordinary conditions, might well be viewed as possessing no special significance of an evil nature, and to which we shall later refer, was that given by the prosecutrix herself. The theory of the defense at the trial, and which was presented in the oral argument to this court with much force and unfeigned earnestness, was that the story of the prosecutrix was purely a fabrication, and that it was inspired and concocted by the mother of the child from motives of blackmail. The defense introduced some testimony tending to sustain that theory, and upon such testimony, together with the fact that numerous inconsistent statements by the prosecutrix concerning the alleged commission of the crime were disclosed on her cross-examination, it is vigorously insisted that this court is justified in finding that the charge was not satisfactorily proved or not sufficiently shown to measure up to the required proof in criminal cases.

The entire record of the testimony taken at the trial has been certified to this court under the new method of bringing up records in criminal cases, and it comprehends six volumes, of the requisite form and size, of typewritten matter. This testimony we have carefully examined and scrutinized, and, while greatly impressed at the time with the oral argument of counsel for the defendant, and although keenly mindful of the proposition, to which counsel addressed himself with singular force, that a story such as was told by the prosecutrix in this case is one that is ordinarily too readily accepted as verity by the general public, and that the members of a jury in such a case are consequently likely to be influenced more or less by the general feeling with which the atmosphere of the community seems thus to be impregnated as to the story, and will therefore require a less degree of proof to satisfy their minds as to the truth of the story than the law prescribes, yet, after reviewing the testimony in the manner suggested, we find ourselves in a position in which we feel unable to declare that the verdict was not justified. At the same time, it must be admitted that the criticisms of the testimony of the prosecutrix are not altogether without merit.

[1] She was a reluctant witness. It was with great difficulty that she was induced to return any sort of answers to questions propounded to her by the district attorney. But, eventually, after several hours were consumed, by persistent and, indeed, rather importunate questioning by the district attorney, the court, and even one of the attorneys for the accused, in securing a statement from her of what, if anything, the defendant did to her, she replied that he did "nasty things" to her, and finally that "he put his thing into mine," and these constituted the only answers involving accusations against the defendant she made to questions in their form not directly leading or suggestive. These answers, and the reluctance with which she returned them, constitute in part the basis of the claim and the argument by the defense that her story was fabricated and that it was put into her mouth, not by any improper conduct of the defendant toward her, but by her mother with and from whom, without cause, it originated and emanated. But the child repeatedly gave as an excuse for not replying to the questions by the district attorney that she was ashamed to tell what had occurred, and several times asked how or in what form she should express it, and it was, of course, a matter for the jury to determine whether her apparent unwillingness to testify was due to the fact, if it was a fact, that the testimony thus called for was false, or to the fact of her immature age and innate modesty. The latter inference was certainly as reasonable from the manner in which she acted on the stand as any that could be deduced therefrom, and we might even say that it was the most reasonable that could thus be drawn, for the natural repugnance in a female child of her age to acknowledging, before and in the presence of a number of grown persons, criminal intimacy with a man much her senior in years is a matter of common notoriety.

[2] The further contention is advanced, however, that nowhere did the prosecutrix in direct terms testify that the defendant had sexual relations with her; that the words, "he put his thing into mine," do not necessarily mean that she intended to say that the accused inserted his private parts into her private parts, and therefore it is argued they afford no more ground for the inference that he had sexual intercourse with her than as a basis for the inference that he put something of his into another part of her body—as, for instance, into her hand. But the record shows that, after she had answered as above indicated the questions put to her, the district attorney, referring to a particular occasion on which she had testified that the accused had done "the same thing to her," asked her, "Is that the last time he had sexual intercourse with you?" to which she replied affirmatively. She had previously declared that she knew the signification of the words "sexual intercourse" as well as of the words "organ" and "private parts." No attempt was made on cross-examination to show that she did not know the true import of the words "sexual intercourse," and it must be assumed that, when she declared that she did, she knew precisely the true significance of her answer to that effect. If, therefore, there be any force in the argument that the words, "he put his thing into mine," do not necessarily mean that the prosecutrix thus intended to express the fact that the accused had sexual relations with her, her answer to the question to the prosecuting attorney whether a certain occasion was the last time the defendant had "sexual intercourse" with her was a sufficient explanation of what she meant by the use of the words, "he put his thing into mine." The jury were, in other words, justified, from her whole testimony, in inferring that she meant to testify and did in fact testify that the defendant had had sexual relations with her. Moreover, the prosecutrix further testified that, on one occasion upon which he acted "nasty" with her, certain of her clothes became stained with blood as the result of his conduct, and that she destroyed the clothes by burning them so that her mother would not detect the blood stains. This was an important circumstance which the jury were authorized to consider, and very likely did consider, in determining whether she meant to testify, when describing the defendant's act with her, viz., that "he put his thing into mine," that he had committed the act of fornication upon her.

[3] Obviously the act of sexual intercourse may be proved by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence.

But it is claimed that, assuming that her description of the defendant's conduct toward her was sufficient to indicate that he had been illicitly intimate with the girl, still her testimony stands in the record uncorroborated, and it is insisted that, considering the character of her story, the conviction should not be sustained on her uncorroborated testimony. This contention is not strictly correct, as an examination of the circumstances to which reference is above made will, we think, reveal.

[4] It was shown that the defendant, after the date when, according to the girl's testimony, he began having relations with her, purchased at Yreka and delivered to her a dress, a waist, a belt, and a pair of corsets. The girl testified that the defendant stated to her that he intended securing a divorce from his wife and then marrying the prosecutrix; that he said to her one day that he intended to buy her a dress and other articles of wearing apparel, and admonished her to tell her mother, on receiving them, that they came as a present from her own father, William McNames. The prosecutrix further testified that, the defendant having suggested that he would procure for her a ready-made dress, she measured herself by means of strings, and gave the strings, indicating the length, etc., of the dress, to the defendant prior to his departure for Yreka. On his return, she further testified, the defendant delivered to her a package containing the articles mentioned, and remarked to the child, in the presence of her mother, that he had received the package from the post office and conjectured that it was a present from her father. The prosecutrix confirmed this by declaring to her mother that her father had sent her the articles. The mother corroborated the girl's testimony on these matters. The defendant's explanation of this circumstance was that the girl's mother had requested him to purchase the articles, and that the measurements of the child, by means of strings, for the purpose of obtaining a ready-made dress, were made by the mother and the strings by her delivered to him. Mrs. Stephenson contradicted the defendant's statement in that respect. He, however, further testified, in this connection, that he first went home on returning from Yreka, and that he showed the package to his wife, and at the same time explained to her how and for whom he came to purchase the articles. But it is a fact of no little importance and significance in this connection that, although the defendant's wife was a witness in his behalf, she was asked no question and gave no testimony concerning the claim by the defendant that he called her attention to the articles or package and explained to her for whom he had purchased them. The jury had the right, of course, to believe the prosecutrix and her mother with respect to the circumstances under which the articles were purchased and delivered to the former by the defendant. And, if the jury believed that they told the truth relative to that transaction, then they were at liberty to consider it, in connection with the other testimony in the case, as a circumstance disclosing the defendant's attitude toward the prosecutrix and, perhaps, his motive in presenting her with articles which he said had cost him the sum of $10.

[5] Another circumstance of considerable significance is to be found in the note which the prosecutrix testified that the defendant secretly handed to her on a certain evening in November, 1911, in which he requested her to meet him secretly the following evening. It appears that on that occasion the defendant, one Gibson, and one Shirley paid a visit to the Stephensons. All the parties present, including Stephenson and his wife and Mabel, were sitting in the front room. Gibson was engaged in playing a violin, and the others were listening to the music and talking. The defendant and Mabel were sitting close to each other near a table standing in the center of the room. While the music and the conversations were in progress, the defendant passed the note to Mabel in such manner as not to attract the attention of other members of the company. After the visitors, including Preston, departed, Mabel went to her room and there immediately proceeded to read the note, when Cal. McNames stepped into the room, and, observing her perusing the writing, declared to her that she had received the note from Preston. This she at first strongly denied, but a few moments later admitted to McNames that Preston had placed the note in her hands that evening. It appears that McNames, from certain actions he had previously observed on the part of Preston toward the girl, had become suspicious that the pair were sustaining improper relations with each other, and the receipt of the note by the girl from Preston confirmed his suspicions. He thereupon concluded to reveal his suspicions to the mother of the girl, and a short time thereafter told the mother of his suspicions and of the receipt of the note by her daughter. Mrs. Stephenson called the daughter to her presence and accused the latter of receiving a note from Preston. The child at first strenuously denied receiving such a note, but finally admitted that, on the occasion above referred to, Preston did clandestinely hand her the note. The mother compelled the prosecutrix to produce the writing, and it was offered and received in evidence. It reads as follows: "May Dear: I wanted to get to see you. I have got something I must tell you. Can you come out beyond the water closet to-morrow night at 10 o'clock. You know how to leave the door so you can get out still. I will have the buggy down the fence. Don't fail if you can come let me know. Destroy this quick." The note was written in pencil and bore no signature, but the district attorney introduced some testimony, in the nature of expert proof, tending to show that the writing contained in the note was in the hand of the defendant. This testimony was given by two certain bankers of Siskiyou county, one of whom, upon comparing the writing in the note with a letter written by him and also with the admitted signature of the defendant subscribed to other written instruments, declared it to be his opinion that the writing in the note was that of the defendant. This testimony was offered for the purpose, of course, of supporting the statement of the prosecutrix that the defendant surreptitiously delivered the writing to her on the occasion of his visit at the home of her parents with Shirley and Gibson. Her testimony alone would have been sufficient to justify the admission of the note in evidence, she having testified that it was given to her by Preston under the circumstances indicated, but the district attorney very properly sought to prove, not only that the defendant handed the note to the girl under the circumstances as shown, but that he was the author of the writing contained in the note. This circumstance, as stated, was important because of its tendency to disclose that a secret liaison between the defendant and the girl had been maintained, and thus, in view of the great disparity between the ages of the two and the fact that the defendant was a married man, furnish the basis for a strong inference in support of the verity of the girl's story.

We have now reviewed the principal testimony presented by the people in support of the charge, and we think that it must be clearly manifest therefrom that the verdict is thus placed beyond the power of a court of review to disturb. It is true, as stated, that the brother and the great-uncle of the prosecutrix gave what appears to be very damaging testimony against the theory and claims of the prosecution. They gave testimony which, if believed, or if believable, when considering their manner of giving it, would tend very strongly to show that the charge was trumped up against the accused for purposes of blackmail. The one testified that the mother, when she first heard of the defendant's alleged treatment of her child, threatened to make him pay her a certain sum of money, and the other declared that the mother threatened the child to do her great physical violence if she failed to stick to her story of the defendant's criminal intimacy with her. It was also made to appear that the mother said that she would sit in the courtroom during the progress of the trial, and that she would, by a nod of her head, indicate to the child how she should answer questions put to her by the attorneys. All this testimony we say appears to support the theory that blackmail was at the bottom of the prosecution, or that the charge was the result of a fabrication, yet it could all be true, and the accusation that the defendant had been illicitly intimate with the girl still be well founded. In any event, however, the jury and the trial court heard all the testimony, and it must be presumed that they weighed it by means of the tests by which the weight of evidence and the credibility of witnesses may, with approximate accuracy, be determined, and it must be assumed that they, for sufficient legal reasons, after considering the testimony of those witnesses, regarded it as possessing no persuasive evidentiary force.

[6, 7] There is no force here in the argument based upon the suggestion that, if the prosecutrix had in reality subjected herself to sexual relations with the defendant, strong corroborative proof thereof could have been developed by an examination of the vagina of the girl by a physician, who could thus have determined and said whether she had ever had criminal intercourse with a male. From this proposition it is argued that, the people having failed to present to the jury the highest and most reliable proof available to them of one of the essential elements of the crime charged, it was not only the duty of the jury, but it is that of this court, to view the accusations of the girl with such a degree of suspicion and doubt as would and will result in entirely overthrowing her testimony. It would have been well, in the interest of justice, for the people to have furnished the proof referred to and thus have established to the complete satisfaction of all whether the child had been criminally known by some one, but, since the jury were satisfied by the character of the proof presented in support of the charge, we are unable to perceive where the failure of the people to offer better or more convincing proof upon any of the elements of the offense can now be of any avail to the defendant. Besides, if the defendant had genuine anxiety to bring the result of an examination of the girl by a physician to the attention of the jury, we can perceive no just reason why the court, in the exercise of its inherent power, could not, upon the motion of the accused, have ordered an examination (the party to be examined not being the defendant), and we doubt not that, upon application by the defendant, the court, in the interest of justice, and under the circumstances, would have promptly ordered an examination before or even at the time of the trial. Johnston v. S. P. Co., 150 Cal. 536, 89 Pac. 348, and cases therein cited; Clark v. Tulare Dredging Co., 14 Cal. App. 414, 438, 112 Pac. 564; Wanek v. City of Winona, 78 Minn. 98, 80 N. W. 851, 46 L. R. A. 448, 79 Am. St. Rep. 354.

[8] There is nothing inherently improbable in the testimony of the prosecutrix. It is true that she contradicted herself upon numerous matters, which may, however, when compared to the vital parts of her testimony, well be regarded as of minor importance. But, whatever the nature or character of the contradictions or inconsistencies she might have been guilty of in detailing her story, it was, after all, for the jury to decide whether such contradictions or such inconsistencies were of such significance as to have the effect of impeaching her statement as to the fact of the asserted sexual intercourse. In such a case as this, the appellate courts are not authorized to substitute their judgment for that of the jury and the trial court as to the weight and effect of the evidence. In the case of the People v. Moore, 155 Cal. 237, 100 Pac. 688, the defendant having been convicted of an assault to commit rape alleged to have taken place on the sidewalk of a public street, upon which, and near the scene of the alleged assault, a number of people were standing and to which reflected the electric lights from the hotel in front of which the assault occurred, it was vigorously contended that the detailed circumstances under which the assault was alleged to have been committed were too incredible to support the theory that the purpose of the assault was to commit rape upon the person of the female. The Supreme Court, however, while in effect conceding the circumstances to be seemingly incredible, was not sufficiently impressed with that contention to reverse the cause for that reason. The court said: "A court of review, having jurisdiction of questions of law alone, cannot disregard findings of fact supported by direct evidence strongly corroborated by disinterested and unimpeached witnesses; and neither can it be said, as a legal conclusion, that the facts so found are insufficient to warrant the inference as to the felonious intent."

[9] There is no rule requiring the prosecutrix in a prosecution for rape to be corroborated, but, as we have shown, the prosecutrix in the case at bar was to some extent corroborated by unimpeached circumstances of more or less potency in probative force, and, as in the Moore Case, neither can it be said here, as a matter of law, that, from the entire testimony, the jury were not justified in finding that the crime as charged in the information, was satisfactorily proved.

[10] The defendant complains that the court committed prejudicial error by refusing to allow testimony bearing upon the character and the moral environment of the prosecutrix during her whole life. The testimony directed to the proof of these facts was not, as obviously it could not be in the case of statutory rape, offered as a defense to the crime charged against the defendant, but upon the theory that, if it could have been shown that the prosecutrix was reared under bad or immoral influences and surroundings, such testimony would have tended to disclose that the reluctance with which she gave her testimony was not occasioned by modesty or delicacy or shame regarding the sexual relation, but by the fact that she had been coached by some one to tell a fabricated story. We think that the court's rulings upon the proffered evidence were correct. No issue of the sort to which the rejected testimony was proposed to be addressed arose in the case, so far as the evidence was concerned, except the manner itself in which the prosecutrix conducted herself as a witness. And it seems to us that, had the proof been allowed, it would not have had any stronger tendency than did the girl's manner of testifying to a discovery of the specific motive or reason actuating her to hesitate in describing the revolting details of the alleged conduct of the defendant with her, for it would still remain a question, and one which the jury would be required to decide, whether the cause of the witness' manner of testifying arose out of shame or modesty, or from the falsity of her story, or from a desire to shield the defendant as far as she could under the circumstances, or from any other reason or motive. Nor do we think that it can be justly laid down as an abstract truth that, because a female may have a bad character, she is necessarily to be expected to act or speak immodestly on all occasions. Indeed, it is not uncommon to find females notoriously devoid of strictness in matters of morality, who are on most occasions quite circumspect in expressing themselves and who would, equally with persons of the most exemplary moral conceptions and character, with reluctance narrate in a public courtroom the details of immoral relations they may have sustained with the opposite sex.

[11] But, without speculating further as to the effect of such testimony, it may be observed that the manner in which a witness testifies is generally a matter for argument to be addressed to those who must decide the facts. Each side is at liberty to present to the court and jury its own interpretation of the way in which the witness has told his story, and at last it is for the jury to draw their own conclusions as to the significance, in the one direction or the other, of the witness' manner or the influence it should be allowed to exercise in confirming the truth or falsity of his testimony.

We have discovered no just legal reason for remanding the cause and the judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*) — APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for obtaining money for mining stock by false pretenses in representing that accused was the agent of the mining company in selling the stock, a witness testified that accused, when trying to sell the stock, said that he owned a large quantity of land in Mexico and paid taxes of $5,000 a year, and had to raise the money to pay the taxes by selling the stock, but the statement as to the ownership of land and payment of taxes was not shown to be false. Held, that admission of the evidence as to such statement was not harmful to accused, especially where the court instructed that the only representation claimed to be false was that accused was the corporation's agent in selling the stock.

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*) — APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for obtaining money for mining stock by false pretenses in representing that accused was the agent of the mining corporation for selling the stock, the admission of evidence that accused, about two weeks after the transaction, said that he had secured an option on 5,000 shares of the stock, and offered witness 200 shares for $100, was not harmful to accused, even though the evidence were irrelevant.

In a prosecution for obtaining money by false representations, the witness who swore to the complaint testified on cross-examination that the money paid for the stock purchased by him and another from accused was not witness' money, whereupon accused put in evidence the complaint in the justice's court, which alleged that the money was the personal property of such witness and the other. Held that, to explain his evidence, such witness could testify that, although the other purchaser paid accused the money for the stock by his personal check, both he and witness, by previous agreement, paid an equal amount for the stock, and were in fact its joint owners.

18. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 656*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for obtaining money for mining stock by false representations that accused was the corporation's agent for selling the stock, the court remarked that the only issue was whether accused was such agent at the time of the sale, but afterward instructed that, to establish guilt, the state must prove that accused stated that he was the mining company's authorized agent, that the statement was false and that he knew it was false at the time, and that the purchaser believed it to be true and was induced thereby to buy the stock, and the court allowed full inquiry as to all elements of the offense. Held, that the court's remark as to the question of authority, being the only issue, could not have misled or confused the jury as to the issues in the case.

19. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 673*) — APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR—FAILURE TO INSTRUCT.

In a prosecution for obtaining money for mining stock by false representations that accused was authorized to sell it, in which evidence was admitted as to other sales by accused without authority upon similar representations, the court's failure to instruct that the evidence as to such other transactions could only be considered on the question of intent in committing the act charged was not prejudicial to accused, in view of the fact that the rulings upon the admission of the evidence stated that it was limited to such purpose, and must be so considered by the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Norton, Judge.

E. C. Brecker was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and he appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

Max Grimm, of Stockton, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, of Sacramento, for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of obtaining from one Bert Romeroni and one James Vernon, on or about the 2d day of January, 1911, the sum of $150 by false and fraudulent pretenses. He appeals both from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

The attack upon the judgment and the order is based upon the asserted insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict of conviction, and certain rulings of the court admitting and rejecting certain evidence. The Attorney General has submitted a motion to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the appellant failed to file, within five days after taking the appeal from the judgment and the order, with the clerk of the court in which the action was tried and present to said court, "an application stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal, and the points upon which the appellant relies, and designate what portion of the phonographic reporter's notes it will be necessary to have transcribed to fairly present the points relied upon." Section 1247, Pen. Code.

The resistance to the foregoing motion is based upon an affidavit of the trial judge, filed in this court, setting forth that all the requisites of section 1247 in the respect referred to by the motion were duly complied with. But it will not be necessary to consider the motion, or, in this opinion, the questions arising therefrom, viz., whether the law requires the record on appeal to show that the provisions of section 1247 of the Penal Code in the particulars to which the motion relates have been complied with, and, if so, whether, in the absence of such a showing, the affidavit of the trial judge affirming a compliance therewith constitutes competent authentication of the fact; for there is before us no properly authenticated transcription of the record in this cause, and therefore nothing that we are authorized to review advantageously to the appellant.

[1] This point is not included among the grounds upon which the motion to dismiss the appeal is based, but the Attorney General has called our attention to it in his brief, and, even if he had failed to do so, about the first duty of a court of appeal in any case is to ascertain whether a record which may be legally reviewed is before it, and, if it finds that there is not, there is no other alternative left to it but to dismiss the appeal, or affirm the judgment.

[2] Section 1247 of the Penal Code, among other things, provides that the original and each copy of the transcription of the stenographic reporter's notes ordered by the court to be made shall by the reporter be duly certified under oath to be correct. Section 1247a of said Code provides, inter alia, that the judge shall, unless objection is made to the transcript by either the defendant or the district attorney, within 10 days after receipt thereof by him, certify on the transcript that no objection has been made thereto within the time allowed by law, and after so certifying shall immediately redeliver the same to the clerk; or, if objection to the transcript be made, the judge must immediately hear and determine the objection, and, if the objection is found to be good, must correct the same, whereupon he must certify that all objections to the transcript have been heard and determined, and the same corrected in accordance with such determination, and thereupon immediately redeliver the same to the clerk. The reporter has not in this case certified under oath to the correctness of the transcription of the portion of his notes which the court ordered written up, but has merely annexed to the transcript a naked statement, in the form of a certificate, that said transcript is correct. Nor is the form of the judge's certificate strictly in harmony with the requirements of section 1247a, it containing no statement either that no objections were made to the transcript, or, if any were made, the same were heard and determined and the transcript accordingly corrected. But, waiving any question as to the sufficiency of the judge's certificate, it is obvious that the reporter's certificate is altogether insufficient, and does not involve that authentication of the transcript of the proceedings which the statute imperatively requires. Under the present method of taking appeals in criminal cases, the judge's certificate, even if such an one as the judge's certificate here may be said to be in substantial compliance with the statute, must be held to be a mere nullity, so far as any effect it may have as an authentication of the record on appeal, where, as is true here, the phonographic reporter's certificate is wanting in one of the most vital of the requisites of a proper or legal authentication.

[3] The Supreme Court of this state has uniformly held that the proceedings in a trial court cannot be reviewed on appeal unless such proceedings have been authenticated in the mode pointed out by law or the rules of the courts of appeal. People v. Martin, 32 Cal. 91; People v. Ferguson, 34 Cal. 309; People v. Armstrong, 44 Cal. 326; People v. Long, 121 Cal. 495, 53 Pac. 1097; People v. Terrill, 131 Cal. 112, 63 Pac. 141; People v. Schultz, 14 Cal. App. 106, 109, 111 Pac. 271.

In the Schultz Case, although the question did not directly arise, the Court of Appeal of the First District, referring to the failure of the stenographer to certify under oath to the correctness of his transcript, says: "Even if appellant was entitled to adopt the method prescribed by sections 1247 and 1247a, Penal Code, for bringing to this court the evidence in the case, which we do not believe, he has not complied with the provisions of said sections." The intimation from the foregoing is that, in order to render the record made up according to the method prescribed by sections 1247 and 1247a of the Penal Code reviewable on appeal, there must be among other requisites, a certificate under oath by the phonographic reporter that the transcription of the portion of his notes ordered transcribed by the court is correct.

But there can be no doubt that the provision of section 1247 relating to the manner in which the reporter shall authenticate the transcription of his notes is mandatory and that anything short of the authentication so prescribed amounts to a failure to comply with an imperative demand of the statute. If the authentication may be held sufficient without the oath of the reporter, then with equal reason may it be held that the mere subscription of the reporter's name to the transcript without a certificate of any kind would be sufficient to satisfy the statute.

[4] The authentication of the record on appeal of the proceedings of the trial court constitutes the evidence from which the reviewing court may determine whether the proceedings were had in the court below, and the Legislature may contrive and provide any reasonable method of furnishing such evidence; and, when once the Legislature prescribes a method for proving that the proceedings which are taken to a court of appeal for review have been had in the trial court, then any substantial departure from that method will render the appeal abortive.

However much it may always be desirable to dispose of cases brought to the appellate courts upon their merits, we are not at liberty to ignore or disregard the plain mandates of the statute as to the method of proving to such courts that the record on appeal contains a correct reproduction of the proceedings which it is desired shall be reviewed.

The judgment and order must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

On Rehearing.

HART, J. The judgment and the order from which these appeals were taken in this cause were affirmed in an opinion filed in this court on September 17, 1912. The ground upon which the affirmance was based was that there was not a legally authenticated record of the evidence brought up to this court. Section 1247, Pen. Code.

The defendant in due time petitioned for a rehearing, and, with the petition, submitted an amended certificate by the stenographic reporter who took the phonographic report of the testimony and other proceedings of the trial, and asked that the case be reopened, and that such amended certificate be substituted for the defective one attached to the transcript of the testimony. Said certificate, as so amended, being legally sufficient in all respects and the Attorney General being of the opinion that there is no legal objection to the allowance of the same, whereby the stenographic transcription will stand as having been properly authenticated, and as a review of an appeal upon the merits is always to be preferred, the rehearing asked for was in due time granted and the motion for the substitution of the amended certificate by the stenographer allowed. Therefore, without expressing any opinion as to the legal propriety in a court of appeal to allow a defective and insufficient authentication of a record on appeal to be corrected, we shall treat the record here as having been authenticated in conformity with the requirements of law and review the case upon the merits.

We are not to be understood, however, as receding from the position maintained in the former opinion filed herein as to the requisites of a proper authentication of the testimony received and other proceedings had at the trial of a criminal case or as to the defectiveness or insufficiency of the authentication of this record as it was originally brought to this court.

The information in this case charges the defendant with the crime of obtaining on or about the 2d day of January, 1911, by false and fraudulent pretenses the sum of $150, from the prosecuting witnesses, Bert Romeroni and James Vernon. He was convicted by the jury, hence these appeals.

The general objections urged against the correctness of the judgment and the order are insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, alleged errors in the rulings of the court upon the evidence, and alleged misdirection of the jury by the court in its charge upon the law of the case.

1. As to the point that the verdict was not justified by the evidence, counsel for the defendant emphasizes in his brief the fact that the judge presiding at the trial, according to counsel, remarked, upon denying the defendant's motion for a new trial: "I have my doubts upon the sufficiency of the evidence, that the verdict should stand, but I will let the higher court pass upon the question"—and insists that the observation thus made by the court was equivalent to the expression of an opinion that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict and that in such case it was the court's duty to order a new trial (People v. Flood, 102 Cal. 330, 36 Pac. 663; People v. Knutte, 111 Cal. 453, 44 Pac. 166), and, that the court below having failed to do so after expressing such doubt, it is the duty of this court under such circumstances to reverse the order.

[5] It is true that, where a trial court is of the opinion that a party prosecuted for a crime has been convicted upon insufficient evidence, it is its duty to set the verdict aside by granting a new trial. As has often been said in the cases, the determination of the facts is a matter which is exclusively the attribute of the jury and the latter's functions should not be invaded or interfered with by the court; but in all trials at nisi prius the court, in the last analysis, exercises (and very properly so) a supervisory control over the action of the jury, and, where it is clear that the jury had failed to intelligently and justly perform the duty cast upon them by the law, it is, of course, the duty of the court, in the exercise of such supervisory power, to vacate or set aside the verdict. But this does not mean that in every case of doubt entertained by the court of the justness of a verdict of guilty the result of the jury's deliberations should be vitiated by the action of the court in the exercise of its power to grant new trials. The exercise of that power should always be within the bounds of sound judgment and discretion, and not arbitrary. A jury may have some doubt upon the question of the guilt of an accused person; still even they would have no right to acquit, unless such doubt was a reasonable one. And a judge may, and in many cases doubtless does, have some doubt as to whether a verdict of guilty should have been returned, and yet such doubt might not be sufficient to generate an unequivocal opinion that the verdict was not justified, and, when the court is not of an opinion of that character as to a verdict of guilty, it has no right to grant a new trial or to permit a doubt not sufficient to create such an opinion to override the functions which are, under our law, peculiarly those of the jury.

In the present case we have a right to presume, from the fact that the motion for a new trial was denied, that the doubt of the court as to the justification of the verdict did not reach the dignity of such an opinion of the jury's conclusion as to warrant it in setting aside the verdict. We must assume, in other words, that, had it entertained such opinion, it would have promptly done its duty by granting a new trial.

[6] Now, then, if the trial court, in whose presence the witnesses testified, could not say upon a review of the evidence that the verdict was not justified, much less is this court in a position to do so, and therefore, in the determination of the question whether the evidence supports the verdict, this court is no less to be governed by the rule that questions of fact cannot be reviewed by an appellate court unless they present questions of law than it would be had the court below expressed no doubt upon the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant and support the verdict. And, thus viewing the evidence, we are not prepared to say that it does not sustain the findings of the jury.

2. It appears from the evidence that the defendant was connected in some way with a mining corporation, named and known as Dredger Mining Company, which had been organized for the purpose of mining, by the dredging process, the American river bottom, near Folsom, in Sacramento county. It further appears that the defendant was introduced to Vernon by Romeroni at the Occidental Hotel, in the city of Stockton, somewhere in the neighborhood of the 15th day of December, 1910. Representing that he was the agent of the company mentioned, authorized as such to sell stock in the concern, Brecker, at that time and place, undertook to sell stock in said company to Vernon. After considerable talk, mostly by Brecker, who gave an elaborate description of the plans, properties, and prospects of the corporation, saying that the latter needed money with which to prosecute its business, hence the necessity for the sale of stock, and telling Vernon that, after purchasing the stock, he could visit and inspect the properties of the company, and that, if then he became dissatisfied with his bargain, he (Brecker) would return him (Vernon) the money paid for the stock, Vernon refused to invest in the concern, and at that time did not do so. Either on the 1st or 2d of January, 1911, however, Brecker, accompanied by Romeroni, went to Holt's station, in San Joaquin county, where Vernon was employed. Brecker renewed negotiations with Vernon for the sale to the latter of some stock in said corporation. Vernon testified that, after the defendant had gone "over about the same conversation we had in the hotel office" (referring to the first conversation spoken of), he (Vernon) bought 100 shares of stock at $1.50 per share, and gave his personal check to Brecker for the sum of $150. Brecker thereupon assured Vernon that he would either deliver to him his certificate of shares when he (Vernon) went to Sacramento on his way to visit the mine, or, in case that he did not go to Sacramento, would mail the certificate to his (Vernon's) address in Stockton or at Holt's station. Vernon told Brecker that he could not go to the mine, and he did not go there. On the 15th day of January, 1911, Vernon again met Brecker, and the latter then said that he had secured an option on 5,000 shares of stock in the same corporation, and tried to induce Vernon to purchase some of said stock, but the latter refused to make any further investment therein. Vernon never met Brecker after the 15th day of January, 1911, and never received the certificate for the shares of stock for which he paid $150. Vernon declared that he believed the statement of the defendant that he was the agent of and as such authorized to sell stock in and for the Dredger Mining Company, and that, upon that representation and the belief that the investment would result profitably to him, he purchased the stock.

The witness Romeroni corroborated Vernon in some particulars as to the first conversation which occurred between the latter and the defendant at the Occidental Hotel. Among other things, he said he heard Brecker say to Vernon that he (Brecker) was the "authorized agent" of the Dredger Mining Company. This witness also corroborated Vernon as to the conversation and transaction in which the latter purchased the stock on the first or second of January, 1911. He further testified that at about that same time in January the defendant in his presence sought to sell stock to other persons in San Joaquin county, and that in each of those instances he announced that he was the "authorized agent" of the corporation.

C. M. Beckwith, who was at the time of the trial, in the latter part of April, 1912, and had been for about two years prior thereto, secretary of the corporation, testified that the defendant was neither an agent of nor authorized to sell the stock of the corporation during the month of January, 1911. In other words, he said that the accused was, in no capacity, connected with the corporation at that time.

The deputy sheriff who arrested the defendant upon the charge alleged in the information testified that the defendant admitted to him that he was not an agent of the company at the time of the transaction involved here.

The defendant's story was, in substance, that he was authorized to sell stock for the corporation, and that at the same time he had individual stock belonging to certain stockholders for sale. He was not, however, very clear as to whether the stock he claimed to have sold to Vernon and Romeroni was the company's stock or the individual stock referred to.

[7] We think, as before declared, that the record discloses a sufficient case against the accused to foreclose just interference with the verdict by this court. It may be conceded that the evidence as to the precise statements or representations made by Brecker at the time that he succeeded in consummating the alleged sale of stock to Vernon is not as satisfactory as it is evident that it could have been made. Neither Vernon nor Romeroni directly testified as to the exact representations that the defendant made on that occasion. Romeroni did say, however, that at about that time he heard the defendant declare to others to whom he undertook to sell stock in the corporation that he was its "authorized agent," and Vernon testified that the defendant repeated "about the same conversation" that occurred between them at the Occidental Hotel in the middle of December, 1910. In that conversation, it will be recalled, Brecker, according to both Vernon and Romeroni, represented that he was the agent of the corporation, with authority to sell its stock. It would, of course, have been the proper course to have required the witnesses to repeat exactly or as accurately as they could the statements made by the defendant when he made the purported sale to Vernon and Romeroni (and, it may be suggested, the duty to do so rested as much upon the attorney for the defendant as upon the district attorney); still the jury were authorized to infer from Vernon's testimony that the defendant on the occasion on which he sold the stock to Vernon and Romeroni repeated the representations as to his authority to sell stock for the corporation that he had made to Vernon in the preceding month of December.

Counsel contends, however, that the testimony conclusively shows that the defendant was a promoter of the corporation from the time of its organization and as such authorized to sell its stock, and that there is no evidence showing that he had ever been dismissed from that relation with the concern, or that he had ever ceased representing it in that capacity. Upon this contention counsel undertakes to establish the continuation and existence of the authority in the defendant to sell the company stock at the time of the Vernon transaction by invoking the application of the presumption that "a thing once proved to exist continues as long as is usual in things of that nature." Section 1963, subd. 33, Code Civ. Proc. But, conceding it to be true that the defendant was, in point of fact, authorized to sell stock for the corporation up to January, 1911, the testimony of the secretary of the corporation that he was in no way connected with the concern in the month of January, 1911, when he had the transaction involved here with Vernon and Romeroni, precludes any ground for the operation of the presumption referred to, for the presumption thus sought to be invoked is merely a disputable one which must give way to the force of any credible testimony introduced to overcome it.

[8] And from that testimony of the secretary the jury were perfectly justified in inferring that if, at some previous time the defendant was authorized to sell stock for the company, his authority in that regard had been revoked, and did not exist when he obtained $150 from Vernon and Romeroni in consideration of stock in the corporation.

As to the defendant's story, it is to be remarked that it is not difficult to understand how the jury could have justly disbelieved it in view of the fact that the district attorney showed that, at the preliminary examination of the charge set forth in the information, the accused, testifying for himself, declared that he was not, nor did he pretend to be, the agent of the corporation when he had the transaction with Vernon.

[9] But there is no need of further examination of the testimony in this opinion. It is enough to finally say, as we have in effect before declared, that we are satisfied that no doubt can reasonably arise from the record as it is presented here that the evidence, whether, in point of fact, it was or was not of sufficient probative force to justify the jury in returning a verdict of guilty, nevertheless, as a matter of law, supports it, and this conclusion is as far as an appellate court is required to go in passing upon the question whether it is or is not authorized to set aside a verdict upon the evidence.

[10] 3. The objection to the ruling allowing the witness Vernon to state all that was said by Brecker in their conversations about the stock and the purchase thereof is not substantial. The particular criticism of said ruling is based upon the statement by the witness that the defendant, when trying to sell the stock to Vernon, said that he owned a large quantity of land in Mexico, that his taxes amounted to $5,000 a year, and that he had to raise money to pay the same; that he expected within 30 days to get money from his land, and then he hoped to buy up all the stock in the corporation which he had sold or might sell around Stockton. This statement was very likely made by the defendant to Vernon to inspire in the latter confidence, not only in the investment, but in the integrity and good faith of the defendant himself, and, if that was the defendant's purpose in making it, and it had been shown to be false, it would have been proper, not as proof of the alleged false representation upon which the defendant induced Vernon and Romeroni to buy the stock, but as constituting a part of the scheme by which the defendant sought to imbue the prosecuting witnesses with the belief that his representations were true. In this view, it would have been considered as part of the transaction. But the statement was not shown to have been false and the effect of allowing it to go before the jury as verity, so far as a direct contradiction of it was concerned, could certainly have done the defendant no damage. Moreover, the court pointedly instructed the jury that the only representation alleged in the information to be false and to the consideration of which, in deciding the question of the guilt or innocence of the accused, they were to confine their deliberations, was that he was the agent of the corporation and as such authorized to sell its stock.

[11] 4. Vernon was permitted, over the objection of the defendant, to relate a conversation which occurred between him and the defendant on the 15th day of January, or about two weeks after the happening of the transaction upon which this charge is founded. It is claimed that the court prejudiced the rights of the defendant by that ruling. The witness testified that the defendant, at the time mentioned, said to him that he had secured an option on 5,000 shares of the company's stock and that he offered him (witness) 200 shares thereof for $100. Brecker's statement that he had so secured that number of shares in the stock of the corporation was not shown to be untrue, and, conceding that the testimony relative thereto was not relevant, which we do not decide, we fail to see wherein it could have resulted in possible harm to the defendant.

[12] 5. The witness, Romeroni, who swore to the complaint filed in the justice's court against the defendant, charging him with the crime stated in the information, testified, on cross-examination, that the money—$150—paid for the stock purchased by him and Vernon was not his (the witness') money. Counsel for the defendant thereupon offered and the court received in evidence the complaint filed in the justice's court, which, among other things, alleged that said money was the personal property "of the said Bert Romeroni and the said James Vernon." Thereafter the court allowed the witness to explain that, although Vernon paid Brecker the $150 through his personal check, Romeroni and Vernon, by previous agreement, each paid an equal amount for and thus became joint owners of the stock so purchased. This testimony is complained of here as irrelevant and prejudicial. The ruling was eminently proper. A witness will always be permitted to explain his testimony, where it is necessary to do so, for the purpose of relieving it, if thus it can be done, of any apparent inconsistency by which it may be characterized.

[13] 6. A letter, written at Sacramento by the defendant, dated January 20, 1912, and addressed to the manager of the hotel at which the former stopped while in the city of Stockton, and in which the defendant stated that he was sick and requested the manager to "pack my stuff until I come down, as I do not like to pay $2.00 a day for a room," etc., was received in evidence upon the theory that it tended to confirm the hypothesis of flight upon the part of the accused, it having been further shown by the assistant manager of said hotel that the defendant never called for his baggage. The defendant's home was in Sacramento, and we can perceive little if any force in the letter as proof of flight.

[14] Flight by one who has committed an act which to all appearances is felonious may be shown upon the theory that it is evidence of a consciousness or a sort of admission by conduct of guilt, and it implies that the party is thus trying to escape detection or apprehension or both. The mere going away from the scene of a crime is not always flight in the sense that evidence is thus furnished of a consciousness on the part of the party that he has committed a public wrong. That element in the proof of guilt should, therefore, never be gone into unless the testimony available for that purpose is clear and convincing that the accused party left the scene of the act which is charged against him as a crime because he realized that he had committed a crime, lest by such insinuation, based upon circumstances not worthy of consideration, irreparable harm to the right of the accused to a fair trial may be committed. But the letter objected to here would seem rather to show that the defendant made no attempt to flee than that it was his purpose in leaving Stockton to get away from probable arrest and prosecution, otherwise he would not have boldly made his whereabouts known to be at a place only a short distance from the scene of the transaction which has brought about his conviction of a felony. And it is this view of the contents of the letter—a view which the jury probably took of it—that rendered its admission in evidence in no degree subversive of the defendant's just rights. Neither is there any merit in the contention that the letter was prejudicial in that it might have been construed by the jury as containing an insinuation that the defendant left without paying for his room. The letter itself merely stated in effect that the defendant desired to give up the room because, by reason of illness, he could not go to Stockton and occupy it, and that he did not wish to be under the expense of maintaining the room when he could not utilize it.

[15] 7. It was not error to allow the witness, Beckwith, to say that the defendant was not in the month of January, 1911, authorized to sell stock for the company. The criticism directed against the legal propriety of this testimony is more in the form of an argument than an objection, for it goes to its weight rather than to its competency, the ground of criticism being that, because Beckwith had previously declared that he could not answer a similar question and made certain statements indicating that he could not know whether the defendant was authorized during the month mentioned to sell stock for the corporation, the testimony was objectionable and should not have been allowed.

8. The deputy sheriff, who arrested the defendant, testifying for the people, said that, after he had taken the accused into custody, the latter stated to him that he (defendant) was not an agent of the company, but merely had an option on stock. This testimony is now denounced as improper because, purporting to disclose a confession of the defendant, it was not admissible until there was first some proof tending to establish the corpus delicti. Conceding that the statement of the defendant as shown by the testimony of the deputy sheriff constituted a confession, the objection here urged against it is not good, for it was not given in evidence until after the representations upon which the defendant disposed of the stock to Vernon were shown and the testimony of Beckwith that the defendant had no connection with the company and was not authorized to sell its stock when said sale was made was given.

[16] Besides, the defendant did not make the objection at the trial that he now makes to the officer's testimony—indeed, he in reality made no objection to it at all, his only objections having been addressed to the forms of the preliminary questions which were designed to lay the foundation for the testimony of the extrajudicial statement of the defendant.

[17] 9. A number of witness to whom the defendant had previously sold stock in the same corporation upon the representation that he was the agent of and authorized to sell stock for said company and to whom he failed to deliver certificates therefor, although they paid for the stock, were allowed to testify to those transactions against the defendant's objections that such testimony was of other offenses than the one charged. We think the testimony was clearly proper under the doctrine laid down in many of our cases, of which the case of the People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 472, 98 Pac. 194, is now the leading one, and which clearly explains the circumstances under which testimony of other crimes than the one charged may be received upon the question of the intent with which the act involved in the crime set forth in the information under inquiry was committed.

[18] 10. The objection that the court in its rulings limited the scope of the investigation to the question whether the defendant was or was not the agent of the corporation when he sold the stock to Vernon is untenable. The court in ruling on one question did remark that the only issue in the case was whether the defendant was such agent at the time referred to, but, notwithstanding that remark, the court nevertheless allowed full inquiry into all the elements constituting the offense. The jury could not, therefore, have been misled or confused by the remark of the court, as counsel contends, and this proposition must become the more manifest when it is considered that the court in very clear language instructed the jury that these facts must be proved in order to establish the guilt of the accused: (1) That the defendant made the statement alleged to have been false, to wit, that he was the duly authorized agent of the Dredger Mining Company; (2) that such statement was false; (3) that defendant knew or believed such statement was false when he made it; (4) that the complaining witnesses believed such statement to be true, were deceived by it, and that such statement was the principal cause which induced them to part with their money.

11. And this leads us to observe that the criticism of the instructions given by the court upon the foregoing propositions involving the elements of which the crime charged is constituted is altogether unfounded.

The charge of the court upon all the features of the case as presented by the information and the evidence was exhaustive, expressed in perspicuous language, and fair. It is not necessary to examine said instructions in detail in this opinion. It is deemed enough to say that no one can read them without concluding that they clearly and accurately state the law applicable to the crime as charged.

[19] But it is urged that the court in the matter of its charge was guilty of an omission which seriously militated against the rights of the accused by failing to instruct the jury that the testimony received of other similar transactions to the one involved here could be considered by them only for the purpose of gathering light upon the intent with which the act charged was committed. While it is true that the court did not instruct upon the proposition referred to, it did in ruling upon the admissibility of such testimony frequently declare that it was limited to that purpose and that it must be so regarded and considered by the jury. While it would have been better for the court to have thus specially instructed the jury, it cannot be held that failure to do so under the circumstances resulted in injury to the defendant.

We have now specially considered the more important points urged for a reversal, and, as must be apparent, have been able to discover no sound legal reason for disturbing the result.

The judgment and order are, therefore, affirmed.

California. Sept. 20, 1912.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 981*)—JUDGMENT AND SENTENCE—INSANITY—STATUTES.

Pen. Code, § 1368, provides that, if a doubt arises as to accused's sanity, the court must submit that question to a jury. After conviction and denial of a new trial, defendant presented affidavits, and requested that the question of his sanity be inquired into, and the trial judge, though stating that he had no doubt as to defendant's sanity, allowed an examination by a commission of physicians, who reported defendant sane. Held that, as the trial court entertained no doubt at any time as to defendant's sanity, there was no occasion for an inquiry on that question, so that objections to the report of proceedings had would be wholly disregarded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2497, 2498; Dec. Dig. § 981.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

P. R. Stock was convicted of the statutory felony of having uttered and passed a certain check drawn upon a bank without having a credit or deposit at such bank. From the conviction and from denial of his motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment, he appeals. Affirmed.

Dick Foye Harding and J. Howard Bell, both of Santa Ana, and W. E. Ferguson, of Exeter, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant was convicted of having uttered and passed in the county of Orange a certain check drawn upon a bank of Los Angeles without having a credit or deposit at such banking institution, which act is made a felony by the provisions of section 476a, Penal Code. The charge contained in the information was fully supported by the uncontradicted testimony of witnesses introduced by the prosecution; the defendant offering no evidence on his own behalf. The judgment directed that he be imprisoned in the state prison for a period of 10 years. A motion for a new trial was presented and denied, as was also a motion in arrest of judgment. After all of these proceedings were had, defendant's counsel announced in open court that he took exception to the judgment, and then said: "The defendant will give notice of appeal." This statement of counsel was made immediately after the court had pronounced judgment, and seems to have been intended as a notice of appeal from that judgment; no reference being made to the motion for a new trial which had been previously denied. However, without approving the practice in that regard, we will assume, as no question is urged as to its sufficiency, that the notice should be treated as one which would save to the defendant the right to have the ruling on motion for new trial reviewed, as well as the judgment. The defendant filed no brief in support of his appeal, and his counsel at the time set for oral argument was content to submit the case with a few remarks only which referred altogether to the question of the sanity of the defendant. After the motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment had been denied, counsel for defendant presented certain affidavits and requested that the sanity of the defendant be inquired into, and that time for pronouncing judgment be continued in order that this might be done. The trial judge announced that in his opinion there was no doubt as to the sanity of the defendant, but that he would accede to the request of counsel for defendant and allow an examination to be made by a commission of physicians, which examination was immediately thereafter had. The physicians called to make this inquiry reported that they found the defendant to be sane, and the court thereupon proceeded to pronounce sentence. As we have indicated, this examination was made at the request and with the full approval of defendant.

It was not an examination had in accordance with the provisions of section 1363 of the Penal Code, which section provides that if, during the pendency of an action, up to and including the time when the defendant is brought up for judgment, a doubt arises as to his sanity, "the court must order the question as to his sanity to be submitted to a jury." After the examination was had and the commission made its report as to the sanity of defendant, defendant's counsel took exception to the report on the ground that the proceeding taken did not conform to the requirement of section 1368, and objected to the report upon that ground.

In our view of the matter, taking into consideration the announcement made by the court, both before and after the appointment of the commission which examined into the question of defendant's sanity, that he, the trial judge, had no doubt at all as to the sanity of the defendant, the proceedings had upon the inquiry made before the physicians may be disregarded wholly. In the mind of the court no doubt was entertained at any time throughout the trial or thereafter as to defendant's sanity, and therefore there was no occasion for the ordering of a jury to pass upon that question. See People v. Pico, 62 Cal. 50. This decision is closely in point, because the proceedings had in that case were similar to those taken here and the ruling of the Supreme Court fully sustains the view we have taken of the matter. A careful examination of the entire record discloses to our minds no error prejudicial to any of the rights of the defendant.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

YOUMANS v. H. S. CLARKE CO.
(Civ. 1,148.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Sept. 23, 1912.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 524*)—QUESTIONS FOR REVIEW—RECORD—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE.

In an action on an account stated, plaintiff relied upon a document, signed by defendant, and claimed to be an account stated, but such document was not incorporated in the record nor shown to be authenticated in any way, and was referred to only by the statement of a witness that defendant had signed the paper shown him. It was printed in the transcript after the clerk's certificate as an exhibit, but there was nothing to identify it as the one introduced at the trial, or to show that it was used on the motion for a new trial. Held, that it constituted no part of the record proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Action by Edward T. Youmans against H. S. Clarke Company. From a judgment for defendant and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

I. Henry Harris, of Los Angeles (Charles A. Bank, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. C. L. Shinn, of Sacramento, and E. L. Kenney, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The complaint alleges that defendant was indebted to the Hudson Hair Dryer Company upon an account stated in the sum of $700 for goods and merchandise sold and delivered to defendant at defendant's special instance and request; that the Hudson Hair Dryer Company assigned the account to one M. T. Emanuel, who, in turn, assigned the same to plaintiff. Other than admitting $280.05 of the alleged indebtedness, the answer denied all the material allegations of the complaint.

The court found that no account was ever stated between defendant and the Hudson Hair Dryer Company; that said Hudson Hair Dryer Company sold to defendant goods and merchandise of the value and for which defendant agreed to pay $280.05, which account plaintiff had acquired by assignment, and gave judgment accordingly. From this judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, made upon a statement of the case, plaintiff appeals, claiming judgment should have been rendered for the full sum of $700.

Upon the record presented the appeal is without merit. The findings clearly support the judgment, and the statement contains uncontradicted evidence to prove that at the time of making said assignment defendant's indebtedness to the Hudson Hair Dryer Company did not exceed $280.05, as found by the court. For the purpose of showing that such finding, and the finding that no account was ever stated between the parties, are without support, appellant relies upon a purported document, signed by defendant, which he claims constitutes an account stated, whereby defendant admitted an indebtedness in the sum of $700. This document, however, was not incorporated in the record, nor does it purport to be authenticated in any manner whatsoever, and hence it cannot be deemed a part of the record or entitled to be considered for any purpose on the appeal. The only reference to the document is in the statement of the testimony of M. T. Emanuel, who testified: "On the 29th day of November, 1910, Mr. H. S. Clarke (president of defendant) and I discussed these transactions, and at the end of that conversation he signed the paper you have just handed me. (Paper introduced in evidence and marked 'Plaintiff's Exhibit A.')" At the end of the transcript, following the clerk's certificate, is printed a document marked, "Plaintiff's Exhibit A," but there is nothing to identify such paper as being the one signed by defendant and introduced in evidence at the trial, or to show that it or any document was used upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial. As disclosed by the record, the purported document is a mere loose sheet of unidentified paper, there being nothing in the body of the statement to show that it constituted a part of the record used upon the hearing, as was made to appear in the case of Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 633, 22 Pac. 26, 131. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider other points discussed by the parties.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by H. H. Henley against the Pacific Fruit Cooling & Vaporizing Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. Rollin Fitch, of Oakland, for appellants. Meredith & Landis, of Sacramento, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This in an action to recover judgment against the company above named for services rendered by plaintiff as "refrigerating and constructing engineer" in the erection of a precooling and refrigerating plant on certain described premises, situated in the town of Newcastle, Placer county, of which plant defendants are alleged to be the owners; also, that plaintiff he declared to have a lien thereon and for the enforcement thereof. The court found that plaintiff was entitled to judgment against defendant company for the sum of $528.50 and costs, of which the sum of $495 was found to be a lien upon the buildings and plant of defendants, described in the complaint. Judgment passed accordingly, from which and from the order denying their motion for a new trial defendants appeal.

[1] Quoting some advice given by the Supreme Court to trial courts, found in Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 102, 78 Pac. 337, as to the duty of the trial court to grant a new trial where the decision is against the weight of the evidence, it is urged that "the decision in this case is clearly against the weight of evidence and against the law." It was said in the case cited: "The trial court cannot rest upon a conflict in the evidence, but must weigh and consider the evidence for both parties, and determine for itself the just conclusion to be drawn from it." We must assume that this is precisely what the learned trial judge did in arriving at a conclusion. And, unless, upon an examination of the entire record, we may be clearly satisfied that such conclusion was unwarranted, it is our duty to accept it and be governed by it.

There is no dispute as to the qualifications of plaintiff to perform the kind of services for which he was employed. With the exception of the testimony of the witness Jones as to the date of plaintiff's arrival at the hotel in Newcastle, a fact otherwise shown, there were but two witnesses called—plaintiff, on his own behalf, and witness Groom, the admitted agent of defendant company, in its behalf.

[2] Appellants seem to overlook the fact that "the weight of the evidence" is not dependent upon the number of witnesses. Trial courts are frequently called upon to solve questions of fact where the witnesses to its existence are equally divided numerically. But there are almost always some circumstances cropping out which enable the court to determine the truth of the matter.

[3] It appeared from the testimony of plaintiff that in March or April, 1907, he received a letter "from the manager of the company, P. M. Groom," who was in Los Angeles, stating that he was organizing a company and wanted plaintiff to "take the position of refrigerating engineer," to which plaintiff replied that he would accept the position; that Groom answered him that he would give him $5 per day and expenses; that plaintiff was in business for himself in San Francisco, and went east, waiting orders to report; that in the early part of November plaintiff received a telegram from Groom to report at his office in Los Angeles, where plaintiff arrived November 10, 1907; that he immediately went to work for the company, helping to interest people in the enterprise, assisting in preparing plans, blue prints, and drawings and making estimates; that the company, after about two months, left Los Angeles and came to San Francisco, about January 14, 1908, "to commence building a plant." As to what he did for the company at San Francisco and at Newcastle, he testified: "I was the engineer. I built the machine, this precooling plant that was put in at Newcastle. I was in the employ of this company all the time I was in San Francisco from about January 14th to some time in May. While in their employ in San Francisco, I superintended the building of a plant. I never had done a minute's work for anybody else. Q. Now describe generally to the court the character of this plant you were engaged in, if any? A. It was a 50-ton refrigerating plant—two machines, duplicates—two 25-tons, connecting with a belt wheel, the motor, and condenser, ammonia condenser. I made all that work, did the superintending and construction and building of these compressors and shipped them to Newcastle, and in a general way occupied about the plant as their engineer—that is, it was built under my supervision. Q. When you left San Francisco, where did you go? A. After we got the plant built came to Newcastle. The Pacific Fruit Cooling & Vaporizing Company directed me to go to Newcastle and put in the plant, and said, 'Rush—rush it.' That was the instructions I had. Q. When did you come to Newcastle? A. Came to Newcastle along in June, 1908, I think, as near as I recall now." (He arrived June 16th.) "Q. When you came to Newcastle, what did you do? A. Went to work putting in the plant. I put the plant in the packing house of Mr. Kellogg—George D. Kellogg. During all the time I was in Newcastle I was in the employment of that company. Q. What did you have to do for the company while at Newcastle? A. Erecting the plant—this refrigerating plant. Q. The Court: You mean you erected it with your own hands? A. Yes, sir; your honor please. I was the engineer and directed the work. I worked not only myself, but directed other men. I worked, physical labor, and had other men, too, working under my direction." He testified that he was discharged on October 10, 1908, and his notice of lien was filed on November 7th.

The court found that plaintiff performed 40 days' work between November 10, 1907, and January 31, 1908, as refrigerating and construction engineer for the company, at the agreed price of $5 per day, aggregating $200, which the company paid on or about January 31, 1908. Defendants attack this finding on two grounds: First, it is contended that the testimony of plaintiff was that he worked every day except Sundays and holidays during this period, making 71 days; that "it was either 71 days' work and labor, or no days' work and labor"; that "there was no 'middle of the road' proposition." Plaintiff testified to the character of the work done by him during this period, for some of which the court might well have disallowed pay, and no doubt did so, in arriving at a just conclusion. This action of the court was favorable to defendants, and cannot be made the subject of complaint. The court could not have disallowed the claim for the entire time without wholly rejecting plaintiff's testimony, which it did not do. Second. It is claimed by defendants that this $200 payment, made January 31st, was an advance payment on wages yet to be earned, and Mr. Groom so testified. Plaintiff testified to the contrary, and that it was money owing him by the company at the time. We think the record shows that the court had sufficient ground for accepting plaintiff's testimony on this point.

The court next found that plaintiff by virtue of said contract of employment performed 114 days' work at $5 per day between February 1, 1908, and June 16, 1908 (the latter date being the day when plaintiff arrived at Newcastle to commence work in installing the machinery in defendants' building and the erection of said plant), for which defendant company had paid him on account $538 and no more, leaving due plaintiff the sum of $32 at that time. These 114 days represent all the working days in the months embraced by the period mentioned. Defendants claim that the $200 payment of January 31st should be added to the $538, making $738 as paid. But plaintiff's testimony was that this $200 payment was for work previously performed, and the court so found.

The next finding is that after June 16th, and to October 9th, inclusive, plaintiff worked 99 days, making $495, which has support in the evidence, although it is conflicting, and that plaintiff paid $1.50 for recording his lien. These items, to wit, $32, $495, and $1.50, aggregated $528.50, for which judgment was entered against defendant company. The services of plaintiff were rendered at San Francisco, in supervising the work of constructing the machinery, and it was for this work the balance of $32 was found to be unpaid. The court, as we understand the findings and judgment, disallowed a lien for this $32. The lien, for the sum of $495, was declared upon the building in which the plant was erected and on the plant itself. This, we think, was a correct determination of the matter, although the court might properly have included in the lien the filing fee of $1.50.

[4] It is further contended by defendants that the claim of lien, in the light of evidence, shows on its face a violation of section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure, which declares that "any person who shall willfully include in his claim, filed under section 1187, work or materials not performed upon or furnished for the property described in the claim, shall forfeit his lien." At the close of plaintiff's case defendants made a motion to strike plaintiff's Exhibit A, the claim of lien, "from the records in the case and as evidence, upon the ground that the lien is fatally defective, in that there is a fatal variance between the contract set out in the lien, its time and terms and conditions, and the proof as shown by plaintiff. The Court: My conviction is that the plaintiff has not willfully attempted to assert a lien for something he did not believe he was entitled to—as to the other points I do not think they constitute a fatal variance." The motion was denied. The alleged variance arises out of averments in the notice of the lien which, it is claimed, were not supported by the evidence, of which the following are the principal ones relied upon: That said Groom, as agent of said company during all the times mentioned, was agent of said company, and as such agent employed plaintiff to work upon said refrigerating and precooling plant about April 10, 1907; that plaintiff was to work and labor on said plant at the rate of $5 per day "and expenses for each and every day commencing on November 10, 1907, on which latter day said work did commence; that by virtue of said agreement plaintiff did render service," and then follows a statement of the number of days' labor performed in the several months, from November 10, 1907, to October 9, 1908, inclusive, aggregating 288 days and amounting to $1,440 for services and $385.50 for expenses, which $1,087.50 is claimed to be due for "labor and services rendered and performed upon, in and about said hereinbefore described refrigerating and precooling plant and said property under and by virtue of the terms of the hereinbefore set forth contract," after deducting all just credits and offsets. It is contended that plaintiff must have known that he was not working on said plant, which was erected at Newcastle after June 11, 1908, when he was employed at Los Angeles and at San Francisco prior to that date; that the court disallowed all claim for expenses, which shows that plaintiff must have known he was not entitled to such claim; that the court allowed plaintiff's claim for a less number of days than as claimed and found that plaintiff was entitled to a lien only for services after June 15, 1908.

Section 1203, Code of Civil Procedure, provides: "No mistake or errors in the statement or demand, or of the amount of credits or offsets * * * shall invalidate the lien, unless the court finds that such mistake or error in the statement of the demand, credits and offsets, or of the balance due, was made with the intent to defraud, or the court shall find that an innocent third party, without notice, direct or constructive, has, since the claim was filed, become the bona fide owner of the property levied upon, and that the notice of the claim was so deficient that it did not put the party upon further inquiry in any manner." Section 1203, as enacted in 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 1319), is substantially the same as section 1203a, enacted in 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 858), so that, if it should be held that section 1203 is inapplicable because passed after the matters herein involved occurred, section 1203a, as enacted in 1907, was in force. Speaking of section 1202, before the enactment of section 1203a, the Supreme Court said, in Schalbert-Ganahl L. Co. v. Neal, 91 Cal. 362, 365, 27 Pac. 743, 744: "This section of the statute * * * is penal in its character, and not only must be strictly construed, but the evidence under which it is invoked should be clear and convincing that the violation was willful and intentional." When the motion for a nonsuit was made, there was no evidence before the court bearing upon the question of fraud except the notice of plaintiff's claim and his testimony. Fraud is never to be presumed, and, before a party can be deprived of his right upon a claim of fraud, the facts must be clearly made out. McCarthy v. White, 21 Cal. 495, 82 Am. Dec. 754. The court expressed its conviction that the plaintiff did not willfully attempt to assert a lien for something he did not believe he was entitled to. We cannot say that its conclusion was unwarranted.

[5] No fraud having been shown and none being clearly inferable from the facts, the lien cannot be defeated merely because it turns out on the trial that the claim as filed was for too much. Barber v. Reynolds, 44 Cal. 519; Harmon v. S. F., etc., R. R. Co., 86 Cal. 617, 25 Pac. 124; Continental, etc., Ass'n v. Hutton, 144 Cal. 609, 78 Pac. 21. It was not error to refuse to strike plaintiff's Exhibit A, the notice of lien, from the records.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

5. WORDS AND PHRASES—"ELECTED"—"APPOINTED."

The words "elected" and "appointed" ordinarily are not synonymous. Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Mandamus proceedings by C. A. Odell against Charles J. Rihn and others. From a judgment for defendants, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

C. A. Odell, of Richmond, for appellant.
A. B. McKenzie, of Martinez, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. Section 4014 of the Political Code of this state declares that, "The officers of a township are two justices of the peace. * * * In townships containing cities in which city justices or recorders are elected there shall be but one justice of the peace, and in townships having a population of less than 5,000 there shall be but one justice of the peace. * * *"

The appellant here, who was the petitioner in the proceeding below, seeks by mandamus to compel the respondents, as the board of supervisors of Contra Costa county, to declare him one of the duly elected justices of the peace of the Fifteenth judicial township in and for said county. Judgment was rendered and entered for defendants, and the appeal is from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone.

The proceeding was heard and determined upon an agreed statement of facts, which was subsequently substantially adopted by the trial court as its findings of fact. The facts of the case, as agreed by the parties and as found by the court, were substantially these: The respondents are and have been ever since the 8th day of November, 1910, the duly elected, qualified, and acting members of the board of supervisors of the county of Contra Costa. The petitioner is and has been for more than one year prior to the 8th day of November, 1910, a resident and qualified elector of the Fifteenth judicial township of the county of Contra Costa. Said township consists entirely of the city of Richmond. Prior to the general election held on the 8th day of November, 1910, the said township had but one justice of the peace. At that election petitioner herein and three other persons were candidates in that township for the office of justice of the peace. The name of the petitioner and the names of the other candidates for the office were printed upon the official ballots used at the election under separate party designations and under the heading, "For Justice of the Peace of the Fifteenth Judicial Township." No persons other than the candidates just mentioned were voted for at said election, and no voter voted for more than one person for justice of the peace of said township. After the election was had, the respondents, as the board of supervisors, made and canvassed the returns thereof, and declared, among other things, that for the office of justice of the peace of said township John Roth, the Democratic candidate, had received 497 votes; that C. A. Odell, the petitioner herein, as the Republican candidate, had received 315 votes; that J. B. Willis, an independent candidate, had received 240 votes; and that B. F. Smith, the Socialist candidate, had received 185 votes—whereupon the respondents, as the board of supervisors, declared said John Roth to be the only person who was elected to the office of justice of the peace for said township.

At the time of the election, the said township had and ever since has had a population of more than 5,000. The city of Richmond, however, is governed by a charter which provides for the appointment of a city justice by the city council. It is conceded here that prior to the general election of November 8, 1910, the Fifteenth judicial township of Contra Costa county had but one justice of the peace, and that the official proclamation of that election called for the election of only one justice for said township. It is further conceded that prior to the issuance of the proclamation for the general election of November 8, 1910, the city council of the city of Richmond had appointed a city police justice, who was then, and ever since has been, occupying the office and performing the duties thereof, and that his jurisdiction as said city police justice is concurrent and co-ordinate in all matters and things with the jurisdiction conferred by law upon the justice's court of the Fifteenth judicial township of Contra Costa county.

It is the contention of petitioner that said township is, by the provisions of section 4014 of the Political Code, entitled to two justices of the peace; and that, inasmuch as petitioner had received the second highest number of votes cast for the office of justice of the peace at said election, the supervisors should have declared him elected as one of the two justices of the peace to which he claims the township was entitled, regardless of the conceded fact that the election proclamation called for the election of but one justice of the peace, and regardless of the further conceded fact that the city of Richmond then had a duly appointed, acting, and qualified city police justice. In other words, it is the contention of the petitioner that the Fifteenth judicial township of Contra Costa county was, as a matter of law, entitled to two justices of the peace because the township had a population of more than 5,000, and the city of Richmond did not have an "elected" city police justice. From this it is argued that it was the right and the duty of the voters of the township to choose and elect two justices of the peace, notwithstanding the fact that the proper officers, in proclaiming and giving notice of the election, called for the election of but one justice of the peace; and that, inasmuch as the petitioner here received the second highest number of votes cast at the election for the office of justice of the peace, he was the choice of the voters for the second justiceship, and consequently is entitled to be declared elected to the office.

This contention is based upon the assumption that the persons who voted for the petitioner did so with the knowledge and in the belief that the election was being held for the purpose, in part, of electing two justices of the peace. This assumption, however, is not supported by either the petitioner's pleadings or proof. Nowhere in the petition for mandate is there to be found an allegation that a single voter at the election knew or believed that an election was being held for the purpose of electing more than one justice of the peace. The record before us is barren either of averment or evidence that in any single instance any voter cast his vote for more than one candidate for the office of justice of the peace. On the contrary, the trial court found as a fact that "there was no evidence produced that at said election any voter voted for more than one justice of the peace of said township." Even if it be conceded that the Fifteenth judicial township of Contra Costa county was entitled, under the provisions of section 4014 of the Political Code, to two justices of the peace, nevertheless it cannot be successfully maintained that an election was held on November 8, 1910, for the purpose of electing two justices of the peace in that township. It may be true generally, as counsel for the petitioner assert, that in the event that an election for any particular office provided for by law should have been called and proclaimed by the proper officers, and such election has in fact been held after actual notice thereof and knowledge of its purpose have been conveyed to the electors generally, that notice thereof by official proclamation, if the election was otherwise regular, is not per se an indispensable prerequisite to the validity of the election, or to the right of the electors to vote thereat for any particular office which may be vacant and which should be filled by the people at that election.

[1] In short, it may be conceded to be the general rule of law that, when an election has been held in all other respects as prescribed by law, and the voters generally have knowingly had a full opportunity to express their will, such election will not be declared invalid merely because the prescribed statutory notice has not been given. Carson v. McPhetridge, 15 Ind. 327; Foster v. Scarff, 15 Ohio St. 532; Sanchez v. Fordyce, 141 Cal. 428, 75 Pac. 56; State v. Orvis, 20 Wis. 235.

[2] Where, however, as here, it is conceded that the official proclamation called only for the election of one justice of the peace, and no showing is made that the great body of the electors had actual notice and knowledge of the fact that two candidates for the office of justice of the peace might and should be voted for and elected, and that one or more of the electors voted for two candidates for the office of justice of the peace, it cannot be logically said that an election was held by the people to fill more than the one office called for in the official proclamation of the election. In other words, where, as in the present case, there was no notice by official proclamation or in fact that an election was to be held for the purpose of filling two offices, it must be held that in fact there was no election for any office other than the particular office designated in the official proclamation. In the absence of such a showing, it will be presumed that the electors generally acted upon the information conveyed to them by the official proclamation that there was but one justice of the peace to be voted for and elected, and that the voters cast their ballots accordingly. This being so, it must follow that the petitioner was defeated at the general election of November 8, 1910, rather than elected to the office to which he aspired, and that he was properly refused a certificate of election by the respondents. Foster v. Scarff, supra; Rogers v. Board, etc., 11 Mich. 111; Wood v. Bartling, 16 Kan. 109; Cooley's Const. Lim.

(7th Ed.) 92; Jones v. Gridley, 20 Kan. 584; State v. Goetze, 22 Wis. 363.

[3] Apart from these considerations, we are satisfied that the Fifteenth judicial township of Contra Costa county was not at the time of the election in 1910 entitled, under the provisions of section 4014 of the Political Code, to more than one justice of the peace. That section, as has been noted, requires that there shall be two justices of the peace in every township save and except in townships having a population of less than 5,000 and in those containing cities in which city justices or recorders are elected. As has already been stated, it is conceded that the judicial township in question consists entirely of the city of Richmond which, although it has a population of more than 5,000, is provided by charter with a city justice of the peace, who is appointed by the city council. His jurisdiction and duties are concurrent and co-ordinate with those conferred generally upon justices of the peace throughout the state. It is petitioner's contention that the term "elected," as employed in section 4014, Political Code, should be construed to mean "elected by the popular vote of the people." In this contention we cannot concur.

[4] Statutes must be read and considered in conjunction with the legislative intent, and then be liberally construed with the object in view of effecting such intent. In restricting the number of justices of the peace to one in townships which include cities in which city justices or recorders are elected, it was evidently the legislative intent not to burden the people of the state with the expense of maintaining more judicial officers than were actually necessary to the needs of the people. The narrow construction of the statute here contended for by petitioner obviously would result in defeating the legislative purpose and intent in that behalf, and is therefore to be avoided, if possible.

[5] The words "elected" and "appointed" ordinarily are not synonymous. In its limited sense, the word "elected" is usually employed to denote the selection of a public officer by the qualified voters of a community. On the other hand, the word "appointed" is generally understood to mean the selection of a public officer by one person who is empowered by law to make the appointment. In its broadest sense, however, the word "elected" means merely "selected." When used in that sense, the word "elected" is synonymous with the word "appointed"; and where, as in the case at bar, a public officer has been selected by the votes of several members of a city council, it may be truly said, in the broadest sense of the term, that he was elected. McPherson v. Blacker, 146 U. S. 1, 13 Sup. Ct. 3, 36 L. Ed. 869; Pierce v. Guggenheimer, 44 App. Div. 399, 60 N. Y. Supp. 703; State v. Compson, 34 Or.

25, 54 Pac. 349; People v. Langdon, 8 Cal. 1, 16; Reid v. Gorsuch, 67 N. J. Law, 396, 51 Atl. 457; State v. Williams, 60 Kan. 837, 58 Pac. 476; State v. Harrison, 113 Ind. 434, 16 N. E. 384, 3 Am. St. Rep. 663.

Having in mind the spirit and purpose of the code section under discussion, it seems to us that the word "elected," as used therein, was not intended to apply solely to the election of a city justice by the votes of the people at large, but included as well the selection of a city justice of the peace by the city council or other legislative body in whom the power of election is conferred by law. In other words, it is our opinion that the appointment of a city justice of the peace by the votes of the city council of Richmond was tantamount to the election of such justice of the peace in the sense contemplated by the Legislature, and that therefore the Fifteenth judicial township of Contra Costa county was entitled to have but one justice of the peace at the time of the election in 1910.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Appeals from Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Consolidated actions by William A. Blanck, by the Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company, by E. E. Stewart, and by W. P. Fuller & Company against the Commonwealth Amusement Corporation, and by the American Supply Company against J. E. MacCormac. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Olney, Pringle & Mannon, of San Francisco, for respondent Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Co. Robert H. Countryman, of San Francisco, for respondent American Supply Co. R. V. Whiting, of San Francisco, for respondent E. E. Stewart. Adams & Adams, of San Francisco, for respondent W. P. Fuller & Co.

LENNON, P. J. These actions were instituted by the plaintiffs therein for the foreclosure of 15 mechanics' liens claimed by the several plaintiffs for materials furnished in the construction of a theater building erected by the defendant upon a certain lot of land in the city and county of San Francisco. The five actions were consolidated in the court below, and judgment rendered therein in favor of the plaintiffs. The appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying the defendant a new trial.

The building in question was erected by the defendant upon leased ground in accordance with the terms of a written contract entered into between the defendant and one Henry C. Farley. The contract for the erection of the building was never recorded. The defendant contends at the outset that the several and various contracts under which materials were supplied in the erection of the building were not binding upon the defendant, and should not have been admitted in evidence, because it was not shown that, although made in the name of the defendant, they were subscribed by the president and secretary of the defendant and executed under its corporate seal. Although the record fails to show that any of the agreements offered and received in evidence as the contracts of the defendant were executed by the parties signing the same under any express authority of the defendant, nevertheless the record does disclose a subsequent ratification of the several contracts sufficient in each instance to hold the defendant liable for the sums due thereunder. The evidence shows, for instance, that all of the contracts were entered into upon behalf of the defendant at different times during the construction of the building by individual directors and officers of the defendant; that the defendant paid for the first lot of materials which was delivered and used; that some of the material delivered for use in the building was rejected and returned by the agent of the defendant, for which credit was sought and given to the defendant; that two of the directors of the defendant had personal knowledge of the erection of the building and observed and inspected it several times during the course of its construction; that the construction of the building was in charge of an agent of the defendant, to whom the materials were delivered, and who must have known what materials were received at the building and actually used in its construction; and finally that the directors and officers of the defendant subsequently acknowledged the several items claimed to be due, and asked for time in which to pay the same. The record, on the other hand, does not show that the defendant at any time repudiated any of the contracts, or denied receiving the benefits thereof.

[1] Having knowingly received and retained the benefit of contracts entered into by its directors and officers, even though the contracts were without the specific authority of the defendant, it will not now be heard to repudiate those contracts or be permitted to escape the obligations thereof. Scott v. Superior Sunset Oil Co., 144 Cal. 140, 77 Pac. 817; Underhill v. Santa Barbara, 93 Cal. 300, 28 Pac. 1049; Carpy v. Dowdell, 115 Cal. 677, 47 Pac. 695; Cummings v. Kearney, 141 Cal. 156, 74 Pac. 759.

[2] The requirement of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure that all contracts over $1,000 shall be recorded does not apply to the contracts of the San Francisco Cornice Company, Duthie-Clark Company, and Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company. These were in each instance the contracts of materialmen; and it is well settled that the failure to record the contracts of materialmen does not render them void. Hinckley v. Fields Biscuit Co., 91 Cal. 136, 27 Pac. 594; Roebbling Co. v. Humboldt Co., 112 Cal. 288, 44 Pac. 568; Bennett v. Davis, 113 Cal. 337, 45 Pac. 684, 54 Am. St. Rep. 354; Bryson v. McCone, 121 Cal. 153, 53 Pac. 637.

[3] In response to defendant's contention that the claims of lien filed by the Bradley-Martin Company, the Bruce Lumber Company, and the San Francisco Cornice Company were void because of the alleged willful and fraudulent inclusion therein of materials not actually used in the building under construction, it will suffice to say that the trial court specifically found that in each instance the mistakes and errors of the several claims of lien were unintentional and free from fraud. This finding is fully supported by the evidence, and, under the provisions of section 1203a of the Code of Civil Procedure as it existed when the liens were filed and this case decided, no mistake or error in the statement of a claim of lien will invalidate it unless the court finds that such mistake or error was made with the intent to defraud.

[4] A lien was allowed to the Bradley-Martin Company for an electric sign which consisted of a swinging bracket set into the front of the building. A lien was allowed to the Electric Railway & Manufacturers' Supply Company for supplying and installing telephone instruments and telephone equipment. These telephones were used for intercommunication between the various portions of the building. The Gas Furnace Company was allowed a lien for a gas furnace and gas connections installed in the building for heating purposes. The Bruce Lumber Company was allowed a lien for belaying pins supplied to and used in the building. It is the claim of the defendant that the materials supplied by the several firms just mentioned were personalty which were not necessary to the construction of the building, and therefore could not be made the subject of a lien. This contention is founded upon the fact that all of the materials mentioned were detachable and portable. There is no merit in this contention. Obviously all of the materials mentioned, save the belaying pins, were apparently necessary to the convenient use and occupation of the premises and were well within the architectural scheme of the building to which they were attached. This being so, they entitled the materialman to a lien just as much as would the plumbing, bathroom fixtures, and other necessary fixtures of an ordinary dwelling.

We do not know, and the record does not show, why "belaying pins" should be necessary in the construction of a theater building. It does appear, however, that the belaying pins used in the construction of this particular building were "turned pieces of hard wood." From this meager bit of information we should judge that the belaying pins were a portion of the millwork used in the building, and, aside from the mere assertion of counsel for the defendant to the contrary, we are unable to discover either in the record or the briefs of counsel any good reason why millwork, even though it assumed the shape of belaying pins, is not the subject of a lien.

[5] The evidence as to the date of the completion of the building is in conflict. This was a question of fact to be determined by the trial court. The finding in this behalf was against the contention of the defendant, and in the presence of a conflict in the evidence the defendant in this court must abide by the finding.

[6] Our attention is called to the fact that the claim of lien of the Electric Railway & Manufacturers' Supply Company for electric supplies is not supported by evidence showing the agreed price or the reasonable value thereof. Plaintiff, however, alleges that the electric supplies were contracted for at the agreed price of $49.35, which it was also alleged was the reasonable value of the same. The answer of the defendant with reference to this particular item was in the form of a negative pregnant. This was not a denial of the allegation of the complaint. It was, in effect, an admission that the electric supplies furnished for and used in the building were of the value stated in the complaint, and therefore the answer of the defendant raised no issue upon the subject of value.

[7] The allegations of the complaint with reference to the claim of lien of the Duthie-Clark Company for installing the gridiron and fire escape, and the allegations of the complaint concerning the claim of M. C. Baker & Sons for electrical work, stand undented by the defendant's answer. Consequently these allegations must be taken to be true. This being so, it would be a waste of time and words to further discuss defendant's contention that these particular claims of lien are not supported by the evidence.

[8] If there be a variance between the several claims of lien, as claimed by the defendant, and the proof offered in support thereof, the variance in each instance is non-substantial and immaterial. The several liens are founded upon the statement of an agreed price for the materials furnished, while the evidence shows, in some instances, that no price was agreed upon. The evidence further shows, however, that the alleged agreed price of the materials furnished in every instance was the reasonable value thereof, and therefore the statement of the terms of the several contracts, as set forth in the several claims of lien, was substantially correct, and the variance, if any, must be held to be immaterial. Star Mill & Lumber Co. v. Porter, 4 Cal. App. 470, 88 Pac. 497; Lucas v. Rea, 10 Cal. App. 641, 102 Pac. 822; Lucas v. Gobbi, 10 Cal. App. 648, 103 Pac. 157; Acme Lumber Co. v. Wessling, 126 Pac. 167. Other objections of minor importance and similar in character to those just enumerated are urged against the validity of the liens of the several remaining lien claimants. Upon an examination of the record we find that they do not possess sufficient merit to warrant a discussion of them further than to say that the variances complained of are in some instances more seeming than real, and that the real variances, if any, are, for the reasons hereinbefore stated, nonsubstantial and immaterial.

[9] Defendant complains of the judgment and seeks a reversal thereof upon the erroneous assumption that the trial court rendered and entered in part a purely personal judgment against the defendant, contrary to the provisions of section 1194 of the Code of Civil Procedure as it stood when the action was commenced and determined. The judgment is not susceptible of any such construction. The sum and substance of the judgment is, after declaring that judgment in certain specified sums be entered in favor of each of the plaintiffs and against the defendant, that the several liens sued upon be foreclosed against the interest of the defendant in the property involved. The judgment directs that the defendant's interest in the property be sold by the sheriff in the manner prescribed by law; and that, "in case the proceeds of such sale do not suffice to pay each of said plaintiffs the full amount for which he has judgment hereunder, then a judgment for any deficiency shall be docketed in favor of each of said plaintiffs and against the defendant Commonwealth Amusement Company."

It will thus be seen that by the very terms of the judgment no judgment except for a deficiency could be docketed against the defendant, and that the judgment itself could not have been enforced as a purely personal judgment against the defendant except in the contingency that a deficiency might be shown by the return of the sheriff. So construed, the judgment does not violate the provisions of section 1194 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Painter v. Painter, 98 Cal. 625, 33 Pac. 483; Central, etc., Co. v. Center, 107 Cal. 193, 40 Pac. 334; Kreling v. Kreling, 116 Cal. 458, 48 Pac. 383; Hines v. Miller, 126 Cal. 683, 59 Pac. 142.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John Ellsworth, Judge.

M. L. Brewer was convicted of murder, and appeals from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Snook & Church, of Oakland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

HALL, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of murder in the second degree. Before judgment was rendered she moved the court for a new trial, which being denied and judgment rendered against her of imprisonment in the state prison for the period of 13 years, she took an appeal to this court from the judgment and order.

The evidence shows that on the evening of September 28, 1911, Annie E. Enrick, then advanced in pregnancy about three months, repaired to the residence of the defendant, also a woman, for the purpose of procuring an abortion to be performed upon her by defendant; that the defendant operated upon her in an attempt to procure an abortion; that said Annie E. Enrick at once became so ill, weak, and faint that it was with great difficulty that she could return from the residence of defendant in Berkeley to her home in East Oakland, though assisted by her husband, who had accompanied her to the residence of the defendant; that she was at once put to bed, and a physician called, who attended her until she died as a result of the operation, at a hospital to which she had been removed.

[1] 1. The court gave all the instructions requested by defendant, with some slight modifications, not complained of, save one, which the court refused. It is the refusal to give this instruction which is first urged as a ground for reversing the judgment. The refused instruction is as follows: "You are hereby instructed that, if you entertain a reasonable doubt as to whether any particular witness in this case was or was not an accomplice, you are to give the benefit of such doubt to the defendant, and for the purpose of this case you must consider such person and such witness an accomplice." We think that this instruction transgressed upon the province of the jury to determine the facts in the case. The concluding language of the requested instruction, "And for the purpose of this case you must consider such person and such witness an accomplice," implies that the crime of murder had in fact been committed, and the corpus delicti fully established; for manifestly there could be no accomplice if no crime had been committed. To follow the rule laid down in the instruction would require the jury to assume that the crime charged had in fact been committed, even though upon the whole case they had a reasonable doubt thereof. This being so, the court was justified in refusing the requested instruction, for the court should not charge the jury with respect to matters of fact. Article 6, § 19, Const.

[2] 2. It is next claimed that the court erred in refusing to strike out the answer to the following question put by the district attorney to the witness, Dr. Webber: "Q. Well, then, do I understand you to say that it is your opinion that in this case death was caused either by the injection of some substance or drug into the uterus, which caused a suppression of urine, or that the suppression of urine was the result of shock induced by the injection of some substance or instrument into the uterus, or both?" The answer to this question was, "It might be both," and the ground of the motion was that the answer was not responsive. Clearly the answer was directly responsive to the concluding portion of the question. Because of the complex nature of the question the answer was not as clear as it might have been, but the meaning of the witness was at once made perfectly clear by explanatory answers made to questions put to him by the court. The court did not err in the ruling complained of.

[3] 3. It is next claimed that the court erred in refusing to strike out the following question and answer testified to by the witness Hynes as a part of the dying statement of Mrs. Enrick: "Q. Were you in good normal health at the time you visited the house of this woman? A. I was, except for the usual illness of pregnancy." The witness was relating to the jury the statement made to him by the decedent, which statement seems to have been elicited by questions put by the witness to decedent. In this instance the witness stated the question as above indicated, and then stated the answer made thereto. Defendant raised no objection until after the answer was stated, when she moved to strike it out upon the ground that "it does not relate to the cause of death, and is not competent."

We think the court was justified in refusing to strike out the evidence for two reasons:

(a) When the witness stated the question that he had put to the decedent, it was perfectly apparent to what subject-matter any answer that decedent might make thereto would relate. It was then that the defendant should have objected to the witness giving the answer to the question. She should not be allowed to speculate on the chance that the answer might be favorable to her side of the case, and if, on the answer being given it prove unfavorable, to have the right to have it struck out. The same rule should apply as applies where a litigant fails to object to a question put to a witness. Under this rule appellant's motion came too late.

[4] (b) The question put to the dying woman and her answer were in truth part of the res gestæ of the operation which resulted in her death, and for that reason were admissible as a part of her dying statement. The situation and condition of the parties at the time of the performance of the acts which result in the death are, we think, without doubt part of the res gestæ. This was all that the evidence complained of related to, and for that reason it was admissible.

[5] The fourth point urged for a reversal is that the court overruled the objection of defendant to the question: "I will ask you to state whether or not an opening such as you found in the uterus of Annie E. Enrick could have been made by a syringe, hard rubber syringe?" The objection was that "It is irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, and calls for an expression of opinion on a subject on which the doctor is not entitled to express an opinion."

[6] It is now claimed that the evidence does not show what kind of a syringe was used. This point was not raised by the objection, and cannot now be raised for the first time. There is no merit in the contention that the matter was not such as was the subject of expert testimony. A physician may well be presumed to know more about the strength and firmness of tissues of the uterus and the membrane that closes the natural opening thereto in pregnancy than does a layman, and therefore is better able to judge whether or not an artificial opening therein which he had seen could be made by a given implement. It certainly was within the discretion of the court to allow the question.

[7] 5. It is next urged that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, in that, as it is claimed, it was not shown that the operation was not necessary to preserve the life of the deceased. There is no merit in this contention. It is not at all clear that the proof of such matter devolves upon the people. Underhill, Crim. Ev. 347; People v. Balkwell, 143 Cal. 259, 76 Pac. 1017. But conceding, for the purposes of this opinion only, that the fact must be established by the people, the proof upon this point was ample. The evidence shows that Mrs. Enrick was 39 years of age and was the mother of three children, that she went to the residence of the defendant in Berkeley from her residence in East Oakland, and at that time was apparently in perfect health except for the usual symptoms of pregnancy. There being not a word in the evidence to the contrary, this was ample to support the negative proposition that the operation was not necessary to preserve life. It is a matter of common knowledge that it is the rare exception that such an operation is necessary to preserve life, and all the circumstances surrounding and attending the operation performed in this case show without doubt that it was resorted to for no such benign purpose.

[8] 6. It is next claimed that there was no evidence other than that of accomplices that tended to prove defendant guilty. This claim is also without merit. The jury may well have believed that Mr. Enrick was not an accomplice, that he simply went with his wife at her urgent request to the residence of defendant—true, with knowledge of her purpose, but without aiding and abetting therein, or advising and encouraging her therein. There is no pretense that he was present when the operation was performed, or that he assisted defendant therein or spoke to her about the matter. Except that he was the husband of the pregnant woman, his conduct was quite similar to that of the witness in People v. Balkwell, 143 Cal. 259,

76 Pac. 1017, who was held not to have been an accomplice. At any rate, we cannot say as matter of law that the evidence was such as to compel the conclusion that he was an accomplice. There is ample in his evidence that tends to show that defendant performed a criminal operation upon Mrs. Enrick. The testimony of Miss Thompson also tends to show the same fact. The jury may well have considered that the statement made by defendant to Miss Thompson, to the effect that Mrs. Enrick was  $2\frac{1}{2}$  or 3 months along in pregnancy when she came to her (defendant), was, considering the circumstances under which it was made, a virtual admission that she had performed the operation in question. The evidence of the physicians amply proves that an attempt to produce an abortion had been committed upon the person of decedent, and that she died as a result thereof.

[9] 7. In support of the claim of newly discovered evidence, defendant presented the affidavits of two persons as to statements made to them by the witness Enrick, husband of decedent. The only claim made in the brief of appellant as to these affidavits is that they tend to prove the husband of decedent an accomplice in the crime committed. We have carefully examined these affidavits, and find nothing in them bearing upon this point that differs materially from the testimony given by the husband himself. The granting or refusing a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence is a matter peculiarly within the discretion of the trial court, and this court never interferes with the exercise of such discretion unless it is clear that such discretion has been abused. People v. Sing Yow, 145 Cal. 1, 78 Pac. 235, and cases there cited. No such condition exists in this case.

This disposes of all the points called to our attention by appellant. In conclusion we may add that we have carefully read and examined the entire record, including the evidence, and find no reason to think that the trial of defendant has resulted in a miscarriage of justice by reason of any ruling of the trial court or for any other reason.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by A. E. Buttner against Joseph B. Kasser and another, doing business under the name of Kasser Bros. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Hugo K. Asher and Jacob S. Meyer, both of San Francisco, for appellants. Sterling Carr, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HALL, J. The action is one to recover for the reasonable value of the use and occupation of certain premises used as a cigar stand by defendants during the period for which a recovery was sought.

It appears from the complaint that on the 9th day of December, 1907, one M. A. Lang was in possession of certain premises including said cigar stand, under a lease from the City Front Improvement Company, a corporation, who were the tenants under a lease of the entire premises, duly deraigned from the owner of the premises. The lease to Lang was for a period of 15 years from April 1, 1907, and the lease held by the City Improvement Company was for a period of 25 years from September 15, 1906. On the said 9th day of December, 1907, said Lang sublet the premises included in his lease (which included the cigar stand) to the Bay Front Improvement Company, a corporation, for a period of 15 years from the 1st day of April, 1907, who entered into possession on said 9th day of December, 1907. Under date of June 1, 1907, the said Bay Front Improvement Company sublet a portion of the premises, to wit, the cigar stand, to defendants for a period of two years from June 15, 1907, by virtue of which lease defendants went into possession of said cigar stand, and, as appears from subsequent allegations in the complaint, so continued until June 25, 1909. On the 17th day of June, 1908, and while defendants were in possession of the cigar stand and premises, sublet to them by the Bay Front Improvement Company, the lease from said Lang to said company was by mutual consent of said Lang and said company canceled. Though requested so to do by said Lang, said defendants refused to remove from said premises, and, as appears from the complaint, retained possession of the premises sublet to them by said Bay Front Improvement Company until the 25th day of June, 1909. The claim of plaintiff is split into two causes of action because of subsequent transfers and retransfers flowing from said Lang, which have finally resulted in vesting in plaintiff whatever claim Lang might have had to recover against defendants for the value of the use and occupation of the premises sublet to them if he had made no transfer of his rights after the surrender and cancellation of the lease made by him to defendants' lessor. None of the leases, subleases, or assignments pleaded in the complaint contained any inhibition or limitation upon the right to sublet the premises leased or any part thereof. At the time that the City Front Improvement Company surrendered to Lang and the lease from Lang to said company was by their mutual consent canceled defendants were in possession under a valid sublease from said company to them. Defendants did not consent to the surrender or cancellation of the lease to their lessor. Plaintiff in framing his cause of action against defendants has ignored the terms of their sublease, and has sued for the reasonable value of the use and occupation of the premises sublet to them by the Bay Front Improvement Company for the period during which they were in possession under the sublease subsequent to the surrender.

By the demurrer to the complaint the question is thus presented: May a lessor to whom his lessee has surrendered his term ignore the conditions of a valid sublease, under which a subtenant is in possession, at the time of the surrender, to which he does not consent, and compel him to pay the reasonable value of the use and occupation of his tenement regardless of the conditions of his sublease?

[1] We say that this is the question presented by the demurrer. Before discussing it, however, it is convenient to dispose of a contention made by respondent in his brief that appellants by their demurrer admitted certain allegations of the complaint to the effect that defendants were wrongfully in possession of the premises during the period for which a recovery is sought. These allegations were preceded by the allegations which deraign the title of defendants, showing that defendants were in possession under a valid sublease, and are mere conclusions of law. As we shall show in this opinion, a tenant, who has made a valid sublease, may not by a voluntary surrender of his term defeat or affect the term of his subtenant, who has not consented to such surrender. It appearing by the specific allegations of the complaint that defendants were in possession under a valid sublease, the allegations that they were wrongfully in possession were conclusions of law, and were worse than useless. Conclusions of law are not admitted by a demurrer. Ohm v. San Francisco, 92 Cal. 437, 28 Pac. 580; Callahan v. Broderick, 124 Cal. 80, 56 Pac. 782.

We now take up the real question presented by the demurrer to the complaint.

[2] It is contended by appellant that a lessor who accepts from his lessee a voluntary surrender of his term and consents to a voluntary cancellation of the lease cannot ignore the rights of a subtenant under a valid sublease, and compel him to pay the reasonable value of the use and occupation of his subtenement regardless of the terms of his sublease. Applying these general contentions to the facts alleged, defendants state their position in these words: "Defendants contend that under these facts assumpsit will not lie; that their lease from Bay Front Improvement Company has never been terminated and was in full force at all times mentioned in the complaint; and that any claim against the defendants with reference to their occupancy of the premises must flow from and be measured by the provisions of the lease between Bay Front Improvement Company and the defendants, and not otherwise. The action should have been based upon the lease and not for rental value of the premises."

Respondent, on the other hand, contends that the surrenderee cannot sue the subtenant on his lease for want of either privity of estate or contract, and that, therefore, he must have the right to sue for the reasonable value of the premises occupied and held under the sublease. We have examined with care the authorities relied upon by plaintiff as supporting his contention that the surrenderee may sue the subtenant in possession under a valid sublease for the reasonable value of the use and occupation. None of them in our opinion supports his contention. Indeed, the full text of what the court said in Bailey v. Richardson, 66 Cal. 416, 5 Pac. 910, cited by respondent, is to the effect that in such a case the subtenant may hold without paying any rent at all. Speaking of a case where the lessee has surrendered to his lessor, the court said: "Although the tenant cannot prejudice the interest of the underlessee, yet he will lose the rent he has reserved upon the underlease, for the rent is incident to the reversion, nor can the surrenderee have it, for, though the reversion to which it was incident has been conveyed to him, yet, as soon as it was so conveyed, it merged in the greater reversion, so that the consequence is that, neither the surrenderor nor surrenderee being entitled to the rent, the underlessee holds without payment of any rent at all excepting where the contrary has been expressly provided by statute."

The case of McDonald v. May, 96 Mo. App. 236, 69 S. W. 1059, cited by respondent, does hold that the surrenderee may not sue the subtenant on the sublease, except where there has been an attornment, but falls far short of holding that an action will lie for reasonable value of use and occupation. On the contrary, it distinctly recognizes the rule that the rights of subtenants "will not be destroyed or impaired by a surrender of the main lease." The court intimates that the rule is a hard one as to landlords, deplored by judges and commentators because it sometimes operates to cut them out of their rent, while permitting a subtenant to retain the premises. In this regard it might be suggested that the original lessor may always protect himself against such a hardship by refusing to consent to a cancellation of the lease, unless accompanied by a surrender of the actual possession of the entire premises, or he may take an assignment of the rentals under the sublease.

The case of Murphy v. Hopcroft, 142 Cal. 43, 75 Pac. 567, is also relied on by respondent as sustaining his theory of the right of a surrenderee to recover the value of the use and occupation as against a subtenant. We have examined the case, and fail to see that it touches the question here involved at all. Neither do any of the authorities cited by respondent support his contention that the surrenderee may in an action against the subtenant ignore the conditions of the lease under which the subtenant holds. It is not doubted but that upon a re-entry for forfeiture of the lease held by the sublessor the rights of the sublessee under his sublease will terminate. But the authorities are uniform to the effect that by a voluntary surrender of the lease by the lessee to his lessor no rights of a sublessee holding under a valid sublease can be affected. In such a case the interest and term of the subtenant continue as if no surrender had been made. Jones on Landlord and Tenant, § 552. "A tenant may surrender his estate to his landlord, but if he have since its commencement created some minor interest out of it, or have made an underlease, he cannot, by surrendering, destroy the charge or affect the estate of the underlessee." Bailey v. Richardson, 66 Cal. 416, 5 Pac. 910. To the same effect are Satterlee v. Bliss, 36 Cal. 516; Ritzler v. Raether, 10 Daly (N. Y.) 286; Eten v. Luyster, 60 N. Y. 252; Oshinsky v. Greenberg, 39 Misc. Rep. 342, 79 N. Y. Supp. 853; Adams v. Goddard, 48 Me. 212; Morrison v. Sohn, 90 Mo. App. 76; Cuschner v. Westlake, 43 Wash. 690, 86 Pac. 948; Mitchell v. Young, 80 Ark. 441, 97 S. W. 454, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 221, 117 Am. St. Rep. 89, 10 Ann. Cas. 423. While none of the cases above cited was a case where suit was brought by the surrenderee to recover rental from the subtenant, yet the principle laid down in these cases that the rights of the subtenant cannot be affected by such surrender must govern the determination of this case.

One of the rights of the subtenant is to hold his term upon compliance with the conditions of his lease. He can be compelled to pay only such rental as was reserved in his lease, and may be entitled to a discharge from such rental on such conditions and for such breaches of his lease by his lessor as are provided for in his lease. None of his rights in these regards may be defeated or affected, without his consent, simply by the consent of his lessor and the overlord. To permit the subtenant to be charged for the value of the use and occupation, without regard to the terms of his lease, because his lessor had surrendered to the overlord, would be to permit his rights to be defeated by the voluntary action of his lessor. As before stated, it is not doubted but that the subtenant may be defeated of his term by a forfeiture of the lease under which his lessor holds. No such condition exists in this case. It is simply a case of the cancellation of a lease by the mutual consent of the lessor and lessee after such lessee had made a valid sublease to a subtenant. While such cancellation is effectual as between the lessor and lessee, it cannot affect the rights of the subtenant. See authorities cited, supra.

The court erred in overruling the demurrer, and for that reason the judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. H. Waste, Judge.

Action by Charles A. King and another, as executors of Martin F. Fragley, against Sarah Fragley and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jos. H. Creely, of Oakland, and M. L. Rawson, of San Leandro, for appellants. Geo. E. De Golia, of Oakland, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. [1] This was an action to quiet title, and, as stated by appellant, the only question raised upon the trial was whether or not a certain deed executed on the 2d day of November, 1909, by Sarah Fragley to her husband, Martin Fragley, operated as a valid transfer and whether it was delivered or not. The trial court found that said deed was prepared by an attorney employed by the grantee, "and on November 2, 1909, at the said home of Fragley and his wife, and in the presence of John C. Quinlan, Charles A. King, one of the executors named in the will, and Hamilton Bauer, a notary public and attorney at law, said Sarah executed said deed, acknowledged the same before said notary public, and then and there freely and voluntarily physically handed to, and delivered to, said Martin Fragley her said deed, so executed and acknowledged, conveying back to him said 'San Leandro property'; saying to him in substance, 'Here, papa, is the deed you want.' * * * That it was intended by said Sarah Fragley when she delivered to her said husband, Martin F. Fragley, on November 2, 1909, said deed of November 2, 1909, conveying back to said Martin said 'San Leandro property,' that said deed was to be an absolute conveyance by her to her said husband of said property, with the full knowledge and agreement on her part that such deed was to convey back to her husband said 'San Leandro property' to the end that said will was to remain unchanged, and she was to receive from her husband's estate, upon his death, property and money to the value of about $9,000, and no more. * * * That said deed of November 2, 1909, was on said day delivered by said Sarah to her said husband absolutely and unconditionally." The only question for us to determine is whether those findings are supported by the evidence, and of this, after reading the transcript, we can entertain no kind of doubt.

Hamilton A. Bauer, the notary public who took the acknowledgment of the grantor of said deed, testified: "She signed it right in front of me, in my presence. I never saw it before the time she signed that, but she executed that right in my presence. I asked her if she acknowledged that. She said, 'Yes.' I put my certificate on. I filled in the written part. I put the seal on, too. I had a pocket seal which I put on." Being asked whether or not there was any conversation at that time and place between Mr. and Mrs. Fragley, or between Mrs. Fragley and any of the parties, that this deed was to be operative as a will of Sarah Fragley, he replied: "I did not hear anything of that sort. As I recollect, Mr. Quinlan told him he had made out a will for him." He was asked the following question: "This deed, this paper, ever referred to as being a will, or to act or operate as a will? A. No, sir; I don't think there was anything of that sort. Q. State whether or not at that time and place there was any conversation or remark concerning this deed, so that it would have no force or effect if Mrs. Fragley outlived her husband? A. I did not hear anything of that sort; no, sir."

Mr. Charles A. King, a witness who was present at the time, testified as follows: "I think I was invited on the day before the execution of the deed by Mr. Quinlan, who was Mr. Fragley's attorney, to be at Mr. Fragley's home at 11 o'clock on the morning of November 2d, on this date of the execution of the deed. I was present at that time, and that deed was signed by Mrs. Fragley and acknowledged by Mr. Bauer on that morning. The deed was handed to Mr. Fragley at the request of Mr. Quinlan, who asked her to make delivery to Mr. Fragley of that deed. She did so. A general conversation was taking place, and Mrs. Fragley obtained the box, which was a wooden box but had the appearance of a tin box, in which he kept some insurance policies and other private papers, deeds, notes, and mortgages, and so forth. He dropped the deed into the box, and Mrs. Fragley removed it, I think, to their bedroom, in which it was generally kept in the closet there." Being asked the question, "At the time that Mrs. Fragley handed the deed to her husband, did she say anything to him?" he answered, "There might have been something said about 'Here is the paper, papa.' She generally called him 'papa.' Or, 'Here is the deed.' She did that at the request of Mr. Quinlan, as I remember distinctly. He wanted an absolute tender of the deed to Mr. Fragley. Q. You mean by 'tender' physical delivery? A. Yes, sir; physical delivery. The deed having been drawn, as I understood, for that purpose; the deed having been drawn and executed for that purpose."

John C. Quinlan, a witness for plaintiffs, testified as follows: "I prepared this deed at the request of both Mr. and Mrs. Fragley—Sarah Fragley and her husband, Martin F. Fragley. The request was made probably a week or so before I prepared this deed. Mr. Fragley asked Mrs. Fragley whether or not she would be willing to deed back to him the Fair Oaks street property and the San Leandro property. She said, 'Yes,' she would be willing to do anything that he wanted her to do. As far as she was concerned, she was quite willing to take what was given her in the will which had been already prepared and drawn and executed by Mr. Fragley. In the presence of Mrs. Fragley, Mr. Fragley asked her whether or not she would not deed back to him the Fair Oaks street property and the San Leandro property. She said, 'Yes, papa, I will do whatever you want to do. If you want it done that way, all right.' I said to Mrs. Fragley that she had been given certain legacies and bequests in the will. I had already read to her the will. She says that was all right; that was all she wanted. At the time of the execution of the deed I was present, Mrs. Fragley was present, Mr. King was present, and Mr. Hamilton Bauer was present; Mr. Fragley, also. I don't think there was any one else present. I went into the house, as had been arranged by Mr. and Mrs. Fragley the evening before. I went into the house with the notary, Mr. Bauer, on the morning of November 2d. Mr. Fragley was sitting in the front windows in an armchair. He had been sick for some time before that. He was sick at that time. He was sitting up, I think, with a blanket thrown around him. I introduced Mr. Bauer to him as the notary. I believe Mr. King was inside at the time. He shook hands with him. I told Mr. Fragley that we were all ready to have the papers signed up—referring to the deeds. Now Mrs. Fragley was present, I am quite sure, during that conversation, because she opened the door for me, I believe, when I was going in. She was in the parlor with me, with the rest of us, during that conversation. I then produced the deeds, and again I told Mrs. Fragley she was getting the Fair Oaks street property under the will, together with $3,000. She said, 'All right,' and signed this deed. As soon as the deed was signed by Mrs. Fragley, it was handed by Mrs. Fragley over to Mr. Fragley in my presence. I believe I requested Mrs. Fragley to deliver the deed to her husband. In fact, I am sure I did. Q. What did she say, if anything, when she handed it to him? A. She said, 'Here it is.' I believe that is the way she handed the deed over to her husband. 'Here it is, papa.' I think that is the way she said it. Q. At any time of the times you have spoken of, was there any objection of any kind or nature by Mrs. Fragley against the executing and delivery of that deed? A. No, sir; there was absolutely no protest whatever made by Mrs. Fragley. Everything was freely and voluntarily done, without any duress, fraud, menace, or undue influence by any person whatsoever. Q. Did you at any time prior to the execution of this deed explain to Mrs.

Fragley why the deed was drawn and should be executed? A. I believe I explained to Mrs. Fragley. I know I explained to Mr. Fragley, and I believe I explained to Mrs. Fragley that if she was satisfied with the Fair Oaks street property and the $3,000 given her in the will, that unless this deed was given back to Mr. Fragley, she could come in if she wanted to, or was so disposed, and secure her widow's share in addition to this property. Q. In order to make an adjustment of matters after the will had been prepared, you told her the reason why Mr. Fragley wanted this deed by which she conveyed back to him the San Leandro property? A. Exactly, in order to see that the provisions in the will, as Mr. Fragley wanted it, were carried out. In other words, he wanted Mrs. Fragley to get the Fair Oaks street property and $3,000. He did not want her to get any more. Q. That was explained by you to her or by him in your presence? A. Yes. Q. At the time the deed was signed and acknowledged and handed to Mr. Fragley, what was Mrs. Fragley's mental and physical condition, as you observed it? A. Mrs. Fragley's mental and physical condition was very well, as far as I could see. I had been at Mr. Fragley's house on several occasions in connection with his affairs, and on every occasion I met Mrs. Fragley there she was up and around and attending to Mr. Fragley, who was ill. Q. State whether or not Mrs. Fragley had any appearance at that time as to being ill herself; at the time the deed was executed, did she have any appearance of being ill at that time or not? A. No, sir; Mrs. Fragley was waiting on Mr. Fragley. Mr. Fragley was the one that was sick. Q. Now, state whether or not in any of the conversations held at the Fragley household on November 2, 1909, between Mr. Fragley or Mrs. Fragley and yourself, in which you were present, anything was said upon the subject-matter that this deed, plaintiff's Exhibit A, was intended by her to take the place of a will by her for the purpose of doing away with the necessity for probate proceedings after the death of Mrs. Fragley? A. There wasn't any expression of that idea at all. Q. State whether or not at any time on that day of November 2, 1909, or at any time before that time, any agreement or undertaking was had between Mrs. Fragley and her husband, any engagement or understanding was had between Mrs. Fragley and her husband, in your presence or with your knowledge, that the deed (plaintiff's Exhibit A) should not be recorded nor that it should not take effect until said Sarah Fragley should die before her said husband? A. There was no mention made of the fact that Mrs. Fragley was about to die. There was no mention made of the fact that Mr. Fragley was only to get this property in case of Mrs. Fragley's death. As I stated before everything that was being done so far as I had to do with it was in contemplation of Mr. Fragley's death, and not in contemplation of Mrs. Fragley's death. Q. State at any of those conversations on November 2d, or at any time prior thereto, whether there was any understanding or agreement on the part of any of the parties that, in the event of Mrs. Fragley surviving her said husband, said deed (plaintiff's Exhibit A) was to be of no force or effect or to be canceled or destroyed? A. There was no understanding whatever. That matter was not thought of at all. Q. This property went into the estate to equalize matters that they had agreed upon among themselves? A. Yes, sir." These questions, it may be said, were aimed at the theory of appellants.

There is much more evidence in the record to the same effect, but we deem it unnecessary to quote it. Giving full credit, as we must, to the foregoing testimony, the conclusion is irresistible that the deed was executed and delivered by the grantor to the grantee, absolutely and unconditionally, and that immediately upon its delivery all the interest of the grantor was vested in the grantee. It seems unnecessary to cite authorities as to the legal proposition involved, since the principle is so well established.

It is true there was evidence introduced by the defendant—principally the testimony of the grantor—that the delivery of said deed was conditional; that there was an understanding between the grantor and the grantee that the deed was not to take effect unless the grantor died before the death of the grantee; but this only created a conflict in the evidence. Besides, it must be said that the grantor was impeached by witnesses called in behalf of the executors.

[2] Some contention is made by appellants that, since the deed was placed in a box to which the grantor had access and which she retained in her possession, such reservation and possession of the deed was fatal to a valid delivery; but it is perfectly apparent that it is entirely immaterial what became of the deed after it was actually delivered to the grantee. The cases cited by appellants (Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 Pac. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186, Kenney v. Parks, 125 Cal. 150, 57 Pac. 772, and Moore v. Trott, 156 Cal. 353, 104 Pac. 578, 134 Am. St. Rep. 131), discuss an entirely different situation.

[3] In view of the well-established rule, it would be a singular position to take that, after a deed has been executed and unconditionally delivered, and thereby the title to the property vested in the grantee, if the grantor has the opportunity afterwards to get possession of the deed and destroy it, this circumstance would affect the title of the grantee. The fact is, of course, that, if the deed is executed voluntarily and freely and delivered to the grantee with the intention of vesting the title in him, no subsequent act of the grantor could affect the title thereby conveyed.

After an examination of the record, we are satisfied that the findings of the court and the conclusions drawn therefrom are abundantly supported, and that there is no merit whatever in the appeal.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

COOK v. TERRY et al. (Civ. 981.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 20, 1912.)

1. RECEIVERS (§ 47*)—APPOINTMENT—CONSTRUCTION OF ORDER—"RECEIVER."

Though the mandatory words of an order directing the delivery of possession of property to a person "as receiver" pending an action were addressed to another than the "receiver," they necessarily carried with them an authorization to the person designated as "receiver" to take possession as such, and the order is sufficient as an appointment, since a receiver is a person authorized to take possession of property in litigation for the purpose of preserving it for whichever of the litigants the court may finally determine is entitled thereto.

2. RECEIVERS (§ 212*)—BOND FOR APPOINTMENT—DAMAGES—ATTORNEY'S FEES—NECESSITY OF PAYMENT.

In an action on a bond given for the appointment of a receiver, the plaintiff could not recover attorney's fees where such fees had not been paid up to the time of the trial, but only a note given therefor.

3. RECEIVERS (§ 212*)—ACTION ON BOND FOR APPOINTMENT—DAMAGES—ATTORNEY'S FEES—ASSESSMENT ON RETRIAL.

Under Civ. Code, § 3283, which provides that damages may be awarded in a judicial proceeding for detriment resulting after the commencement thereof, or certain to result in the future, proof of attorney's fees paid in an action in which the appointment of a receiver was sought may be shown upon a retrial of an action on the bond given for the appointment, though they had not accrued at the time of the first trial because not paid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; John E. Richards, Judge.

Action by Fred R. Cook against S. W. Terry and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

HALL, J. This is an appeal from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

The action was brought upon a bond given by defendant Terry as principal, and the corporation defendant as surety, in accordance with the requirements of section 566, Code of Civil Procedure, for the purpose of procuring the making of an order appointing a receiver by the superior court of Santa Clara county, in an action then pending in said court wherein said Terry was plaintiff and said Cook was defendant. The bond was in the usual form, and was in the penal sum of $1,000, and conditioned as required by said section.

In support of the allegations of the complaint that the court made an order appointing one W. T. McDonald receiver in the said action, and directed and authorized him to take charge of the personal property described in the complaint, plaintiff upon the trial "offered in evidence from the records in the case of Terry v. Cook the original of what purported to be an order appointing the receiver in said action." Omitting the title of the court and action, said order is as follows: "It appearing to the satisfaction of the court that Fred R. Cook has in his possession and control the following described property [here follows the description of certain personal property], which is the subject of litigation in this action and which is held by him, on motion of R. F. Robertson, Esq., the attorney for the plaintiff, it is hereby ordered that said Fred R. Cook deliver possession of the said property to W. T. McDonald, as receiver, pending this action and subject to further direction of the court." This order bore date March 25, 1910, the date of the bond sued on, and was signed by the judge of the court.

Defendants lodged an objection to the introduction of this order upon the ground that it was not an order appointing a receiver. The court sustained the objection, and the instrument was not admitted in evidence; and, as it was the only order ever made appointing or attempting to appoint a receiver, the court was obliged to find against plaintiff upon his allegation as to the appointment of a receiver, and gave judgment for the defendant.

The ruling of the court above set forth presents the vital question upon which this appeal hinges. If no order was ever made appointing a receiver, there was no consideration for the bond sued on, and no recovery could be had thereon.

[1] The determination of the effect of the order in question is not without difficulty. It certainly is most informal as an order of appointment, and not at all in conformity with such orders as usually made. It does not in direct language appoint a receiver, and yet it is clear from the language used by the court in the order that the court intended that McDonald should accept and take possession of the property in litigation, and hold the same pending the determination of the action, subject to the order of the court. Such are the particular functions and duties of a receiver. A receiver is a person authorized to take possession of property in litigation for the purpose of preserving it for whichever of the litigants the court may finally determine is entitled thereto. The order in question, though very informally worded and not at all to be commended as a model for future orders, in substance and effect gave authority to McDonald to take possession of the property and hold it pending the action. While the mandatory words of the order were directed to Cook, the defendant in the action, and directed him to deliver the property described to McDonald, as receiver, the same words necessarily carried with them an authorization to McDonald to take possession thereof as receiver, and to hold possession subject to the future order of the court. He was thus constituted a receiver, and, as the record shows, subsequently and before entering upon his duties gave a bond as such. We must look to the substance and effect of the order rather than to its mere form.

That our conclusion, as to the proper construction of the order in question, is correct is supported, we think, by the following authorities: Gibbes v. Greenville & Columbia R. R. Co., 15 S. C. 304; Lyons-Thomas Co. v. Perry Co., 88 Tex. 468, 27 S. W. 100; Kimbrough v. Orr Shoe Co., 98 Ga. 537, 25 S. E. 576, and Fulton v. Davidson, 3 Heisk. (50 Tenn.) 614.

In none of the cases above cited was the action upon the bond given for the appointment, but in each of them the rights of the litigants depended upon the sufficiency of the order as an order for the appointment of a receiver. In none of said cases was the person in terms appointed as a receiver; but in each case he was held to be such because of the authority given him and the duty imposed by the order. Indeed, in Lyons-Thomas Co. v. Perry Co., supra, the judge in vacation refused to appoint a receiver, but apparently by consent made an order authorizing a person, to whom a conveyance in trust had been made, which was attacked in the proceeding, to execute the trust under the direction and control of the court. The judge had no jurisdiction in vacation to appoint a trustee, but did have power to appoint a receiver. The court found no difficulty in upholding the order as one appointing a receiver.

The order offered in this case was in substance sufficient as an appointment of a receiver, and the court erred in sustaining the objection thereto, and for this reason the order should be reversed.

[2] Plaintiff sought to recover damages for interruption to his business, and also on account of fees paid to an attorney for procuring a dissolution of the order appointing the receiver. The evidence showed that, although he had given a note for the attorney fees, he had not up to the time of the trial paid anything thereon. Attorney's fees cannot be recovered in such an action as this unless they be actually paid. Willson v. McEvoy, 25 Cal. 170; Prader v. Grimm, 28 Cal. 12; Lott v. Mitchell, 32 Cal. 24.

[3] Upon a retrial it is possible that this defect in proof of damages may be met, for "damages may be awarded in a judicial proceeding for detriment resulting after the commencement thereof, or certain to result in the future." Civ. Code, § 3283; McLennan v. Ohmen, 75 Cal. 558, 17 Pac. 687; Hicks v. Herring, 17 Cal. 566.

The order is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

RECORDS (§ 15*)—ACCESS TO RECORDS OR FILES.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1892, providing that every citizen may inspect a copy of any public writing except as otherwise expressly provided, and section 1894 providing that public writings comprise official documents and public records of private writings, a board of education may be compelled by mandamus to permit a citizen to inspect and copy its census reports, though the purpose of such inspection is to use the information obtained in canvassing for the sale of books to school children, such right, if sought to be exercised for no unlawful or scandalous purpose, but in aid of a lawful, though private, business, may not be denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Petition by C. D. Harrison for a writ of mandate against J. E. Powers and others, constituting the Board of Education of the City and County of San Francisco. From a judgment overruling a demurrer to the petition and directing that the writ issue, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Percy V. Long and John F. English, both of San Francisco, for appellants. P. L. Benjamin, of Oakland, for respondent.

HALL, J. Plaintiff, a citizen of this state, filed a petition in the superior court praying for a writ of mandate to compel the defendants to permit him to inspect and make a copy of the census reports of school children in the official custody of defendants, and which privilege or right the defendants had denied to plaintiff.

Defendants demurred to plaintiff's petition, and at the same time filed an answer, affirmatively setting up substantially that plaintiff's only purpose in seeking to inspect and copy such reports was that he might use the information thus obtained in canvassing for the sale to school children of certain books in which he was interested. The court overruled defendants' demurrer, and sustained plaintiff's demurrer to defendants' answer, and gave judgment that the writ issue as prayed for. From this judgment defendants appealed to this court.

Section 1892 of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state provides that "every citizen has a right to inspect and take a copy of any public writing of this state except as otherwise expressly provided by statute." Section 1894 of the same Code provides that "public writings are divided into four classes: (1) Laws; (2) judicial records; (3) other official documents; (4) public records, kept in this state, of private writings."

It is not contended by appellant that the census reports in question are not official documents. It is conceded that they are. It is not contended that they are such documents or public writings as are by any statute of this state expressly or at all exempted from the general language of section 1892, Code of Civil Procedure, above quoted. It is, however, contended by appellants that plaintiff may not enforce, by the writ of mandate, the right given him by the express language of the statute, because his purpose is to use the information he may obtain from the exercise of such right in his private business. The decisions of the courts of last resort in this country are to the contrary. That is to say, where the statute expressly confers the right upon the citizen to inspect or to copy a public record, and he seeks to exercise such right for no unlawful or scandalous purpose, but in aid of a lawful though private business, the statutory right may not be denied him by the officer having the custody of the public record, and, if denied by the officer, will be enforced by the appropriate action of the court. To this effect may be cited the following authorities: Burton v. Tuite, 78 Mich. 363, 44 N. W. 282, 7 L. R. A. 73; Hanson v. Elchstaedt, 69 Wis. 538, 35 N. W. 30; West Jersey Title & Guaranty Co. v. Barber, 49 N. J. Eq. 480, 24 Atl. 381; Nash v. Lathrop, 142 Mass. 29, 6 N. E. 559; State v. McMillan, 49 Fla. 243, 38 South. 666, 6 Ann. Cas. 537; People ex rel. German American L. & T. Co. v. Richards, 99 N. Y. 623, 1 N. E. 258; Kalamazoo Gazette Co. v. Kalamazoo County Clerk, 148 Mich. 460, 111 N. W. 1070; State v. Ellsworth, 61 Neb. 444, 85 N. W. 439; State v. Rachar, 37 Minn. 372, 35 N. W. 7; State v. Long, 37 W. Va. 266, 16 S. E. 578; and Boyd v. Burke, 55 U. S. (14 How.) 575, 14 L. Ed. 548.

In several of the cases above cited the action was by title insurance companies, where the information sought and the abstracts from the records were for the use of the plaintiff in aid of its general business. The case at bar comes clearly within the rule sustained by the above authorities.

In the case of Colnon v. Orr, 71 Cal. 43, 11

Pac. 814, cited by appellant, it was decided that the document involved was not a public record. What was there said about the want of a beneficial interest in the petitioner has no application to a case, such as is the case at bar, where the right is sought in aid of the lawful business of the applicant. In none of the other cases cited by appellant (Buck v. Collins, 51 Ga. 391, 21 Am. Rep. 236; Land Title Warranty Co. v. Tanner, 99 Ga. 470, 27 S. E. 727; Cormack v. Wolcott, 37 Kan. 391, 15 Pac. 245; and Bean v. People, 7 Colo. 200, 2 Pac. 909) was the privilege sought to be enforced expressly or at all given by the statute. In each case the petitioner was seeking something more than was given him by the statute, and such cases are not in point.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

MACMULLAN v. KELLY, Treasurer of County of Alameda. (Civ. 936.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Sept. 19, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 854*)—TRUSTS (§ 365*)—REVIEW—DEMURRER—REASONS FOR DECISION.

An order general in terms, sustaining a demurrer to a complaint specifying several grounds, must be affirmed where the demurrer is well taken on any of the grounds assigned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3403, 3404, 3408-3430; Dec. Dig. § 854;* Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 568-573; Dec. Dig. § 365.*]

2. MANDAMUS (§ 143*)—LACHES.

The rule that a party seeking relief by mandamus must avail himself of the writ promptly, and that where, by lapse of time, evidence is lost or third parties acquire rights growing out of the existing state of affairs, the relief will be denied, must be considered in its entirety, and a delay of several years in instituting mandamus to compel the treasurer of a county to refund taxes on unsecured personal property does not justify denial of relief on the ground of laches.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 282-285; Dec. Dig. § 143.*]

3. TRUSTS (§ 365*)—ENFORCEMENT—LACHES.

Mere lapse of time and delay are matters of minor importance in the doctrine of laches as applied in an action for the enforcement of an express trust except, where it appears that the cestui que trust has, in addition to the lapse of time, indicated an intention to waive the trust, or, while not waiving it, has by his neglect placed the trustee or persons dealing with him in a position so unfavorable as to render an enforcement of the trust inequitable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 568-573; Dec. Dig. § 365.*]

4. PLEADING (§ 193*)—LACHES—MANNER OF RAISING DEFENSE—DEMURRER.

The defense of laches may be interposed generally by demurrer, where the complaint shows laches on the part of the plaintiff sufficient to justify refusal of relief sought, and, in the absence of such a showing, the defense may be made by answer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 428-443; Dec. Dig. § 193.*]

5. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 103*)—EXPRESS TRUSTS—ENFORCEMENT—LIMITATIONS—LACHES.

The statute of limitations and the doctrine of laches operate against the enforcement of an express trust only from the time the trustee assumes a position of hostility to the trust, and a claim of laches founded solely on any lapse of time cannot be sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 506-510; Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

6. TAXATION (§ 535*)—PERSONAL PROPERTY TAX—REFUNDING.

Right to refundment of money collected as excess taxes on unsecured personalty is not dependent on the act of the auditor in actually entering in the assessment books the notations required by Pol. Code, §§ 3827, 3828, as they are not intended for the information of the county treasurer in receiving and refunding excess taxes, but are prescribed primarily as a matter of bookkeeping, and secondarily for the information and protection of the taxpayer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 991-995; Dec. Dig. § 535.*]

7. TAXATION (§ 535*)—REFUNDING OF TAXES—NECESSITY OF WARRANT.

Pol. Code, § 4101, subds. 7, 8, prohibiting county treasurers from distributing moneys in the county treasury except on county warrants issued by the auditor, is limited to county moneys, and an auditor's warrant is not a prerequisite to a refunding of money collected as excess taxes on unsecured personalty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 991-995; Dec. Dig. § 535.*]

On petition for rehearing. Denied.

For former opinion, see 124 Pac. 93.

Brewton A. Hayne, of San Francisco, for appellant. Wm. H. Donohue, of Pleasanton, and W. H. L. Hynes, of Oakland, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. In this proceeding the petitioner sought by mandamus to compel the respondent, in his official capacity as treasurer of the county of Alameda, to pay to the petitioner upon assigned claims several amounts of money totaling the sum of $42.09, which it was alleged had been by petitioner's assignors paid to the then assessor of Alameda county as taxes on unsecured personal property for the fiscal year 1902-03. The petition alleges that the several sums sued for and paid as taxes for that year were collected by the assessor in accordance with the provisions of chapter 8 of the Political Code, upon the basis of the rate of taxation fixed for the preceding year, and that in each instance the several sums so paid were in excess of the amounts which subsequently actually became due for such taxes, based upon the rate of taxation which was finally fixed by the proper authorities for that year. The petition further alleges that the several sums sued for were by the assessor paid into the county treasury of Alameda county, where they now remain in charge of and in the possession of the respondent as treasurer of said county.

The petition for a writ of mandate was not filed in the superior court of Alameda county until February 7, 1910; and it affirmatively appears from the allegations thereof that no demand for the return of the money paid as taxes in excess of the amount required by the rate of taxation for the fiscal year 1902-03 was made upon the treasurer of Alameda county until January 19, 1910.

Respondent interposed a demurrer to the petition for a writ of mandate, which, among other grounds thereof, specified (1) that the petition did not state facts sufficient to entitle the petitioner to the relief prayed for; (2) that the petition was uncertain, in this: that it was not alleged therein that the auditor of Alameda county, as required by the provisions of section 3828 of the Political Code, had entered on his books the alleged excess of taxes sued for and which it was alleged had been paid into the county treasury; that it was not alleged in the petition that the books of the county auditor showed that any excess tax was due to the petitioner; and (3) that the proceeding was barred by the provisions of section 338 (subdivision 1) and section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The demurrer was sustained with leave to amend. Petitioner declined to amend, and judgment was rendered and entered accordingly for the respondent, from which the petitioner has appealed upon the judgment roll.

[1] Upon the first hearing of this case in this court, the question as to whether or not the proceeding was barred by the statute of limitations was the only one considered and determined. The demurrer, however, as has been noted, was based upon several grounds other than the statute of limitations. The order of the lower court sustaining the demurrer was general in its terms; and even if it be assumed, as counsel for the petitioner assert, that the trial court erroneously based its ruling solely upon the ground that the proceeding was barred by the statute of limitations, the judgment must nevertheless be affirmed if it can be ascertained, as is contended by respondent, that the demurrer was well taken upon any of the grounds assigned therefor. People v. Central Pac. Co., 76 Cal. 29, 18 Pac. 90; Schrist v. Rialto Irrigation District, 129 Cal. 640, 62 Pac. 261.

We were in error, therefore, in assuming that the correctness of the trial court's ruling upon the question of the statute of limitations was the only point to be considered and decided upon this appeal. Aside from these considerations, we were prompted to grant a rehearing because of the earnest insistence of counsel for the respondent that, if further argument of the case could be had, it would be shown beyond the peradventure of a doubt, not only that we were in error in holding that the transaction pleaded by petitioner constituted an express continuing trust, but that the petition was essentially defective in not alleging that the auditor of Alameda county had performed his duty in the premises.

Upon the subject of an express trust, no argument was advanced and no authorities were presented at the rehearing of the case which were in any wise different from the argument and authorities originally urged and cited. The reargument of the case has confirmed rather than shaken us in our first conclusion that the fund of excess taxes which may be accumulated in a county treasury by virtue of the provisions of the several sections of the Political Code relating to the collection and payment of unsecured personal property taxes constitutes an express continuing trust, against which the statute of limitations does not commence to run until the trust, with the knowledge or upon the demand of the taxpayer, has been repudiated.

In so far, therefore, as the statute of limitations is concerned, we hold to the opinion first expressed, which, in its pertinent parts, is as follows:

"It is the duty of county assessors to collect taxes on all personal property at the time the assessment is made or at any time before the first Monday of the following month of August, when, in the opinion of the assessor, such taxes will not be sufficiently secured by a lien upon the real property of the taxpayer. The amount of personal property taxes which must be so collected depends upon and must be governed by the rate of taxation on personal property fixed for the previous year in the state and county and the several districts in which the personal property is taxable (Pol. Code, §§ 3820, 3821, 3823); and 'When the rate is fixed for the year in which such collection is made then, if a sum in excess of the rate has been collected, such excess shall not be apportioned to the state, but the whole thereof shall remain in the county treasury, and must be repaid by the county treasurer to the person from whom the collection was made, or to his assignee, on demand therefor.' Pol. Code, § 3824. It is the duty of the county auditor to note on the assessment book, opposite the name of each taxpayer, the amount collected for taxes, and, when the rate of taxation for the year has been fixed, he must enter opposite the name of each taxpayer the amount of the excess or deficiency, if any, in the tax as collected by the assessor. Pol. Code, §§ 3827, 3828.

"It is the contention of petitioner that the fund of excess taxes which may be accumulated in the county treasury, in accordance with the sections of the Political Code here-in quoted and referred to, constitutes a continuing trust fund, against which the statute does not commence to run until there has been a demand by the owner for the return of the money, and refusal by the treasurer to pay the same. We are of the opinion that this contention is well founded, and that the lower court erred in sustaining the respondent's demurrer upon the ground that the cause of action stated in the petition was barred by the statute of limitations. The purpose and effect of section 3824 of the Political Code, under which county assessors are empowered to collect taxes on personal property in advance of the actual fixing of the rate of taxation for the fiscal year in which such taxes are collectible, have been distinctly defined by our Supreme Court in the case of Corbett v. Widber, 123 Cal. 154 [55 Pac. 764]. It was there said, in effect, that the moneys paid into the county treasury in excess of the rate finally fixed did not belong to the county, but in the aggregate constitute a trust fund of which the county is the custodian, and the treasurer but a bailee who holds the moneys so paid subject to the demands of the rightful owners. Subject to the provisions of section 852 of the Civil Code, an express trust is created 'as to the trustor and beneficiary by any words or acts of the trustor indicating with reasonable certainty (1) an intention on the part of the trustor to create a trust; and (2) the subject, purpose and beneficiary of the trust * * * and as to the trustee, by any acts or words of his indicating with reasonable certainty (1) his acceptance of the trust, or his acknowledgment, made upon a sufficient consideration, of its existence; and (2) the subject, purpose and beneficiary of the trust.' C. C. §§ 2221, 2222. The legislative intent to create a trust, as well as the subject-matter, purpose, and beneficiary of the trust, are clearly indicated by the terms of the several sections of the Political Code relating to the collection of personal property taxes; and a trust created thereby is undoubtedly an express trust, which continues in existence until the individual amounts which go to make up the accumulated trust fund of excess taxes are called for by the taxpayers or their assigns. Miller & Lux v. Batz, 142 Cal. 447 [76 Pac. 42]; McGuire v. Inhabitants of Linneus, 74 Me. 344.

"It is a rule of law in this and other jurisdictions that the statute of limitations does not begin to run in favor of a defendant chargeable as the trustee of an express trust during the life of the trust. In order to set the statute in motion, it is necessary that such a trustee, by some act or declaration, positively and unequivocally repudiate the trust, and that notice of such repudiation be brought home to the beneficiary. This rule is so well settled and so generally recognized that no argument is necessary to support its reiteration here. There is no conflict of authority upon the subject, and of the many cases which have arisen in this jurisdiction where the rule has been declared and applied the following may be cited: Baker v. Joseph, 16 Cal. 173; Ord v. De La Guerra, 18 Cal. 67; Schroeder v. Jahns, 27 Cal. 274; Miles v. Thorne, 38 Cal. 335, 99 Am. Dec. 384; Hearst v. Pujol, 44 Cal. 230; Janex v. Throckmorton, 57 Cal. 368; Zuck v. Culp, 59 Cal. 142; McClure v. Colyear, 80 Cal. 378, 22 Pac. 175; Roach v. Caraffa, 85 Cal. 436 [25 Pac. 22]; Fox v. Tay, 89 Cal. 339 [24 Pac. 855, 26 Pac. 897, 23 Am. St. Rep. 474]; Luco v. De Toro, 91 Cal. 405 [18 Pac. 866, 27 Pac. 1082]. Section 3824 of the Political Code clearly contemplates that each successive county treasurer shall account for the fund of excess taxes which may be accumulated in the county treasury, and reported as a continuing fund, which is subject to depletion solely by the demands of the owners thereof; and as the transaction pleaded by the petitioner in the present case constituted an express trust, which was not repudiated by respondent until demand was made upon him by petitioner for performance of the trust, the statute of limitations commenced to run only from the date of the demand. Miller & Lux v. Batz, 142 Cal. 447 [76 Pac. 42]."

Our opinion in the first instance upon the trust phase of the case was founded largely upon a consideration of the two California cases of Corbett v. Widber, supra, and Miller & Lux v. Batz, supra. A further consideration of those cases confirms and compels, we think, the conclusion that the plaintiff's complaint states a cause of action for the enforcement of an express continuing trust, against which the statute of limitations commences to run only from the alleged repudiation thereof.

The case of Corbett v. Widber, like the present case, was a proceeding in mandamus to compel the county treasurer to refund a certain sum of money collected as excess taxes upon unsecured personal property. There, as here, the assessor was directed and empowered by law to collect unsecured personal property taxes in advance upon the basis of the tax rate previously established for the preceding year. Then, as now, it was the law that in the event that the taxes so collected for the current year should exceed the amount of taxes finally determined to be due the excess "must be repaid by the county treasurer to the person from whom the collection is made or to his assignee on demand therefor." Pol. Code, §§ 3820, 3824. And the Supreme Court, in construing the transaction and the statute out of which it arose, decided that "the excess moneys so received by the treasurer are no part of the moneys of the * * * county; and, if the aggregate of them be denominated a fund, it is in no sense a public fund of the * * * county. It is a trust fund in the custody of the city and under the immediate charge of its treasurer. The treasurer is but a bailee, holding the moneys subject to the demands of the rightful owners."

Although the character of the trust, whether express or implied, was not questioned nor definitely declared in the case of Corbett v. Widber, supra, the reasoning of the case as a whole lends color to the conclusion that the trust created by the several Code sections under consideration constitutes an express, continuing trust. However that may be, all doubt as to the nature of such trust is removed, it seems to us, upon a reading of the case of Miller & Lux v. Batz, supra, wherein the petitioner, as the assignee of an original purchaser of swamp lands sought to compel a county treasurer to prorate and distribute a certain sum of money which had been paid into the county treasury by the petitioner's predecessors and assignors on account of the purchase of swamp lands under the provisions of a statute, which in effect required the county treasurer to receive and retain all moneys arising from the sale of swamp and overflowed lands, and divide the balance thereof remaining, after deducting all amounts chargeable against the district in which such lands were sold, pro rata among the original purchasers or their assignors "on demand." In that case the principal questions discussed and decided, as in the case at bar, involved the creation of a trust, either express or implied, and the applicability of the statute of limitations; and the Supreme Court there decided that the county treasurer held the money in controversy as the trustee of an express trust, against which the statute of limitations did not begin to run until the demand provided by statute was made, or until the trust was otherwise repudiated.

The case of McGuire v. Inhabitants of Linneus, supra, which was cited and relied upon in part to support the rule announced in Miller & Lux v. Batz, supra, is strongly in point here, and deserves more than a mere mention. In that case the plaintiff sought to recover a soldier's share of a surplus sum created by statute which, in certain contingencies, was to be shared pro rata by soldiers who had without previous bounty served upon the defendant's quota. There the court held that the Legislature by statute "created a trust in the surplus money received by the towns, and the towns by force of the statute and their vote of appropriation were constituted trustees, to hold the money for the soldiers until called for by them. * * * The subject-matter and purposes of the trust, as well as the persons to take the beneficial interest therein, are clearly ascertained. Although the cestuis que trust are not specifically named they are so described that they can be ascertained, and the list furnished by the town to the equalization commissioners must contain their names. The relation of trustee and cestui que trust being shown to have subsisted between these two parties, the possession of the money by the town was not adverse to that of its cestuis que trust until a repudiation of the trust * * * evidenced by an intention to hold it adversely. * * * The only evidence of such intention is the refusal to perform the demand. * * * Assuming this is a sufficient disavowal of the trust, the statute would begin to run from that date."

The case of Zuck v. Culp, 59 Cal. 142, is in principle very much akin to the case at bar. In that case it was held that, where money had been deposited to be kept until demanded, "the transaction constituted an express trust, and the statute of limitations does not commence to run until demand."

We are unable to perceive how the case at bar in its essential features of law and fact can be exempted from the rule declared and followed in the cases herein cited; and therefore the reasoning of those cases should and must control the decision here in so far as the questions of the creation and character of the trust and the application of the statute of limitations are concerned.

[2] In arriving at the conclusion stated in our original opinion and reiterated here, we were not unmindful of the several cases cited by the respondent in support of his contention that, if plaintiff's cause of action was not barred by any statute of limitations, it should at least in a proceeding for mandamus be declared stale, because of petitioner's laches in not making a demand for the return of the money within a reasonable time after the right to make a demand had accrued.

The rule in this behalf, as we understand it and as we believe it to be declared in the several authorities cited and relied upon by the respondent, is summoned up and succinctly stated in section 87 of Merrill on Mandamus as follows: "The courts require those who would avail themselves of the assistance of this writ to be prompt in the enforcement of their rights. By the lapse of time the necessary evidence is lost, and third parties may acquire rights growing out of the existing state of affairs. Where the parties have been guilty of unreasonable delay in applying for the writ, the courts have not hesitated to refuse such relief, unless the delay was accounted for to their satisfaction. In determining what will constitute unreasonable delay regard should be had to the circumstances that justified the delay, to the nature of the case and the relief demanded, and to the question whether the rights of the defendant or of other persons have been prejudiced by such delay."

This rule, however, cannot be applied to the pleaded facts of the present case without straining to the point of breaking the reason and spirit of the rule. True it does not appear from the petition for the writ in the present case that there was any good reason why the plaintiff or his assignors should have delayed for several years before making demand for that which was rightfully due; but the necessity for the application of the rule under discussion should not be determined solely upon the mere presence or absence of a single requirement of the rule. On the contrary, the rule, in conformity with the spirit and purpose of its creation, should be applied in its entirety; and the necessity of its application should be determined from a consideration of the nature and circumstances of the particular case in which the rule is invoked. Perry on Trusts (6th Ed.) 230; Bryan v. Kales, 134 U. S. 126, 10 Sup. Ct. 435, 33 L. Ed. 829; Platt v. Platt, 58 N. Y. 646; Anderson v. Northorp, 30 Fla. 612, 637, 12 South. 318.

[3] In applying the doctrine of laches, not only the lapse of time, but the conduct of the parties to the transaction, must be considered. Mere lapse of time and delay are matters of minor importance in the consideration of the doctrine of laches as applied to an action for the enforcement of an express trust, save in those cases where it appears that the cestui que trust has, in addition to the lapse of time and delay, indicated an intention to waive the trust, or, while not waiving the trust, has by his neglect placed the trustee or other persons dealing with the trustee in a position so unfavorable and unreasonable as to render an enforcement of the trust unjust and inequitable. 2 Beach on Trusts, etc., § 671, p. 1541; Rochefoucauld v. Boustead, 1 Law Rep. Chan. Div. (1897) p. 196; Dusenbery v. Bidwell, 86 Kan. 666, 121 Pac. 1098; Platt v. Platt, 58 N. Y. 646.

[4] Generally the defense of laches may be interposed by demurrer where the complaint in any given case shows laches upon the part of the plaintiff sufficient to justify a refusal of the relief sought, and, in the absence of such a showing, the defense may be made by answer when the facts of the case warrant such a defense. Bryan v. Kales, supra. In the present case, however, it does not appear upon the face of the petition, nor is it thus far claimed by the respondent, that the situation of the parties with reference to the fund in suit has been materially changed by the delay in making demand for the performance of the trust, or that such delay has resulted in the loss of material evidence or adversely affected the rights of innocent third parties. If the money in suit was paid into the county treasury, as alleged in the petition, presumably it is still there, and, being there, it must under the law be held by the county treasurer for the taxpayers until demand therefor has been made. Corbett v. Widber, supra. Obviously the petitioner and his assignors were, upon the facts presented by the petition, the only persons who could possibly be injured by not making the statutory demand within a reasonable time after the right thereto accrued.

[5] In brief and in conclusion of this phase of the case, it is our opinion that the statute of limitations and the equitable doctrine of laches operate against the enforcement of an express trust only from the time that the trustee unequivocally assumes a position of hostility to the trust; and that a claim of laches, founded solely upon a mere lapse of time which in itself is not declared by statute to be a bar, and which is unaccompanied by other considerations which would render the enforcement of the trust inequitable, cannot be sustained. Rochefoucauld v. Boustead, supra; Dyer v. Waters, 46 N. J. Eq. 484, 19 Atl. 129; Cooney v. Glynn, 157 Cal. 583, 108 Pac. 506; Zuck v. Culp, 59 Cal. 142; Schroeder v. Jahns, 27 Cal. 274; Roach v. Caraffa, 85 Cal. 436, 25 Pac. 22; Anderson v. Northorp, supra; Perry on Trusts (6th Ed.) § 228; Wood on Limitations, § 200, p. 461.

[6] We do not think, as was strenuously contended by counsel for the respondent upon the rehearing of the case, that it was essential to the certainty of the petition or necessary to petitioner's cause of action to allege the fact that the auditor of the county of Alameda had actually entered in the "assessment books" the notations required by sections 3827 and 3828 of the Political Code. Nowhere in the several sections of the Political Code relating to the collection and payment of unsecured personal property taxes is there to be found any provision which makes the auditor's entry in the "assessment book" a prerequisite to the repayment of any excess tax which may be found to be due to a taxpayer. Although the Code provides that the "assessment book" shall from time to time and for various purposes be placed in the custody of different county officers (Pol. Code, §§ 3654, 3682, 3732, 3759), it nowhere provides that the county treasurer shall at any time have the custody of the assessment book, or that he shall be required to make reference thereto for the transaction of the business of his office. On the contrary, the county treasurer, independently of anything that may be contained in the assessment book, is required by section 4101 of the Political Code to receive all moneys by law directed to be paid to him, to apply and pay the same as required by law, and to so keep his books that the amount received by him and paid out on account of separate funds shall be exhibited in separate and distinct accounts. By the provisions of section 4102 of the Political Code, the county treasurer is not permitted to receive any money into the county treasury, unless accompanied by the certificate of the auditor provided for by section 4093 of the same Code. Upon the information thus certified to him, the treasurer accounts separately for and segregates into into their proper funds all moneys which by law have been paid into the county treasury. Meyer v. Widber, 126 Cal. 252, 58 Pac. 532. It would thus appear that the requirements of sections 3827 and 3828 of the Political

Code were not intended for the information and guidance of the county treasurer in receiving and refunding excess taxes, but were prescribed primarily as a matter of book-keeping, and secondarily for the information and protection of the taxpayer.

[7] There is no merit in the further contention that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action because it was not alleged therein that the petitioner's demand for the return of the money in question had been previously approved by the auditor. It is true that subdivisions 7 and 8 of section 4101 of the Political Code prohibit county treasurers from distributing moneys in the county treasury except upon county warrants issued by the auditor. This prohibition, however, by the very terms of the section, is expressly limited to county moneys; and, as the particular fund in suit here constitutes no part of the public moneys, it cannot be held that the auditor's warrant is a prerequisite to a refunding of the same. Corbett v. Widber, supra; Trower v. City and County, 157 Cal. 762, 109 Pac. 617.

This opinion, as we read and understand the briefs of counsel, disposes of every point made in support of the demurrer.

For the reasons stated we are still of the opinion that the lower court erred in its ruling sustaining respondent's demurrer to the petition for a writ of mandate, and it is therefore ordered that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer and require the defendant to answer.

(Civ. 1,132.)

1. OFFICERS (§ 100*)—COUNTY OFFICERS—COMPENSATION—INCREASE—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

When a county recorder of Imperial county was elected, that county was a county of the thirty-sixth class, and by Pol. Code, § 4265, his salary was fixed at $3,000 a year. In 1909 that county was transferred to class 36½, and by Pol. Code, § 4265a, the salary of the county recorder was fixed at $2,000 a year, with the provision that the recorder might employ as many copyists as might be required, who should be paid by the county. Held that, since it did not appear by the terms of that section that an increase in salary would not be effected, it would be presumed that an increase would result, and under Const. art. 11, § 9, providing that the compensation of county officers shall not be increased during their term of office, the change in salary was not effective until the expiration of the term of office of such county recorder.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Petition by G. Williams against W. D. Garey as County Auditor of the County of Imperial for a writ of mandate. From a judgment directing the issuance of a peremptory writ, defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Phil D. Swing, of El Centro, for appellant. Shaw, Ross & Dyke, of El Centro, and J. Stewart Ross, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. [1] Prior to the year 1909, the county of Imperial was classified by the Legislature as a county of the thirty-sixth class. By section 4265 of the Political Code, the salaries of the various county officers for such counties were then fixed. The introductory portion of the section referred to reads as follows: "In counties of the thirty-sixth class, the county officers shall receive as compensation for the services required of them by law, or by virtue of their office, the following salaries." By subdivision 3 of said section it was provided that the county recorder should receive the sum of $3,000 per annum. While this state of the law existed, John B. Baker was elected as recorder of Imperial county, and he in due time qualified and continued to act as such recorder until the 2d day of January, 1911; that being the date of the expiration of his term of office. The Legislature of the year 1909 amended the statute relating to the classification of counties and provided for a new class to be known as class 36½, which should include all counties having a population of 10,000 and under 10,500. At the same time, and by a separate act, the population of the various counties of the state was ascertained and fixed; Imperial county being accredited with a population of 10,250. In order to provide for compensation to be paid to officers of counties of class 36½, a new section was added to the Political Code, numbered 4265a, by act approved March 25, 1909. By this latter legislation changes were made in the amount of compensation theretofore paid to officers of counties of the thirty-sixth class, to which Imperial had belonged, and among the changes so made was one reducing the salary to be paid to the county recorder from $3,000 to $2,000 per annum; but it was added that "the recorder may employ as many copyists as may be required, who shall receive as compensation the sum of five cents per folio for recording any instrument or notice except maps or plats, and for copies of any records or papers five cents per folio." The recorder, acting under the authority assumed to be given by the new section of the Political Code, employed the petitioner as a copyist, and petitioner rendered services as such from the 24th day of May, 1909, until the end of December, 1910, for which he claimed to be entitled to payment in the sum of $1,303.70, of which $532.22 was paid, leaving a balance due and claimed in his favor of $771.48. The county auditor refused to issue warrants to petitioner for the balance claimed to be due, and he brought this proceeding for a writ to compel the issuance of such warrants. A demurrer was interposed to his petition in which it was assigned as ground therefor that the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action or entitle petitioner to the relief prayed for, and particularly that payment of the moneys demanded to petitioner would be in violation of section 9 of article 11 of the Constitution of the state of California. The demurrer was overruled, and, defendant declining to answer, peremptory writ of mandate was ordered to be issued as prayed for. From this judgment defendant has appealed.

Section 9 of article 11 of the Constitution of this state provides that "the compensation of any county, city, town, or municipal officer shall not be increased after his election or during his term of office. * * *" The application of this provision of the Constitution to various acts of the Legislature passed from time to time, affecting the compensation to be paid to county officers, has been the subject of a number of decisions by our Supreme Court, and the question here presented is therefore not a new one.

[2] It has been consistently and uniformly held that, wherever new legislation is made which will have the effect, actually or presumptively, to increase the compensation to be paid to an incumbent officer of a county, such legislation is to be postponed in its effect until the commencement of the new term of office to which the successor of the incumbent may be elected.

[3] And it is further held that where new legislation makes a change in the amount of compensation to be paid an incumbent of an office, unless it clearly appears by the terms of the legislative act that such change will not operate to increase the compensation theretofore paid, it will be presumed that the compensation is increased thereby, and that the Legislature did not intend the act to be operative upon terms of office then current. Smith v. Mathews, 155 Cal. 752, 103 Pac. 199, and cases cited therein; followed by this court in Applestill v. Gary, 123 Pac. 228. It is suggested in the brief of respondent that the decision in the case of Kirkwood v. Soto, 87 Cal. 394, 25 Pac. 488, is applicable, in which it is held that an additional allowance to a county school superintendent for necessary traveling expenses during his term of office is not in violation of the section of the Constitution quoted. That decision rests upon the asserted ground that there was no increase of compensation made in that case, but that the increase was merely of incidental expenses of the office. That case was later distinguished from the cases of Chapin v. Wilcox, 114 Cal. 498, 46 Pac. 457, and Agard v. Shaffer, 141 Cal. 725, 75 Pac. 343, and the distinction urged in these latter cases applies, if anything, with added force to the facts here present. The law, as it provided for compensation to be paid the recorder at the time Baker entered upon his term of office, made no allowance whatsoever to the recorder for clerical service or for assistants to aid him in entering upon the records the various instruments or documents required or permitted by law to be recorded. He assumed office with the obligation on his part to perform all of its duties for the gross compensation of $3,000 per annum. When, by the new act of the Legislature, it was provided that the recorder might employ as many copyists as "may be required," who should be paid out of the county treasury, the effect was to relieve the recorder from the doing of a portion of the work of his office which he had theretofore been required to perform himself in person or by deputies who, if they received compensation, were paid by the official out of the gross compensation allowed to him. It cannot be said, as a matter of fact, that the amount of compensation which the copyists would receive for the doing of the work would exceed the amount of the difference of $1,000 between the salary formerly provided for and that provided by the new section of the Code; but it does not appear, by the terms of the new section, that such increase would not be worked or that the Legislature intended the new schedule of salaries to be immediately operative. The presumption, therefore, must prevail that an increase of compensation would result, and that the Legislature did not intend that the act should be put in operation prior to the commencement of the new term of office.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the trial court to sustain the demurrer of defendant as interposed to the petition.

OFFICERS (§ 100*)—COUNTY OFFICERS—COMPENSATION—"INCREASE OF SALARY"—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

When a county clerk of Imperial county was elected, that was a county of the thirty-sixth class, and his salary was fixed at $2,200 a year, which under the express provisions of Pol.

Code, § 4290, was in full compensation for all services rendered by him, his deputies and assistants. In 1909 that county was transferred to class 36½, and by Pol. Code, § 4265a, the salary of the county clerk was fixed at $2,400 a year, with provision for one deputy at $900 a year. Held, that the provision for the appointment of a deputy constituted an increase of salary within Const. art. 11, § 9, providing that the compensation of county officers shall not be increased during their term of office, and hence a deputy appointed by such county clerk had no claim against the county for her salary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Petition by Irena Elder for a writ of mandate against W. D. Garey as County Auditor of the County of Imperial. From a judgment issuing a peremptory writ, defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Phil D. Swing, of El Centro, for appellant. J. Stewart Ross, of San Francisco, and Shaw, Ross & Dyke, of El Centro, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff filed a petition in the superior court of Imperial county praying for a writ of mandate to compel the auditor of said county to draw a warrant in her favor for $1,445, covering salary alleged to be due her as deputy county clerk of Imperial county for the months of June, 1909, to December, 1910, inclusive. A demurrer interposed by defendant was overruled, and a peremptory writ ordered issued as prayed for. From this order and judgment defendant appeals.

It appears that one D. S. Elder was elected county clerk of Imperial county for a term commencing in August, 1907, and expiring January 2, 1911. At the time of his election, Imperial county was a county of the thirty-sixth class, and the compensation of the county clerk of such counties was fixed at $2,200 per annum, which sum, as provided by section 4290 of the Political Code, was declared to be in full compensation for services rendered by such officer, his deputies, and assistants. By act of the Legislature of 1909, Imperial county was declared to be a county of class 36½, and by section 4265a, Political Code, the compensation of the clerks of such counties was fixed as follows: "Two thousand four hundred dollars per annum; also one deputy, who shall receive a salary of nine hundred dollars per annum." Under and by virtue of this provision the said clerk, on May 24, 1909, appointed petitioner as deputy clerk, and the amount claimed by her is for salary as such official. Section 9 of article 11 of the Constitution provides that "the compensation of any county, city, town, or municipal officer shall not be increased after his election or during his term of office." The question presented, therefore, is whether or not the act providing for a deputy constituted an increase of salary within the meaning of the constitutional provision just cited. We do not regard the question as an open one in this state, and hence no good purpose could be subserved by an extended discussion of the matter. At the time Elder was elected for the term expiring in January, 1911, the law prescribed his duties and fixed his compensation for services, the performance of which under his oath he assumed, at the lump sum of $2,200 per annum, out of which sum, under section 4290, Political Code, he was required to pay all deputies and assistants whom he might at his option employ. It was held by this court in the case of Newman v. Lester, 11 Cal. App. 577, 105 Pac. 785, following Daggett v. Ford Co., 99 Ill. 334, Dougherty v. Austin, 94 Cal. 607, 28 Pac. 834, 29 Pac. 1092, 16 L. R. A. 161, and Tulara Co. v. May, 118 Cal. 303, 50 Pac. 427, that where the statute at the time of his election provided a fixed salary for the officer and authorized the appointment of a certain number of deputies, whose salaries were also fixed, and all payable out of the county treasury, an act adopted during the term of such officer, increasing the number of his deputies whose salaries were thereby fixed, did not constitute an increase in the salary of such official. These cases, particularly Daggett v. Ford Co. and Dougherty v. Austin, together with Hanson v. Underhill, 12 Cal. App. 545, 107 Pac. 1016, are authority for holding that, where the compensation of an officer at the time of his election is fixed at a lump sum, there being no provision for the appointment of deputies, then the allowance of a deputy during such term constitutes an increase of salary, and hence is obnoxious to the provisions of section 9, article 11, of the Constitution. While the logic and reasoning upon which this distinction is based may not appeal strongly to the writer, nevertheless such distinction has been repeatedly made and must be regarded as settled law.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the trial court directed to sustain the demurrer interposed by defendant to the petition.

A written contract provided that plaintiff leased to defendant for seven months a set of bending rolls for a total of $710.85 payable in equal monthly installments; that in case of defendant's default in keeping any of the covenants by him to be performed, without any notice, the instrument should be deemed canceled and all rent paid should belong to the lessor as full payment for the prior use of the property; and that the lessor should be entitled to take the same into his possession. It also provided that, in case of full performance by the lessee, he should then be entitled to purchase the property by paying the lessor $2. Held, that such contract was a lease and not a sale.

2. BAILMENT (§ 26*)—CONTRACT—ACTION FOR RENT—TENDER.

Where a contract for the transfer of certain machinery contemplated that defendant should ultimately become the owner, but did not require that plaintiff tender a bill of sale before final payment, plaintiff was not bound to tender a bill of sale before suing to recover the balance due under the contract designated as rent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bailment, Cent. Dig. §§ 119-121; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

3. BAILMENT (§ 22*)—PERSONAL PROPERTY—TERMINATION OF CONTRACT.

Where a lease of personal property providing for payment of rent in monthly installments also declared that, on the lessee's failure to perform, the instrument should be deemed canceled and of no further effect as against the lessor, and all rights and interest of the lessee should cease, and the lessor should be entitled to take possession of all the property, such provisions were solely for the lessor's benefit, and hence it was entitled to waive the breach and sue for and recover additional accruing installments of rent.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Harron, Rickard & McCone against H. C. Cutting. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court; Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

W. H. H. Hart, of San Francisco, for appellant. Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment against the defendant and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The action was brought to recover the accrued monthly rentals due upon a lease-contract of personal property. On February 21, 1908, plaintiff and defendant entered into a lease, by the terms of which the plaintiff leased to the defendant for the period of seven months a set of bending rolls, at a total rental of $710.85, payable in seven equal monthly installments of $101.55, commencing with the 1st day of April, 1908. The instrument, among other things, provided "that upon the failure of the lessee strictly to keep and perform any of the covenants or promises by him agreed to be performed, then and thereupon, without any notice, this instrument shall be deemed to be canceled and of no further effect as against the lessor, and all rights and interests of the lessee shall cease, and all rent by the lessee theretofore paid shall belong to the lessor as full payment for the prior use of said property; and the lessor shall be entitled to take into his possession all said property." The document further provided that "said lessor further agrees that upon strict performance by the lessee of the foregoing covenants and promises by him to be kept and performed, he shall then * * * have the right to purchase said property by the prompt payment to the lessor of the sum of two (2) dollars." Defendant made the first payment, and the plaintiff, having waited until the time for the other payments had elapsed, and none of them having been made although often demanded, commenced this action for the balance claimed to be due. Defendant asserts that the instrument which is the basis of this action is not a lease but a contract of sale; and that, as no bill of sale of the property was ever tendered, the action cannot be maintained; and that, moreover, whether the instrument be construed as a lease or a contract of sale, the defendant is not liable, because of the provision therein that upon the failure of the defendant to make any monthly payment the contract became terminated.

[1] The instrument in question is a lease. It was so held in an action brought by the same plaintiff against Wilson, Lyon & Co., reported in 4 Cal. App. 488, 88 Pac. 512, where this court passed upon an instrument identical in form with the one here. There the court, in the course of its opinion, said that the defendant took and retained possession of the property, and no question of the title or possession of the property was involved; that the court was merely called upon to construe an instrument and determine the rights of the parties arising thereunder. The instrument was designated a lease, and that as its terms were peculiarly appropriate to instruments of hiring and lease, and as it conferred upon the defendant no right in the property except to use it, and expressly imposed upon it an obligation to pay the plaintiff for such use, it must be construed as a lease. The court, continuing, said that the other terms of the instrument restrictive of the manner in which the defendant might use the property were inconsistent with its ownership by the defendant, and the provision giving the defendant the right to purchase the property for a small sum of money furnished additional grounds for holding the instrument to be a lease. In the case at bar no matter set forth in the answer and no evidence introduced at the trial has any tendency to show that a sale of the property was intended rather than a lease; and therefore this case comes squarely within the doctrine of the one just cited.

[2] Even if we could regard this as an action for the breach of a contract to purchase, still, as the instrument does not require the plaintiff to tender a bill of sale, such tender would not be necessary before bringing suit. Contracts for the sale of real property are usually construed so that the tender of a deed and the payment of the last installment of the purchase price are regarded as concurrent obligations; but, obviously, the lease-agreement here requiring the execution of no formal document evidencing the transfer of title, cases arising on real estate transactions have no bearing upon the present question.

[3] Defendant also asserts that it was optional with him to terminate the agreement by failing to pay any monthly installment; that upon his failure to pay the second installment the contract was canceled and of no further effect. It is true that one of the clauses of the lease provides that, upon the failure of the lessee strictly to keep and perform any of the covenants of the lease, the "instrument shall be deemed canceled and of no further effect as against the lessor"; that "all rights and interests of the lessee in and to said property shall cease"; and that "the lessor shall be entitled to take into its possession all of said property." But this provision was inserted in the lease-contract for the benefit of the lessor; and, according to all the decisions on the subject, the contract is void only as to the lessee at the election of the lessor. "Clearly appellant misconstrues the force of the language upon which it relies. The language means that by a violation of the terms of the contract the rights of the party violating it cease, and as to that party and to that extent the agreement becomes void and of no effect. It would be a very unreasonable construction to give the language the meaning for which appellant contends. It would work the destruction of the contract itself, and leave the solemn writing as the expression of the mere whim of the parties, for a 'promise which is made conditional upon the will of the promisor is generally of no value, for one who promises to do a thing only if it pleases him is not bound to perform it at all.'" Central Oil Co. v. Southern Refining Co., 154 Cal. 165, 97 Pac. 177. See, also, Wilcoxson v. Stitt, 65 Cal. 596, 4 Pac. 629, 52 Am. Rep. 310.

There were no errors in the admission of evidence.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Sept. 21, 1912.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 553*)—RECORD—AFFIDAVIT.

Where, on review of an action on a fire insurance policy providing that the insurance on the building should be effective only so long as the building was occupied as a private dwelling and on the personal property only so long as it was within the building, the record consisted of the judgment roll only, an affidavit that evidence was introduced below showing the building to have been used and the personal property to have been situated, at the time of the fire, as stipulated in the policy, could not be considered; an affidavit not supplying the place of a statement of facts or bill of exceptions.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Moses Balan and another against the National Union Fire Insurance Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

John R. Layng, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Parker & Moote, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Plaintiffs brought this action to recover for loss sustained by fire, against which they alleged they had been indemnified by defendant under a policy of insurance. The insurance covered a one-story frame building and fixtures, also general household effects and wearing apparel and an outbuilding on the premises. By the terms of the policy, a copy of which was attached to the complaint as an exhibit, the insurance was made effective as to the first-named building while it was "occupied only as a private dwelling," and as to the outbuilding only while the same was being used as such. The policy also provided that the personal property mentioned was insured while it was contained in the dwelling. Plaintiffs alleged in their complaint that the frame buildings, together with all of the property described in the policy of insurance, were destroyed by fire; but the complaint contained no statement showing that the buildings were being put to the particular uses limited by the insurance contract at the time they were destroyed. In the case of Arnold v. Insurance Co., 148 Cal. 660, 84 Pac. 182, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 6, it is held, where like conditions of contract and allegations existed, that the complaint failed to state a cause of action. The defendant here seasonably raised the question in the superior court by demurrer to the complaint, but not only was its demurrer overruled, but it was penalized in the sum of $10 as a condition to its being allowed to file an answer within five days.

The record shows that the demurrer was presented to the court by argument. Respondents do not contend that the complaint is sufficient, but expressly admit in their brief that it fails to state a cause of action under the authority herein cited. We are asked, however, to consider the contents of an affidavit filed in this court showing that, at the trial of the action, evidence was introduced to the effect that, at the time of the destruction of the property described in the insurance policy, the buildings were being used as provided in the policy, and that the personal property was located in the dwelling house. The record on this appeal consists of the judgment roll only; there being no statement of the evidence nor bill of exceptions. An affidavit cannot be used to supply any matter which should have been presented in either of the last-mentioned forms. The question, therefore, as to whether the admission of evidence establishing a material fact essential to a recovery can be made to cure a failure to allege such fact in a complaint calls for no discussion.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the trial court to sustain the demurrer of defendant to the complaint of plaintiffs and allow plaintiffs to amend their complaint within such reasonable time as may seem to the court to be proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Lester Russell was convicted of manslaughter and his motion for new trial denied, and he appeals. Affirmed.

B. F. Thomas, of Santa Barbara, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was charged by information with the crime of murder. Upon trial he was convicted of manslaughter. He appeals from the judgment and an order of court denying his motion for a new trial.

On February 12, 1912, defendant and one Ernest Besson engaged in an unfortunate controversy over the payment of one dollar due from the defendant to the latter. A fist fight followed, during which defendant used a knife upon Besson, inflicting four wounds, one of which, as found by the jury, caused his death, which occurred eight days later.

The record discloses evidence tending to prove defendant's guilt. Indeed, we do not understand counsel to question the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, his discussion thereof being for the purpose of showing the prejudicial character of numerous alleged erroneous rulings of the court, both in giving and refusing to give certain instructions. The instructions given by the court of its own motion, including those requested, a large part of which were given, cover some 42 pages of typewritten matter; hence, whatever may be said as to the fairness of the court's charge, it cannot be said the jury were not fully instructed.

[1] 1. Appellant insists that the death of deceased followed, not as a direct result of the wounds themselves, but was caused by the want of proper medical attention. Upon this theory it is argued that instruction No. 4, inasmuch as it assumed that the wounds caused his death, was highly prejudicial to defendant's rights. Without entering into a discussion as to the effect of the instruction, it is sufficient to say that the court, at defendant's request, gave an instruction in hæc verba identical with that of which he here complains. Under the circumstances his rights could not have been prejudiced by reason of the alleged erroneous ruling.

[2] 2. Complaint is made that the court instructed the jury that the word "willfully," when applied to the intent with which an act is done, does not require any intent to violate the law or injure another. Not only did the court define the term in the language of the statute (subdivision 1, § 7, Pen. Code), but, conceding that the giving of the instruction was erroneous by reason of being uncalled for, it is impossible to perceive how it could in any manner have prejudiced defendant's rights.

[3] 3. It has been repeatedly held that the ruling of a court in giving or refusing to give an instruction embodying the declaration (subdivision 3, § 2061, Code Civ. Proc.) that "a witness false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others" does not constitute reversible error. The form of the instruction complained of, as a whole, is unobjectionable and not only states a principle of law declaring a rule by which jurors should be guided in considering the evidence, but "applies to that class of instructions which contain only mere commonplace matters that the jurors would be apt to know about and act upon in the absence of instructions." People v. Corey, 8 Cal. App. 728, 97 Pac. 907; People v. Hower, 151 Cal. 638, 91 Pac. 507; People v. Grill, 151 Cal. 597, 91 Pac. 515.

[4, 5] 4. As to whether or not the knife, admitted by defendant to have been used by him in cutting deceased, was a deadly weapon, was a question of fact to be determined by the jury. State v. Drumm, 156 Mo. 216, 56 S. W. 1086; People v. Fuqua, 58 Cal. 247. Hence the court erred in telling the jury that the knife so introduced was a deadly weapon. Defendant, however, was not charged with an assault with or otherwise using a deadly weapon, and therefore, while there was no occasion for instructing the jury upon the subject at all, nevertheless, under the circumstances shown, it is clear that defendant's rights were not prejudiced by reason of the ruling.

[6] 5. The court gave a number of instructions based upon the prosecution's theory of the case, stating that certain acts, if committed under the circumstances named, would constitute the crime of murder, all of which are attacked as erroneous by appellant. Inasmuch, however, as the jury in acquitting defendant of the crime of murder found that he did not commit the acts, it is apparent that, conceding the giving of the instruction to have been erroneous, defendant was in no way prejudiced by the rulings. People v. Besold, 154 Cal. 363, 97 Pac. 871; People v. O'Neal, 67 Cal. 379, 7 Pac. 790.

[7] 6. The court instructed the jury to the effect that, when persons engage in a fist fight, the blows passing between them being unlikely to occasion death, if death ensues it is manslaughter; and that if persons meet originally on fair terms, and, blows having been interchanged, one in the heat of passion draws a deadly weapon, and inflicts a deadly injury, it is manslaughter. Defendant attacks these instructions upon the ground that they omit the element of self-defense, a right which it is claimed may be invoked at any time by the one who finds himself in imminent danger of great bodily injury. Conceding the correctness of appellant's contention, the objection is fully answered by an instruction given as follows: "You are instructed that if the circumstances in this case were such as to induce a reasonable person in defendant's position to believe that he was in imminent danger of great bodily injury, and that the defendant did then believe that such danger existed, or reasonably appeared to exist, at the very time that he stabbed Ernest Besson, then he was justified in killing the said Ernest Besson, and you should acquit him."

[8] 7. We have carefully examined appellant's objections to other instructions given, but find no error in the rulings of the court thereon. The charge must be considered as a whole, and so considered it not only covers every possible theory which could be based upon the evidence, but contains nothing calculated to prejudice the substantial rights of defendant.

8. An examination of the alleged errors due to the refusal of the court to give certain instructions requested by defendant shows that where such instructions constituted a correct exposition of the law the subject was fully and fairly covered by the charge given.

[9, 10] 9. Defendant objected to the admission in evidence of statements made to the chief of police upon the ground that such statements were not voluntary. The objection was overruled, and the ruling is assigned as error. The statements were made in the absence of any promise or threat, and were therefore voluntary. Moreover, they did not constitute a confession, but were statements of facts favorable rather than otherwise to defendant. The ruling was without prejudicial error. People v. Weber, 149 Cal. 325, 86 Pac. 671; People v. Stokes, 5 Cal. App. 205, 89 Pac. 997. Other assignments of error based upon rulings of the court in admitting and excluding evidence are likewise without merit.

As disclosed by the record, the case is an unfortunate one where the youth of the defendant, coupled with his conceded good reputation as a peaceful, quiet citizen, strongly appeals to the writer; but in the exercise of the functions of this court we are unable, with the assistance of able counsel appointed by the court to defend him, to find any prejudicial error in the record which would justify the court in making an order setting aside the verdict of the jury, which recommended him to the mercy of the court.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by Charles P. Clark and another against H. A. Van Torchiana and others. From an order granting a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed in part and reversed in part.

Cassin & Lucas of Santa Cruz, for appellants. W. P. Netherton, of Santa Cruz, for respondent Torchiana. Netherton & Torchiana, of Santa Cruz, for respondents Anderson and George C. Pratchner Co.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal, upon a bill of exceptions, from an order granting a new trial in an action for damages for trespass to real property.

The plaintiffs, for cause of action, pleaded practically the following facts: The plaintiffs were the owners of a lot of land peculiarly adapted to residence purposes in the city of Santa Cruz. Plaintiffs purchased this land from the defendants Anderson and Torchiana, and as a part of the consideration for its purchase said defendants agreed with the plaintiffs to cut and construct a public street immediately south of the southerly boundary line of said lot. Subsequent to the sale of the lot the defendants Anderson and Torchiana and the Pratchner Company jointly commenced to construct the proposed street upon lands previously surveyed and staked out, and which, if followed, would have kept the course of and location of said street free and clear of plaintiffs' lot. The defendants in the construction of said street knowingly and willfully and without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiffs deviated from the surveyed line of said proposed street, and entered upon the plaintiffs' lot at the southeasterly part thereof, and removed therefrom large quantities of earth and soil, and constructed said street through a portion of said lot, all to plaintiffs' damage in the sum of $750.

The several defendants answered separately. They, in effect, denied all of the material allegations of the complaint. In addition, however, the answer of the defendant Anderson averred that the construction of the proposed street "was a neighborhood affair, to which all the neighbors beneficially interested donated funds and land, and that the only obligation which this defendant took upon himself was to donate his interest in part of the land covered by said proposed street, and to pay one-half of the total cost of construction less the amount paid by all the neighbors with the exception of his codefendant, H. A. Van Torchiana, who agreed to pay the other half; that he acted as agent for all the interested parties, and engaged the contracting firm, the George C. Pratchner Company, a corporation, to cut said street in accordance with the survey previously made, * * * and that he instructed said contracting company to build a good and sufficient grade on and upon the lands conveyed by this defendant and his codefendant Torchiana for the benefit of himself, his codefendant, and all parties interested; * * * that he did instruct said contracting firm of George C. Pratchner & Co. to proceed with the construction of said road, and that he let a contract as agent for all the parties beneficially interested in the construction of said road to said George C. Pratchner Company, and that he never knew during the construction of said road that said contractor in any way infringed upon the rights of said plaintiffs or either of them, but was only informed after the road was fully finished that said contractor had made a slight mistake and had cut into a small corner of plaintiffs' land."

Upon the issues thus framed the case was tried by the lower court with a jury, and the trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiffs, upon which judgment was entered against all of the defendants in the sum of $500.

Subsequently the defendants interposed a motion for a new trial based upon the grounds (1) a resort by the jury to the determination of chance on the question submitted to them; (2) excessive damages, appearing to have been given under the influence of passion and prejudice; (3) insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; (4) that the verdict is against the law.

[1] A new trial was granted to all the defendants by the lower court for the reason, as specifically stated in the order granting the same, that "there was no evidence whatever to sustain the verdict as to the defendants Anderson and Torchiana."

Notwithstanding the fact that the lower court based its ruling in granting a new trial as to all of the defendants solely upon the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict against two of the defendants, the order appealed from must be affirmed in whole or in part if it can be justified upon any of the grounds which were made the basis of the motion for a new trial. This is conceded by the plaintiffs, and it is not disputed that the order granting a new trial, in so far as it affects the defendants Anderson and Torchiana, must be affirmed if it can be fairly said that the record fails to show any evidence whatsoever in support of the verdict against said defendants, or that the record shows a substantial conflict in the evidence as to their participation in the trespass complained of. It is insisted, however, upon behalf of the plaintiffs that the record does not reveal a single valid ground upon which the order granting a new trial as to all of the defendants can be justified; and, furthermore, that the record shows without conflict ample evidence to support the verdict not only as against the defendant Pratchner Company, but as against the defendants Anderson and Torchiana as well. Plaintiffs further contend that, even if we should agree with the trial court that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict against the two last-named defendants, the verdict and judgment rendered and entered against Pratchner Company should not be disturbed, because the evidence upon the whole case without conflict supports the verdict against that particular defendant.

The case was tried in the lower court apparently upon the theory that the defendants Anderson and Torchiana had interposed and relied upon the defense that the trespass complained of was committed by an "independent contractor." The point is now made by the plaintiffs that the affirmative allegations of the respective answers of these two defendants did not state facts sufficient to constitute such a defense. This point cannot rise upon an appeal, such as we have in the present case, from an order granting a new trial.

[2] A new trial is a re-examination of an issue of fact, and the sufficiency of the pleadings to support a plaintiff's cause of action, or maintain any particular defense relied upon by a defendant, is not involved in a re-examination of an issue of fact; and therefore cannot be considered upon an appeal from an order granting a new trial. Martin v. Matfield, 49 Cal. 42; Brisson v. Brisson, 90 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. 186; Crescent Feather Co. v. United Upholsterers' Union, 153 Cal. 433, 95 Pac. 871; Riverside Water Co. v. Gage, 108 Cal. 240, 41 Pac. 299.

[3] Whatever the theory of the defense may have been, and aside from the question of the technical sufficiency of the respective answers of the defendants Anderson and Torchiana to support any particular defense relied upon by them, it is certain that these two defendants, by the specific denials of their answers, put in issue, so far at least as they were concerned, every material allegation of the plaintiffs' complaint. Under the general issue thus raised, the burden was upon the plaintiffs to show by a preponderance of the evidence that the trespass and damage complained of resulted from the joint act of all of the defendants rather than from the independent, individual act of the defendant Pratchner Company. This the plaintiffs utterly failed to do. In this behalf, we do not deem it necessary to narrate and review the evidence in detail.

[4] It will suffice to say that the record of the evidence adduced at the trial and upon the whole case shows, we think, clearly and conclusively and without conflict that, although contracted for and authorized by the defendants Anderson and Torchiana, the work of constructing the street in question was undertaken and done wholly by and under the sole and immediate supervision and control of the defendant Pratchner Company, and that the damage resulting to plaintiffs therefrom was the individual and independent act of the defendant Pratchner Company. This being so, the defendants Anderson and Torchiana could not be held legally liable for the trespass and damage to plaintiffs' lot; and under the instructions of the trial court, which clearly and correctly stated the law upon this phase of the case, the jury should have rendered a verdict in favor of rather than against the defendants Anderson and Torchiana.

It follows from what has been said that it was not only the right, but the duty, of the lower court to grant the last-named defendants a new trial, and that, in so far as they are concerned, the order appealed from must be affirmed.

[5] With reference to the defendant Pratchner Company, the record, we think, reveals ample evidence to support the verdict and judgment rendered and entered against it. The fact that this particular defendant had trespassed upon plaintiffs' lot in constructing the street in question was not denied by the answer of any of the defendants, nor was this fact disputed at the trial. In so far as that defendant was concerned, the magnitude of the trespass and the amount of damage resulting therefrom were the paramount issues raised by the pleadings. Upon the question of the extent of the trespass and the resulting damage, the evidence, save in minor matters, was free from conflict. Generally it was shown that in the construction of the street some 220 cubic yards of earth were excavated and removed from the plaintiffs' lot; and that, in order to restore the lot to its former condition, the excavation would have to be refilled, and to do this successfully it would be necessary to build a retaining wall. The cost of refilling and building the retaining wall was estimated by plaintiffs' witnesses to be $540.50.

These are undisputed facts in the case. True, it was testified to by witnesses for the defense that the peculiar formation and character of plaintiffs' lot would not support a retaining wall such as was admitted would be necessary to withstand the pressure exerted by the weight of the material which would be used in the refilling. Under the pleadings in this case, it is doubtful if such testimony was properly admitted in evidence; but, however that may be, it was not opposed to the plaintiffs' proof of the necessity for refilling in order to restore the lot to its original condition and value, nor did it tend to disprove or contradict plaintiffs' case as to the extent and the measure of the damage suffered by them. On the contrary, its tendency was to increase plaintiffs' proof of damage by showing that it was impossible at any cost to restore plaintiffs' lot to its original condition. In short, the admitted facts of the case, coupled with the evidence adduced at the trial, were amply sufficient, upon the question of trespass and the issue of damages, to support the verdict against the defendant Pratchner Company. In the absence of a showing of error in other respects sufficient to support the remaining grounds of the motion for a new trial, the verdict and judgment rendered and entered against the Pratchner Company must stand. Evidently the lower court was impelled to grant a new trial as to all of the defendants from a mistaken notion that, if it was found that a new trial was rightfully due to one or more of the defendants, it must necessarily be granted as a matter of law to all of the defendants, merely because they were all jointly charged with participating in the trespass complained of.

[6] It was the common-law rule that the reversal of a joint judgment against several joint tort-feasors for error against one defendant necessitated a reversal of the judgment as to all of the defendants. This rule has been materially modified if not entirely superseded by statute in this state; and now it is the rule that, if a verdict and a judgment be given against several defendants who have been sued jointly the verdict and judgment, if found to be erroneous as to any one of the defendants, may be vacated as to that one only, and continue in full force and effect as to the remaining defendants. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 578, 579; Nichols v. Dunphy, 58 Cal. 605; Cole v. Roebeling Construction Co., 156 Cal. 443, 105 Pac. 255; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513.

[7] Counsel on both sides have discussed at some length the question as to whether or not the jury under the evidence was justified in rendering a verdict for punitive damages. From our reading and understanding of the evidence, it clearly appears, and practically without conflict, that the trespass complained of resulted in actual damage to the plaintiffs in a sum in excess of $500. The jury's verdict was for but $500; and, if plaintiffs' proven damages exceeded that amount, we are at a loss to perceive how any question of punitive damages can arise on the record.

For the reasons stated, the order appealed from is affirmed as to the defendants Anderson and Torchiana, and it is reversed in so far as it purports to grant a new trial to the defendant Pratchner Company.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by E. P. Connelly against the City and County of San Francisco. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

J. P. Langhorne and George W. Lane, both of San Francisco (J. Delmore Lederman, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Percy V. Long, City Atty., and Jesse H. Steinhart, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an action brought under sections 3819 and 3804 of the Political Code to recover from defendant $1,446.42 taxes paid by property owners under protest, for which verified claims were filed with the board of supervisors seeking a refund. The taxes so paid were levied by the supervisors in the general levy of the city and county of San Francisco for municipal purposes for the fiscal year 1904–05. They were levied for the purpose of raising money wherewith to pay interest on, and to provide a redemption fund for, certain municipal bonds. The issuance of these bonds had been voted upon favorably at an election called for that purpose, and upon January 25, 1904, an ordinance was passed ordering their issue. In Law v. City and County of San Francisco, 144 Cal. 396, 77 Pac. 1014, it was held that bonds for one of the purposes, namely, the Telegraph Hill Improvement, had not been voted by the people. As to these bonds, the tax levied for interest and sinking fund is admittedly void. This, however, is a minor consideration. The principal ground of attack is that, at the time of the tax levy, concededly none of the bonds had been sold or contracted to be sold, and that therefore there then existed no bonded indebtedness legally authorizing such tax levy. The facts are conceded; the conclusion disputed.

[1] The municipality (respondent herein) first contends that the taxes were voluntarily paid and therefore not the subject of an action for recovery. Dear v. Varnum, 80 Cal. 89, 22 Pac. 76.

[2] Further it is contended that section 3819 of the Political Code limits the right of action to attacks upon the assessment, and that in the case at bar the attack is upon the tax levy. This is entirely too narrow a construction to be put upon this provision of the Code. See Hellman v. City of Los Angeles, 147 Cal. 653, 82 Pac. 313.

[3] Moreover, the allegations of plaintiff's complaint bring him within the provision of section 3804 of the Political Code. Herein the complaint alleges that the plaintiff's assignors did, within one month after their payment of the taxes, file with the board of supervisors verified claims and demands for the repayment of the taxes so paid under protest, and that the same has not, nor has any part thereof, been repaid or refunded. This allegation is not denied, and additionally is found by the court to be true.

Respondent's position is thus stated from its brief: "First. That the fact that a debt was not an existing debt at the time of the tax levy would not constitute an objection to the tax levy itself, since the entire taxation scheme of the city and county of San Francisco is based upon an estimation of debts to be incurred, but not actually incurred at the time of the tax levy. Second. That the fact that the bonds might never be sold would not be a proper objection to the tax, because practically the greater part of every tax levy under the charter of the city and county of San Francisco is designed to meet contemplated expenses which may never be incurred. Third. That neither the Constitution nor the charter prohibit a tax such as the tax in this case. Fourth. That to hold in favor of plaintiff would be to establish a doctrine that would seriously impede the sale of municipal bonds."

[4] The first three propositions may be considered together. Under the first proposition it is pointed out that a tax levy under the charter of the city and county of San Francisco is to a very large extent anticipatory. The auditor transmits to the supervisors "an estimate of the probable expenditures of the city and county government for the next ensuing year." Charter of San Francisco, pt. 3, c. 1, § 3. Other provisions are pointed out; all showing that the tax levy to meet the running and operating expenses of the city and county of San Francisco is not to meet existing obligations, but is based upon estimates of future expenses, and the levy is to meet such expenses. Respondent's position in this regard is unquestionably true. True it is that neither the Constitution of the state nor the charter in express terms prohibits such a tax as was here levied. It does not follow, however, as declared in respondent's second proposition, that, because the greater part of the tax levy under the charter of the city and county of San Francisco is designed to meet contemplated future expenses which may never be incurred, therefore the tax levy for bonds unsold and uncontracted for is valid. While there is no express inhibition in the Constitution nor in the charter against the levying of a tax under the indicated circumstances, certain general principles of law forbid it. While it is true that under charter authorization the costs of the municipal government are estimated in advance and taxes levied to meet them, and while it is true, in a limited sense, that the obligation for which a particular tax is levied may not be incurred, as that the taxes collected for street assessment may be greater than the amount actually expended, even when this results no injury follows to the taxpayer. The funds are carried over and serve to reduce the general tax levy of the succeeding year. When it comes, however, to the funded indebtedness of the city, the law makes special provision in many forms for the payment of the principal and interest of such obligations. From the beginning to the end, elsewhere, as well as in the charter provisions, such a bonded indebtedness or obligation does not exist and is not recognized as a funded obligation unless the bonds themselves have actually been sold or their sale contracted for. "The debt represented by any bond would not exist or be created until the bond is issued by the company; that is, delivered to a third person for a valuable consideration." Merced R. & E. Co. v. Curry, 157 Cal. 730, 109 Pac. 264; Dudley v. Board of Commissioners, 80 Fed. 672, 26 C. C. A. 82. See, also, Clark v. Los Angeles, 160 Cal. 45, 116 Pac. 722. While none of the charter provisions bears specifically upon bonds of the character here voted, yet throughout the charter, wherever bonds are mentioned, only those bonds which have been sold or whose sale has been contracted for are considered obligations of the city, and only as to such is provision made to meet such obligation by taxation. Thus the charter deals elaborately with the issuance of bonds to pay for public improvements, provides how such bonded indebtedness may be voted and incurred, provides that such bonds when issued may be sold from time to time by the supervisors as required, and provides (section 12, art. 12) that, at the time of the annual tax levy, the supervisors shall levy and collect annually a tax sufficient to pay the annual interest on such bonds, and also the proper aliquot part of the indebtedness so incurred. Again, in section 2 of article 3, the auditor, in making up his estimate, shall "state the amount required to meet the interest and sinking funds for all outstanding funded debts." Article 3, § 2, provides that the general tax levy, "exclusive of the state tax and the tax to pay the interest and maintain the sinking funds of the bonded indebtedness of the city and county," shall not exceed a given amount. Section 14 of article 3 provides that the supervisors shall, from time to time, provide "for the payment of the interest and principal of the bonds for which the city is liable." Thus, without further citations, it is made certain by the charter provisions, as it is under general law, that only for those bonds which have become an obligation of the city may a tax be levied. Were the construction contended for by respondent to prevail, it might result—and we are advised in this case it has resulted—in grave injustice to the taxpayer. The city might levy taxes year by year for bond interest and bond redemption and never sell a bond. At the end of each year it might transfer this fund to its general fund and use it for other purposes. At the end of any number of years of such practice, if the bonds eventually should be sold, the taxpayer would still have to pay into the treasury the full amount for interest and redemption. Aside from the hardship to the taxpayer, this would be to countenance a flat though indirect violation of the charter itself. The supervisors might make a general tax levy to the full amount permitted by the charter, and by the indirect method of this unauthorized bond tax levy secure from the taxpayer large sums of money for the sole purpose of transferring it to the general fund, and so by indirection defeat the express mandate of the law.

[5] Finally, upon this point it may be well to give the language of this court in Merced County v. Helm, 102 Cal. 165, 36 Pac. 400: "Any attempt on the part of the state, or of the county as one of the subdivisions of the state, to take the property of an individual for public purposes by way of taxation must find an express statutory warrant, and all laws having this object are to be construed strictly in favor of the individual as against the state." To the argument of inconvenience advanced by respondent under the fourth head, sufficient answer may be made, first, by saying that an inconvenience to the city does not justify the despoiling of its taxpayers; and, second, by reference to

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by John E. McDougald, treasurer of San Francisco, against Martha L. Low and another, executors of Charles Adolphe Low, deceased, and others. From a judgment granting partial relief, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Hartley F. Peart, of San Francisco (U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., of counsel), for appellant. James M. Allen, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The District Court of Appeal of the First District reversed the judgment of the court below herein. Upon respondents' application, a rehearing was granted and the cause was transferred to this court for decision. Upon further consideration we approve the opinion written by Mr. Justice Hall and rendered by the District Court of Appeal. It is as follows:

"This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of the superior court fixing the amount of the inheritance tax to be paid on certain shares of stock in three several California corporations, passing upon the residuary clause of the will of Charles Adolphe Low, deceased.

"Plaintiff, as the treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco, brought the proceedings under the provisions of section 17 of the inheritance tax law of 1905. Stats. 1905, p. 341.

"The respondents, the executors of the last will of said decedent, appeared in said proceeding and admitted that the property in question was subject to the inheritance tax under the statute, and the court, upon due proceedings, appointed an appraiser to appraise the said shares of stock, and to report thereon in writing to the court. The appraiser in due time made his report, and the court made findings thereon, filed conclusions of law, and rendered its judgment fixing the amount of the taxes to be paid on account of said shares of stock.

"It appears from the record before us that said decedent died domiciled in the state of New York, where his will was duly admitted to probate and where he left large estate. He also left estate (the shares of stock in question) in this state; that is to say, he owned, and his estate still owns, shares of stock in three several California corporations. There has been no administration of the estate in this state, and the respondents are the executors appointed by the New York court.

"All debts were proved against the estate in the probate proceedings had in the state of New York. There do not appear to be any debts owing to any California creditors, and the estate in New York greatly exceeds the entire debts and expenses of administration. Indeed, the value of the personal property alone in New York at the time of the death of the decedent exceeded the total debts and expenses of administration by upwards of $348,000.

"The total value of the estate of decedent at the time of his death was $1,622,933.89. All the property in California, being the stocks in the California corporations, was of the value of $296,616.66, which was 18½ per cent. of the total value of the estate.

"The court, in its conclusions of law, held that the property in California subject to the inheritance tax should bear its proportion of the debts proved in New York, and the expenses of administration of the estate of decedent in New York, and accordingly deducted 18½ per cent. of such debts and expenses from the actual value of such property, and assessed the tax upon the remainder thus ascertained. It is this action of the court which presents the principal question to be determined upon this appeal.

"We think the court erred in thus deducting from the property in California the debts proved and expenses incurred in the probate proceedings in New York. It is not pretended that any debts are or were owing to any one in California.

"The court found 'that the property in California is residue, and is to be distributed according to section 7 of the last will and testament of said Charles Adolphe Low.' The seventh section of said will disposes of the 'residue' of the estate.

[1] "Respondents in their brief correctly state that: 'The legatees at bar take by decedent's will the residue; the residue is what remains after paying the legacies of the will and the debts and expenses of administration.' That respondents' conception of what is meant by the residue in the law of wills and administration is correct is amply supported by the following authorities: Nickerson v. Bragg, 21 R. I. 296, 43 Atl. 539; Stevens v. Underhill, 67 N. H. 68, 36 Atl. 370; Addeman v. Rice, 19 R. I. 30, 31 Atl. 429; Leahy v. Cardwell, 14 Or. 171, 12 Pac. 307; Phelps v. Robbins, 40 Conn. 264; Webster, New International Dictionary.

[2-4] "From the finding of the court that this California property is residue, it is apparent that it has or will pass to the residuary legatees free of debts and expenses of administration. In other words, it will be distributed in kind to the residuary legatees. Under our system, the title to property passes either by will or succession upon the death of the decedent, subject of course to the payment of the debts and other charges of administration. Where, as in this case, property having its situs in this state is not in fact resorted to for the payment of debts or expenses, but passes in kind to the legatee, and there are no debts due creditors in this state, and the estate in the state of the domicile is ample to pay all debts and expenses of administration, we see no reason why any deduction should be made from the actual value of the property that actually does pass in kind to the legatees. The inheritance tax is a charge upon succession by inheritance or transfer by will. In re Wilmerding, 117 Cal. 281, 49 Pac. 181. The situs of stock in a corporation is in the state of the incorporation, for the purposes at least of the inheritance tax law (Murphy v. Crouse, 135 Cal. 19, 66 Pac. 971, 87 Am. St. Rep. 90), and any bequest thereof which results in its actual transfer in kind should subject it to payment of the inheritance tax upon its actual value.

"There are no decisions of any appellate court of this state upon the point involved in this appeal, but the decision of the Supreme Court of Tennessee in Memphis Trust Co. v. Speed, 114 Tenn. 677, 88 S. W. 321, supports the doctrine that no deduction should be made on account of debts not shown to have been paid out of the property situate in Tennessee. In the case just cited, the domicile of the decedent was in Mississippi, where the principal administration was had. Ancillary administration was had in Tennessee, and the debts that the executor sought to deduct from the value of the estate in Tennessee, which consisted solely of stock in Tennessee corporations, were owing to Tennessee creditors; yet the court held that as it had not been shown that the debts in question had been paid from the estate in Tennessee, but that the estate in Tennessee remained intact for distribution, no deduction should be made from the value of the property in Tennessee. This case goes further than we are required to go, for in the case at bar there are no debts due California creditors.

"It has been decided in New York that, where a decedent leaves estate in different states, the debts due New York creditors should be deducted from the value of the estate in New York, though thus exhausting the New York estate, while the entire estate of decedent was perfectly solvent, and an apportionment of the debts to the estate in different states would leave a balance to be taxed in New York under its inheritance tax law. Matter of King, 71 App. Div. 581, 76 N. Y. Supp. 220 (affirmed on appeal in 172 N. Y. 616, 64 N. E. 1122, no opinion); Matter of Grosvenor, 124 App. Div. 331, 108 N. Y. Supp. 926; Matter of Grosvenor, 126 App. Div. 953, 111 N. Y. Supp. 1121 (affirmed in 193 N. Y. 652, 86 N. E. 1124, with memorandum citing Matter of King, supra).

"As a corollary to the rule laid down in the above-cited New York cases, it ought to follow that no deduction should be allowed, in a perfectly solvent estate at least, on account of debts due nonresident creditors or expenses of foreign administration not shown to have been paid or to be paid out of the California assets.

"For the reasons above set forth, we think the court erred in making the deduction.

[5] "One-fourth of the residue of the estate of the testator was given to trustees in trust to pay the net income therefrom to one of the daughters of the testator, with power to said daughter to will such portion to whomsoever she might wish after her death. Appellant contends that the court should have required the trustees to give bond to secure the payment of such tax as may accrue upon the exercise of such power of appointment. It would seem to be a sufficient answer to this contention to say that the statute imposing the tax, and authorizing the proceedings to enforce payment, makes no provision for exacting any such bond. Under the inheritance tax law (section 1), no transfer under the power takes place until the exercise thereof. This we do not understand to be disputed by appellant. Until such event takes place, it cannot be known what, if any, tax will be due thereon. We do not think that the court erred in not exacting a bond from the trustees for the purpose of securing payment of a tax on a transfer of property not yet made, and which, when made, may not require the payment of any tax at all.

"The trial court has all the data and facts in the report of the appraiser and in the facts found by the court upon which to render a correct judgment."

The main reason for the granting of the rehearing was that, as the decedent was a resident of New York at his death, and it was not expressly found that the debts due his New York creditors and the expenses of administration in New York had in fact been paid out of his New York property, there might be a prima facie right in the residuary legatees to have a proportional amount of such New York debts and expenses deducted from the California assets, and to have the California inheritance tax computed only upon the balance.

Upon further consideration we are satisfied that the facts shown by the record were sufficient to raise a presumption that none of the California property would ever be used to pay the New York debts or expenses, and that the California property had passed, or would pass, in its entirety, to the legatees. The circumstances put upon the legatees the burden of showing that said debts and expenses, or some part thereof, would have to be paid out of the California property. As they made no attempt to do so, the court below was justified in finding that the California property was residue to be distributed to the legatees. Its finding of that fact was equivalent to a finding that all said debts and expenses had been paid, or would be paid, out of the New York property. The other facts found justified this as a conclusion. The New York assets were of the value of $832,790.38, of which $538,565.38 was personal property. The said debts and expenses aggregated $189,-$36.47. In the ordinary course of procedure, these debts and expenses, if they have not been paid, will all be paid out of the New York property. Hence the California property will go to the legatees without diminution because of these New York debts and expenses, and accordingly the inheritance tax should be computed upon its value without any deduction on account of said New York claims.

The respondents cite the New York decision in matter of Porter, 67 Misc. Rep. 19, 124 N. Y. Supp. 677, which declares, in a case somewhat similar, that a pro rata deduction is proper under the facts shown in that case. In that case, however, it does not appear that the assets in the state of the decedent's domicile were sufficient to pay the debts and expenses of administration thereof. That case is therefore distinguishable from the case at bar because this fact does appear here.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, and the trial court is directed to give judgment in accordance with this opinion.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

Poolos Prantikos was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Jos. T. O'Connor, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, C. M. Fickert, Dist. Atty., and Fred L. Berry, Asst. Dist. Atty., all of San Francisco, for the People.

HENSHAW, J. Defendant was indicted for the murder of Thomas Finnely and suffered conviction of murder in the first degree, with the death penalty imposed. The facts, without controversy, show that the defendant was a fugitive from the justice of the kingdom of Greece, of which he was a subject. He was there accused of the murder of his cousin, John Condos. On the advice of his family, he fled to the United States. According to the laws and custom of his country, he was tried during his absence and found guilty. All this is shown by the testimony of the defendant himself. A nephew of John Condos so slain by the defendant discovered that the defendant was in San Francisco, and on the 26th day of November, 1911, at the Ferry building in San Francisco, pointed out the defendant as a fugitive from justice to Walter Castor, a police officer, who placed the defendant under arrest. The defendant submitted without resistance, and with the officer proceeded quietly for a distance of about 60 feet. Then suddenly he drew a revolver, shot George Condos, shot the arresting officer twice, and fled. Police officer Thomas F. Finnely came running to the scene, and he too, was fired upon by the defendant. One of the witnesses testified that Finnely slipped and fell, and that the defendant shot him while he was down. Both officers died from the effects of their wounds. Condos recovered from his, and the defendant was put on trial for the Finnely murder.

Defendant was a witness in his own behalf. He testified to the facts above set forth touching the accusation against him of the crime of murder, of which he asserted he was not guilty, his flight to America upon the advice of his family, and that he had been wandering about the United States for two years. He testified further that he had been tried and found guilty in Greece of the murder, and that members of the Condos family were seeking him for the twofold purpose of having him returned to Greece for punishment and of securing the reward which the Grecian government had offered for his apprehension. All this had disturbed him greatly "so that he wondered he had any mind left." He had heard that a member of the Condos family was in San Francisco, and determined to leave San Francisco to avoid trouble. For this reason he was at the Ferry building and had purchased a revolver and was armed with it to prevent any member of the Condos family killing him. At the Ferry he was approached by Condos who, with much vile language, said that he was going to have him sent to Greece to be executed. The police officer then put him under arrest. He knew that the police officer had authority to arrest him. As they walked along, Condos, still talking in Greek, continued his vilification of him and of his family so that "I lost my head and pulled my gun and started to fire." He sought to kill Condos for his insults. He did not mean to kill, and did not know that he had killed, the police officers; from the time that he began to shoot his mind was a blank.

Upon this appeal it is asserted that the defendant was deprived of the fair trial to which the law entitled him by the erroneous admission by the court in evidence of testimony concerning defendant's prior murder, his prior trial and conviction, his escape from justice, and the reward offered for his apprehension. It is not contended that legitimate evidence of these facts would be inadmissible, but rather the contention is that the evidence which was offered was incompetent. Thus Condos was asked if he knew of his own knowledge whether or not there was a reward offered by the Grecian government for the apprehension of the defendant, and answered, "I know." This evidence was clearly admissible. Upon cross-examination, however, the same witness testified, when asked how he knew about the reward, "They wrote out a letter from Greece." The motion to strike out the testimony touching the reward was denied.

[1] Again it is said that the evidence admitted, touching the prior murder in Greece, was incompetent. But Condos testified that the murdered man was his uncle, and that defendant had shot and killed him with a rifle. His testimony is that 15 minutes before the murder he was with Prantikos; that Prantikos left him and killed his uncle. He did not actually see the killing, but saw him running away and went after him to catch him. This evidence was clearly admissible. Summing up upon these matters, appellant admits, as indeed he must, that evidence of his crime in Greece, his flight from justice, his trial and conviction, and the reward offered for his apprehension were one and all admissible as proving a motive for his later crime. People v. Pool, 27 Cal. 572; People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 48 Pac. 75. Whatever imperfections existed in the character of the evidence introduced for this legitimate purpose, it is a sufficient answer to say that the defendant himself voluntarily took the witness stand and told a story completely corroborating everything that was testified to by the prosecution, saying in the one particular that he denied having committed the murder in Greece.

[2] Evidence was admitted touching the shooting and the subsequent death of Officer Castor. In view of the nature of the murder, the shooting of Castor was unquestionably a part of the res geste, nor can any valid objection be shown to the proof that Castor subsequently died of his wound.

[3] That testimony touching the results of the post mortem examination was given with more elaboration and detail than necessary cannot be held to be a ground for reversal.

It is finally said that, by the admission of all this evidence, "the defendant was deprived of any defense that rested upon his state of mind." He was not deprived of this defense. He made it, and as bearing upon that defense, and as showing the reason for his disturbed state of mind, he himself testified to many, if not most, of the matters concerning which the prosecution introduced evidence.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Dong Pok Yip was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Charles Stewart and Carroll Cook, both of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, of San Francisco, for the People.

PER CURIAM. Defendant was tried upon a charge of assault with intent to commit the infamous crime against nature, and was convicted of simple assault. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The alleged victim of the assault was a boy nine years of age. The only evidence given with reference to the episode which culminated in the defendant's arrest was furnished by one Rodrigues, bookkeeper for a certain transportation company at Antioch, and by the boy who was called as a witness by the defendant. Mr. Rodrigues testified that from his office on the wharf he saw the boy and the Chinaman, Dong Pok Yip. The former had been fishing, and the latter had been playing with another lad; but after a time the witness observed them seated together and the Chinaman was teaching the boy how to fish. Subsequently he noticed the boy fishing while the defendant, who had his arm around the child, was whispering to him. This attracted the particular attention of Mr. Rodrigues, who watched the two from the door of his office. As he was thus observing them, the Chinaman arose, helped the boy to his feet, and they walked hand in hand along the wharf; but as they passed the office they were not holding hands. The boy seemed to the witness to be going willingly, and the latter observed no coercion of any sort on the part of the Chinaman. A few minutes later the witness followed in the direction taken by the boy and the defendant. He found them near an oil tank in some brush, which was about a foot in height in the direction from which he was looking, but high enough to screen them from any one who might look from the opposite side. They were both stooping; the boy, who faced Rodrigues, was in front of the defendant with his back to the latter, and defendant had his hands on the sides of the boy's waist. Rodrigues did not see the lad's person, but he did observe that the back of the boy's overalls hung down and that the Chinaman's trousers were unbuttoned in front. When they saw Rodrigues they quickly changed their positions; the boy slipping one of the suspenders of his "bib overalls" over his shoulder, and the Chinaman fastening the top button of his trousers. When they were thus seen by Rodrigues near the tank, the Chinaman had his hands on the boy's sides. While the little fellow was evidently not a child of even ordinary intelligence, the learned judge of the superior court, who presided at the trial, after a very careful examination permitted him to be sworn as a witness. There were some contradictions in his testimony, but he declared that the defendant had not attempted to do anything to him. He also said that, during all of the time he was with the defendant near the oil tank, they were facing each other. He also testified that the defendant used no force with him and did not take hold of him roughly. According to his testimony, the Chinaman had made a disgusting proposal with reference to the boy's sister, coupled with a promise to give her money, and had exposed his person to the boy.

[1-4] Appellant's contention is that, since the verdict of the jury acquitted the defendant of the higher offense charged in the information, there is no evidence showing an intent on his part to commit any other sort of assault; and that, although very slight physical force is sometimes sufficient to uphold a conviction of assault where a higher crime has been charged, the physical violence is measured by the outrage to the victim's feelings and its use in opposition to the will of that person; and in this case, the boy being a consenting party, there was no violence to his feelings, and therefore no assault. The fallacy of this argument lies in the failure to consider the youth and the weak mentality of the child. When the case was before the district court of appeal, that court sustained the conviction, and in the opinion, Mr. Presiding Justice Lennon, discussing the matter of consent, said, among other things: "The fact that the defendant was interrupted and his attempt rendered abortive by the sudden and unexpected intrusion of a third party did not make his conduct any the less criminal. People v. Johnson, 131 Cal. 512 [63 Pac. 842]. This, of course, assumes that the evidence in the case shows an absence of consent on the part of the boy; for it must be conceded, as contended by counsel for the defendant, that an assault implies repulsion, or at least want of consent on the part of the person assaulted (People v. Gordon, 70 Cal. 468 [11 Pac. 762]; 2 Bishop's New Crim. Law, § 35); and, if it could be fairly said that the evidence in the present case compelled the conclusion that the boy knowingly consented to the commission of the crime charged against the defendant, there would be no escape from a reversal of the judgment. We are of the opinion, however, that the evidence upon the whole case falls short of showing that the boy actually and knowingly consented to be the victim of the alleged assault. It may be admitted that the evidence shows that the boy was ignorantly indifferent and passive in the hands of the defendant, even to the point of submission; but there is a decided difference in law between mere submission and actual consent. Consent, in law, means a voluntary agreement by a person in the possession and exercise of sufficient mentality to make an intelligent choice to do something proposed by another. 'Consent' differs very materially from 'assent.' The former implies some positive action and always involves submission. The latter means mere passivity or submission which does not include consent. Geddes v. Bowden, 19 S. C. 1, 7; Aull v. Columbia, N. & L. R. Co. [42 S. C. 431], 20 S. E. 302; Bouvier's Law Dic. In cases of the character under discussion, the age and mentality of the subject of an indecent assault is important, and should always be considered in determining the presence or absence of consent. The mere submission of a child of tender years or retarded mental development to an attempted outrage of its person should not, in and of itself, be construed to be such consent as would, in point of law, justify or excuse the assault. 2 Bishop's New Crim. Law, § 35, subd. 2. It is neither unreasonable nor unnatural to assume that such a child, in the hands of a strong man, might be easily overawed into submitting without actually consenting. Hill v. State [37 Tex. Cr. R. 279, 38 S. W. 987], 39 S. W. 666 [66 Am. St. Rep.

803]. In the case at bar the jury was properly instructed by the trial court that, if the boy consented to the assault complained of, the defendant should be found not guilty. Presumably the jury, in its deliberations, heeded this instruction, but upon weighing the evidence concluded, justly, we think, that the boy victim of the assault merely submitted to the act attempted by the defendant without knowing the nature of the act or realizing the design of the defendant." These views are, in our opinion, correct and are hereby adopted by this court.

If the jury had found the defendant guilty, under the evidence presented, of assault with intent to commit the infamous crime against nature, we would have been compelled to sustain the judgment. The testimony revealed the fact that the defendant had first secured the confidence of the child by giving him some instruction in the art of fishing; that he had then led the little fellow to a secluded place such as would be selected for the commission of the crime charged; that he had then induced the boy to take a position, and he himself had assumed an attitude which clearly indicated his indecent purpose; that previously he had exposed his own person; and that the child's clothing had been disarranged in a manner which comported with the theory of the prosecution regarding the defendant's intent. All of this, coupled with the lack of consent on the part of the little boy, as discussed above, was sufficient to support a verdict of guilty of assault with intent to commit the infamous crime against nature.

[5] Where the evidence clearly would support a verdict for a higher offense, the conviction of a lesser crime necessarily included therein will not be set aside. People v. Muhlner, 115 Cal. 306, 47 Pac. 128. The only acquittal in this case was of the major crime charged, but this, as the Attorney General says in his brief, did not "include an acquittal of an intent to take indecent liberties or to practice other lewd and lascivious acts or to commit any other unlawful act such as may constitute an assault."

[6] We conclude, therefore, that the conviction of simple assault must be sustained under the evidence in this case. Nothing said by this court in People v. Stouter, 142 Cal. 146, 75 Pac. 780, conflicts with the conclusion reached here. In that case the defendant had been found not guilty of the crime defined by section 288 of the Penal Code, but had been convicted of an attempt to commit said offense. It was held that the superior court erred in giving an instruction after the jury had been out many hours, by which they probably inferred the judge's belief that the defendant should be convicted of an attempt to commit the crime alleged. This court also said: "Moreover, if the evidence was not sufficient to convict the defendant of the act charged, and the jury so found, it is difficult to see how it was sufficient to find him guilty of an attempt to commit that act. The child herself testified that defendant did not do the act charged in the information; and if a certain condition of her person, claimed by the prosecution to have been proved, and other circumstantial evidence, did not warrant the jury to find defendant guilty of doing the act charged, it was not sufficient to support a verdict of guilty of an attempt to do that act. The jury evidently must have considered the last instruction as giving them a wide power to find the defendant guilty of something, under the general category of an attempt to do the act charged in the information." The language quoted above must be limited to the facts of that case, which, by the way, are not reviewed extensively in the opinion.

[7] It is not true, as a rule of law, nor did the court say in the Stouter Case, that evidence which is insufficient to sustain a conviction for a crime would be insufficient to sustain a conviction for an attempt to commit the crime.

[8] Upon the only other important ruling assigned as error by appellant, we adopt the opinion of the District Court of Appeal: "Upon cross-examination of the boy, the district attorney asked, 'What did the Chinaman do at that time?' The witness started his answer by attempting to repeat what the defendant said, whereupon counsel for defendant interrupted with the objection that whatever the defendant may have said was not cross-examination. Upon the objection being overruled, the completed answer revealed the fact that the defendant had offered $2 for an opportunity of meeting and 'doing something' to the boy's sister. It is now claimed that this testimony was hearsay, and that the objection made at the trial that it was not cross-examination should have been sustained. Obviously what the defendant did, including what he said, was not hearsay, and, in view of the direct examination, it was clearly cross-examination.

[9] "Anything that the defendant may have said which was relevant and material to the commission of the offense was admissible in evidence; and as the trial court could not know, and had no reason to anticipate, the answer of the witness, the objection was properly overruled. Under such circumstances, the fact that the witness narrated a conversation of the defendant, which disclosed a statement of the defendant prejudicial to him and irrelevant to the issue being tried, did not make the ruling erroneous. In such a contingency, the defendant might have availed himself of a motion to strike out the answer, but, not having done so, he will not now be heard to complain."

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

In the Matter of the Estate of Coun D. Rankin, deceased, on the application of W. C. Fraser for the issuance of letters of administration. From an order issuing such letters, the public administrator appeals. Affirmed.

Purouthington & Adair, of Riverside, for appellant. Lafayette Gill, of Riverside, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Deceased died testate on April 3, 1911, in Prince Edward Island, Canada, a resident of said island. By his will he gave all his property to his mother, Annie Rankin, a nonresident of this state, and appointed as executor one Arthur A. Bartlett, also a nonresident. A portion of his property consisted of an orange grove situate in Riverside county, Cal. His will was duly admitted to probate by the court of probate of wills of said island. Subsequently a copy of the will and the probate thereof, duly authenticated, was filed in the superior court of Riverside county by one W. C. Fraser, with a petition for its probate in this state and the issuance to him of letters of administration with the will annexed; he claiming to be a "person interested in the will" by virtue of certain assignments of interests in the estate made by said Annie Rankin, the sole devisee and legatee. The public administrator of Riverside county filed his opposition to the granting of such letters to Fraser and his petition for the issuance of such letters to himself. The trial court admitted the will to probate in this state, denied the application of the public administrator, and ordered the issuance of letters of administration with the will annexed to Fraser, as a person interested in the will. The assignments under which Fraser claimed were three in number; each being a written instrument made by said Annie Rankin as "the sole beneficiary under the will" of deceased, and each purporting to assign and transfer to said Fraser a specified sum of money "which may be coming to me as an heir at law of the said Coun D. Rankin, deceased, under the terms of his will." It was shown over the objection of Fraser that the same was immaterial, incompetent, and irrelevant; that no valuable consideration was paid by Fraser for any of said assignments.

This is an appeal by the public administrator from the order of the superior court; the only controversy being as to the respective rights of Fraser and the public administrator to letters of administration with the will annexed.

[1] It is urged that nothing passed to Fraser by virtue of any of the assignments because of the phraseology thereof; each of them being of money "which may be coming to me as an heir at law" of deceased, and Mrs. Rankin taking solely as devisee and legatee. This construction of the assignments is too technical. It is impossible to fairly construe the instruments otherwise than as intended to transfer portions of the interest of Mrs. Rankin as "beneficiary under the will," coming to her "under the terms of" the will of deceased.

[2] It is immaterial, so far as the public administrator is concerned, that nothing of value was paid by Fraser for any of the assignments. Mrs. Rankin, of course, had the right to give any portion of her interest under the will to Fraser if she saw fit to do so, and the public administrator could not be heard to question the effect of the assignments either on the ground that the same constituted mere gifts or that a consideration recited was not in fact paid.

[3] The situation in regard to the assignments being as we have stated, the action of the trial court in awarding letters of administration with the will annexed to Fraser as against the public administrator was correct, in view of the decisions of this court.

Section 1323 of the Code of Civil Procedure, contained in the article relative to probate of foreign wills, provides "when a copy of the will, and the probate thereof, duly authenticated, shall be produced by the executor, or by any other person interested in the will, with a petition for letters," it shall be filed, and that after proper notice and proofs there shall be "letters testamentary or of administration issued thereon." It was squarely decided in Estate of Bergin, 100 Cal. 376, 34 Pac. 867, in a contest for letters of administration between the public administrator and a resident devisee under a foreign will; the executor named in the will failing to apply for letters testamentary that the devisee was entitled to letters of administration with the will annexed, as a "person interested in the will," in preference to the public administrator. The court said that the article containing sections 1323 and 1324 of the Code of Civil Procedure dealt especially with the subject-matter of foreign wills, and must prevail over all conflicting provisions "as to all matters and questions arising out of the subject-matter of such article," and that it was clear that, under its provisions, letters of administration "must be granted to a 'person interested in the will' who applies for them, in the absence of a petition by the executors." In Estate of Engle, 124 Cal. 292, 56 Pac. 1022, a contest for letters of administration with the will annexed between the assignee of an undivided interest in certain property of the estate from the sole devisee and the public administrator, it was held that the assignment vested in the assignee all the interest that the devisee had by virtue of being the owner of such undivided interest, and made him a person interested in the will within the meaning of section 1323 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that he was entitled to letters of administration with the will annexed as a person interested in the will, in preference to the public administrator. There has been no change in our law material to the question presented since these decisions were rendered, and there is no decision impairing the effect of the rulings made in the cases just cited. In Estate of Richardson, 120 Cal. 344, 52 Pac. 832, it is true that it was held that the superior court had the right, under the circumstances of that case, to appoint the public administrator. The contest there was between the nominee of both the absent executor and a devisee not competent to administer, and the public administrator, and it was simply held, as stated in the syllabus, that "in default of application therefor by such executor, or by a devisee resident in this state, who is entitled to act as administrator, there is no statutory provision requiring the court to appoint the nominee of such executor or of any resident devisee." In Estate of Coan, 132 Cal. 401, 64 Pac. 691, the contest was between a son and a daughter of deceased, each competent to administer and each interested in the will as devisee or legatee. It was held that section 1350 of the Code of Civil Procedure, requiring that where no executor is named in the will, or if the executor named is dead, or incompetent, or renounce or fail to apply for letters, "letters of administration with the will annexed must be issued as designated and provided for in granting of letters in case of intestacy," and section 1365 of the Code of Civil Procedure, prescribing the order in which letters must be granted in case of intestacy, are applicable in the matter of a foreign will "where, as in this case, the controversy as to who shall administer is between parties interested in the will." This may well be for the reason that there is no conflicting provision in the article on probate of foreign wills; that article controlling, as said in Estate of Bergin, supra, where there is any special provision thereof in conflict with a provision in another article. In Estate of Coan, supra, Estate of Engle, supra, and Estate of Bergin, supra, were expressly distinguished from the case under consideration as involving a contest for letters "between one interested in the will and the public administrator." Estate of Brundage, 141 Cal. 538, 75 Pac. 175, contains nothing in conflict with the views declared in Estate of Bergin, supra, and Estate of Engle, supra. In that case the person held by this court to be entitled to letters was a resident son of the deceased, who was a devisee and legatee under the will, a person interested in the will. The other party, a corporation authorized to act as administrator, was the nominee of the nonresident executor, the nominee of nonresident heirs and legatees, who by reason of their nonresidence were incompetent to act as administrator, and the assignee of a portion of the legacy of one of the nonresident daughters. It was held in accord with previous decisions that neither the nomination by the nonresident executor, nor the nomination by any heir, devisee, or legatee not himself competent to serve as administrator, or "entitled" to administration, gave the nominee any right. As to the claim that such party was entitled to have its claim considered by reason of the fact that it was the assignee of a portion of a daughter's legacy, the answer was practically that, as such assignee, it could occupy no better position than its assignor, the nonresident daughter, if she were a resident of the state; that in such event the contest would be one between two parties "interested in the will"; and that the son must be preferred to the daughter under the rule declared in Estate of Coan, 132 Cal. 401, 64 Pac. 691. The proposition that, as against a person "interested in the will," the public administrator is not "entitled" to letters of administration in the case of a foreign will was referred to in the opinion as being a "well-settled proposition," and it was stated that this rule is apparently based upon the fact that he is not "interested in the will." None of the other cases cited by learned counsel for appellant requires notice.

From what we have said, it is clear that it is the well-established rule in California that, in the case of a foreign will, a person "interested in the will" is by virtue of that fact alone, if competent to serve as administrator in this state, entitled to letters of administration with the will annexed as against one who, like the public administrator, is not "interested in the will." This is the effect of sections 1323 and 1324 of the Code of Civil Procedure as construed by this court in the cases we have cited.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

McCONNELL v. IMPERIAL WATER CO.
NO. 1. (Civ. 1,145.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Sept. 26, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 977*)—NEW TRIAL (§ 154*)—DISMISSAL OF MOTION.

The matter of dismissing proceedings, on motion for new trial, for lack of diligence in the prosecution thereof is addressed to the court's discretion, the exercise of which will not be disturbed on appeal in the absence of abuse.

2. NEW TRIAL (§ 154*)—PROSECUTION OF MOTION—DISMISSAL—LACK OF DILIGENCE.

Judgment was entered for plaintiff on April 29, 1910, and defendant served its notice of intention to move for new trial and prepared a statement of the case, which was delivered to the clerk on October 5, 1910, and settled, and the engrossed copy was delivered to the judge on December 20, 1910, and filed on April 20, 1911. Defendant not having taken further action, plaintiff, on May 3, 1911, noticed a hearing on the motion, which was had on June 2d, and the motion was denied. On July 17th defendant noticed a motion to set aside the denial of its motion, because the trial judge, when he made the ruling and first settled the statement, was a stockholder in defendant corporation, and the order denying a new trial was set aside. On July 28, 1911, plaintiff noticed a motion for August 25th, to dismiss the motion for new trial for lack of diligence; and on August 11th defendant noticed a motion for new rulings on the motion for new trial, to be made on August 25th, on which day the motion to dismiss was granted. Held, that there was no abuse of discretion in dismissing the proceedings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Action by Leslie McConnell, executor of the estate of H. F. McConnell, deceased, against the Imperial Water Company No. 1. From an order dismissing defendant's motion for a new trial because of unreasonable delay in prosecution, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

JAMES, J. Appeal from an order made in the superior court dismissing defendant's motion for a new trial because of unreasonable delay in the prosecution thereof.

On April 29, 1910, judgment was entered in this case in the superior court in favor of plaintiff. Defendant thereupon served its notice of intention to move for a new trial and prepared a statement of the case for use at the hearing of such motion. This statement, together with amendments thereto, was delivered to the clerk of the court on October 5, 1910, and on December 3, 1910, the statement was settled by the trial judge and ordered engrossed. The engrossed copy was delivered to the judge on December 20th and was thereafter signed, and was filed on April 20, 1911. On May 3, 1911, defendant not having taken any further action toward securing a ruling on its motion for a new trial, the plaintiff gave notice calling up the motion for hearing, and a hearing was had thereon on June 2, 1911, at which time the court entered an order denying the motion. No objection was then made to the hearing of the motion by either of the parties. Subsequently, and on July 17, 1911, defendant gave notice that it would move to set aside the order of the court denying its motion for a new trial, on the ground that the trial judge, at the time he made the ruling, was a stockholder of defendant company, and therefore disqualified to sit in the matter. It appeared on the hearing, as found by the judge who temporarily sat to hear that motion, that the judge who passed upon the motion for a new trial was a stockholder of defendant company at the time he made the order thereon, and had been such stockholder from the 18th day of August, 1910. The fact was therefore shown that not only was the judge disqualified at the time he heard the motion for a new trial, but was also disqualified at the time he settled the statement of the case. The order denying a new trial was set aside, agreeable to the motion made to that end, and on the 11th day of August, 1911, attorneys for defendant served plaintiff's counsel with a notice that they would move for a new ruling on the motion for a new trial on the 25th day of August, 1911. Prior to the time of the service of this last notice, plaintiff's attorney, on the 28th day of July, 1911, immediately after the order formerly made by the disqualified judge denying a new trial had been vacated and set aside, served notice on defendant that he would, on the 25th day of August, 1911, move the court to dismiss proceedings on motion for a new trial, on the ground that the same had not been prosecuted with due diligence. On the 25th day of August these motions were both taken up on the calendar of the superior court, and the motion to dismiss the proceedings, being first presented, was by the judge then sitting granted. This appeal followed.

[1] The matter of dismissal of proceedings on motion for a new trial, on the ground of lack of diligence in the prosecution thereof, is one which is addressed to the sound discretion of the court; and, unless an abuse of this discretion is shown, an order made granting or denying such a motion will not be disturbed on appeal. Galbraith v. Lowe, 142 Cal. 295, 75 Pac. 831.

[2] In our opinion, no abuse of discretion is shown to justify a reversal of the order appealed from. Between the date of the entry of judgment and that upon which the motion dismissing the proceedings on motion for a new trial was presented and granted, 16 months had intervened. It appears that when the statement of the case was settled the trial judge who settled such bill and subsequently first ruled upon the motion for a new trial had been a stockholder of defendant company for nearly 5 months. We must assume, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, which was not made, that the records of the corporation correctly set forth at all times the names of the persons holding shares of stock. It will be presumed, then, that defendant corporation, having knowledge of the state of its own records, had knowledge of the fact that the superior judge of Imperial county had become one of its shareholders, and of the time when he became such shareholder. There is nothing in the record showing or tending to show that defendant had not such knowledge; and it therefore appears that it allowed a disqualified judge to act upon the motion for a new trial and so cause delay in the proceedings. It was through the act of the defendant that the order made by the disqualified judge was set aside; and even after this was done defendant allowed 13 days to elapse before giving notice that it would seek a ruling on its motion for a new trial. This latter notice was only served after a notice had been given to it by the plaintiff that he would ask the court to dismiss the proceedings on motion for a new trial. Under these facts, it might well appear that the delay of defendant in bringing to a hearing its motion for a new trial was unreasonable and without excuse. We are of the opinion that it was not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to make the order complained of.

The order is affirmed.

INSURANCE (§ 349*)—LIFE INSURANCE—FORFEITURE FOR NONPAYMENT OF PREMIUMS.

A life policy stipulating that it is issued in consideration of a specified premium and of the payment of a like sum on a designated date in every year until seven full years' premiums have been paid, or until the prior death of insured, the balance, if any, of the then current year's premium to be deducted in any settlement, and that the failure to pay any premium when due will void the policy, "except as herein provided," and declaring that after premiums have been paid for three years insured, within 30 days after any default in the payment of a subsequent premium, may avail himself of enumerated options, does not extend the time for the payment of premiums, for the quoted words merely apply to the provision defining the effect of payment of premiums for three years, and do not apply to the provision authorizing insurer to deduct from the face of the policy an unpaid premium, the time for payment of which has been extended, and, where insured failed to pay the second annual premium at maturity, the policy became void.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Rose Burton against the Columbian National Life Insurance Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. A. Holman, of Oakland, for appellant.
L. A. Redman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. A general demurrer was sustained to the complaint, and defendant had judgment, from which plaintiff appeals. The action was commenced to enforce the payment of a life insurance policy payable to plaintiff, wife of the insured. It appears from the complaint that defendant company issued its policy February 12, 1909, upon the life of Walter B. Burton; that on August 9, 1910, said Walter Burton died; that in the month of August, 1910, plaintiff made due proofs of death and demanded payment under said policy, but defendant denied all liability. It further appears from the complaint "that the current year's premium for 1910 was not paid except as provided for in said policy that said premium be deducted from said $5,000"; that said plaintiff, since the delivery of said proofs of loss, has given defendant written authority "to deduct any premium unpaid, with interest, from the amount due under said policy, and has elected to take said sum due under said policy in one sum in cash." A copy of the policy sued upon is attached to the complaint as part thereof. The clauses of the policy referred to by counsel and bearing upon the sufficiency of the complaint are as follows: "The Columbian National Life Insurance Company of Boston, Massachusetts, agrees to pay five thousand dollars to Rose Burton, wife of the insured, hereunder beneficiary, or to such beneficiaries as may have been designated in the manner herein provided, at the home office of the company in Boston, upon receipt of satisfactory proofs of the death of Walter B. Burton, of Berkeley, state of California, the insured, within seven years from the date hereof, less all indebtedness to the company on this policy, together with any unpaid premium or portion of the premium for the then current policy year. This policy is issued in consideration of the sum of eighty-eight 95/100 dollars, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, and of the payment of a like sum on the twelfth day of February in every year until seven full years' premiums have been paid or until the prior death of the insured, the balance, if any, of the then current years' premium to be deducted in any settlement hereof. The benefits, conditions and privileges on pages two and three are part of this contract as fully as if recited over the signatures."

Other provisions are as follows: "Failure to pay any premium, or any note given for any premium when due, will void this policy without further notice and forfeit all premiums to the company except as herein provided." "All premiums are payable annually in advance, but they may be paid semi-annually or quarterly * * * if the insured shall in writing request such change in his policy. But no premium or installment thereof shall continue the policy in force beyond the period for which said payment is made. * * *" "After the premiums have been paid on this policy in full for the period of three years, the insured within thirty days after any default in the payment of a subsequent premium may avail himself of the following options." Then follows a statement of several options which need not be stated as the insured did not pay but one year's premium.

It is conceded that no premium was paid except for the first year. The insured died after the time stipulated in the policy for the payment of the second annual premium, and without having made such payment. The premium for 1910 was due and payable in February, and the insured died in August, 1910. Plaintiff's contention is that the company agreed to pay the amount of the policy as provided therein, "less all indebtedness to the company on this policy, together with any unpaid premium or portion of the premium for the then current year"; that, as held in Pacific, etc., Co. v. Williamsburg Fire Ins. Co., 158 Cal. 367, 111 Pac. 4, exceptions in a policy must be strictly construed against the insurer and liberally in favor of the insured, and, where there is ambiguity or doubt, it must be resolved in favor of the insured. The claim is that there is here a "direct contract to pay to the beneficiary upon death within seven years the sum of $5,000, less all indebtedness to the company, together with any unpaid premium for the then current year"; that "as there is only one annual premium, and it is expressly contemplated that, if it is unpaid for the then current portion of the year at the time of the death, it is to be deducted, and manifestly provision is thus made for its payment if unpaid, and the policy remains in force and the premium is earned."

But the policy was issued in consideration of the sum $85.95, the first payment, "and of the payment of a like sum on the twelfth day of February in every year until seven full years' premiums have been paid," etc.; and the policy provides that, "Failure to pay any premium * * * will void this policy * * * except as herein provided." Plaintiff's contention is that the exception referred to is the current year's premium if unpaid, which is to be deducted and the balance paid. In other words, that the reservation by the company of the right to deduct overdue premium from the face of the policy is equivalent to extending the time for the payment for such premium. In reply, counsel for respondent states the matter correctly, as we conceive it to be. We quote from his brief: "The time for the payment of premiums may be and frequently is extended by insurers by an independent agreement. If during such extension the insured dies, the policy of course remains in force, but, except for the provision in the policy authorizing it to do so, the company could not offset the premium against the face of the policy. The beneficiary of a life insurance policy is under no contractual or other obligation to pay the premium. The right to such payment as against the beneficiary is secured by the provision referred to. This provision does not purport to extend the time for the payment of the premium, and such a construction of it would bring it into direct conflict with the clause of the policy requiring all premiums to be punctually paid. Counsel for appellant argues that his construction of the policy is supported by the words 'except as herein provided' in the forfeiture clause. But this is not so. The words 'except as herein provided' imply, of course, that in some instances a total forfeiture does not follow the failure to pay a premium when due. And such is the case. The policy elsewhere provides that, after premiums have been paid for the period of three years, the insured within 30 days after default in the payment of a subsequent premium may avail himself of certain options. This is manifestly the exception referred to in the forfeiture clause. The words 'except as herein provided' were inserted in that clause to harmonize it with the exception noted. The policy in the case at bar not having been in force for three years, the forfeiture clause should be read, so far as plaintiff is concerned, just as if the words "except as herein provided" had been omitted therefrom. They have no relation whatever to the provision of the policy authorizing the company to deduct from the face thereof an unpaid premium, the time for payment of which has been extended."

Appellant's construction of the contract means that the company engaged to conduct its business on credit, looking to itself alone for the payment of annual premiums from the insured by deducting them from the policy in case of death. A company conducting a life insurance business upon such a basis could not long survive. As was said in Imperial Fire Insurance Co. v. Coos County, 151 U. S. 452, 14 Sup. Ct. 379, 38 L. Ed. 231: "All the calculations of the insurance company are based on the hypothesis of prompt payments. They not only calculate on the receipt of the premiums when due, but on compounding interest upon them. It is on this basis that they are enabled to offer assurance at the favorable rates they do. Forfeiture for nonpayment is a necessary means of protecting themselves from embarrassment. Unless it were enforceable, the business would be thrown into utter confusion. * * * Delinquency cannot be tolerated nor redeemed except at the option of the company. This has always been the understanding and the practice in this department of business. * * * Nonpayment at the day involves absolute forfeiture, if such be the terms of the contract, as is the case here." To give to the exception the construction contended for by appellant would in effect abrogate all the conditions designed to compel prompt payment, one of which is expressly made a consideration for the continuance of the risk. Of course we are not to make contracts for parties, but, on the contrary, must enforce them however improvidently made. And in insurance contracts we must, as we have seen, resolve doubtful and ambiguous clauses in favor of the insured. We do not think, however, that there can be any doubt as to what part of the policy the exception in question was intended to apply. It would, we think, be unreasonable and without warrant, by the terms of the contract, to hold that the exception applied to unpaid premiums, thus destroying one of the foundation stones on which life insurance is based. Appellant's construction, if adopted, would be notice to all policy holders that they incur no risk by defaulting in the payment of any annual premium for the period of one year. We cannot accept this view of the policy.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by the California Title Insurance & Trust Company, as trustee, against Frederick Kuchenbeiser and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed and rehearing denied.

Olney, Pringle & Mannon, of San Francisco, for appellant. P. R. Lund, of San Francisco, and V. A. Scheller, of San Jose, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action brought to foreclose a mortgage which was given to secure the payment of a promissory note. The appeal is from the judgment in favor of the defendants taken within 60 days after the entry of the same.

[1] Without any actual notice of the assignment of the note and mortgage, the defendants (the mortgagors) paid the Pacific Coast Savings Society (the mortgagee) the amount due on the note. With the exception of a small payment not questioned, all the payments on account of the note and mortgage were made after the assignment thereof to the plaintiff was recorded. It must therefore be held that the defendants had constructive notice of the assignment, and that, unless the mortgagee was the authorized agent of the assignee for the collection of the money due on the note, payment to the mortgagee would not discharge the liability on the note unless it also appeared from the record that the mortgagee was in possession of the note and mortgage at the time the payments were made. Civ. Code, § 2935; Rodgers v. Peckham, 120 Cal. 238, 52 Pac. 483.

[2] To save the case from the application of the doctrine of the case just cited, the defendants took the position in the trial court that the mortgagee had been constituted the agent of the plaintiff, and as such agent received the payments made by the mortgagor, and the court so found. The only point urged by the plaintiff for a reversal of the judgment is that this finding of the lower court is not supported by the evidence. With this contention we cannot agree.

[3] A fact in issue may be proved either by direct evidence of the fact, or by proof of other facts or circumstances from which the fact in issue may be inferred. Code Civ. Proc. § 1870. In the present case there was evidence that a certain deed of trust, under which the assignment in question was made and to which it referred in terms, contained a provision that the plaintiff should give a power of attorney to the Pacific Coast Savings Society (the mortgagee) to collect moneys due it, including this note; that said mortgagee did, as a matter of fact, collect such moneys; that the plaintiff never attempted itself to collect the amounts due on the note in suit, and never notified the defendant (mortgagor) of the assignment to it of the note and mortgage—which, of course, it was unnecessary for it to do if it had constituted the mortgagee its agent for collecting money due on the note—and finally that a similar mortgage made by the defendant to the same mortgagee, and assigned by it to the plaintiff, was released by said plaintiff upon payment thereof being made to the Pacific Coast Savings Society (mortgagee).

We think this evidence ample to sustain the finding of the court that the Pacific Coast Savings Society was the authorized agent of the plaintiff to collect the sums due on said note.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: LENNON, P. J.; HALL, J.

On Denial of Rehearing.

KERRIGAN, J. On petition for a rehearing by plaintiff and appellant, it is urgently insisted that the items of evidence set out in the opinion of this court filed herein are not legally sufficient to sustain the finding of the trial court that the Pacific Coast Savings Society was the duly appointed agent of the plaintiff to collect the sums due on the note and mortgage sued upon. Upon the hearing of this case in this court no argument, either oral or written, was made by the respondents' attorneys, nor have they filed any in reply to the petition for a rehearing, so that, in a case of apparently much importance to the respondents, we have been furnished no assistance by their counsel. However, we have re-examined the record, and adhere to the views expressed in our opinion affirming the judgment.

We are satisfied that there is sufficient competent evidence in the record, or evidence received without objection, to warrant the conclusion that the Pacific Coast Savings Society was the duly appointed agent of the plaintiff to collect the sums of money here sought to be recovered. The very deed of trust, by the terms of which the assignment of the mortgage was made to plaintiff, provided that said plaintiff should execute a power of attorney to said society for that purpose, which power was only to be revoked in certain contingencies. The course of conduct of the plaintiff throughout is entirely consistent with this having been done, and is utterly inconsistent with its not having been done. The evidence shows that for many years the plaintiff permitted payments, which by the terms of the note and mortgage were to be made monthly, to be so made to the said society. It further shows that it recognized as valid and effectual payments made by one of the same defendants to the same society upon another mortgage, executed by him, and assigned to the plaintiff by the very same instrument and covered by the same deed of trust forming the basis of the plaintiff's rights here—a mortgage in exactly the same position with regard to the rights of the parties as the one now in suit.

While no single item of the evidence received would be sufficient to prove the agency of the society, yet a consideration of the entire evidence in the case irresistibly forces the mind to the conclusion that the obligation of the plaintiff to appoint said society as its agent for the collection of the sums due under this note and mortgage, had in fact been performed.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

3. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 63*)—DELEGATION OF LEGISLATIVE POWER.

The Legislature may, as is done by Municipal Corporation Act (St. 1883, p. 250) § 751, as amended in 1901 (St. 1901, p. 70), confer on the board of trustees of municipalities the power to designate in their discretion the city treasurer as the collector of license taxes; the grant of power being general, within Const. art. 2, § 6, requiring the Legislature by general laws to provide for the incorporation and classification of municipalities.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; N. A. Hawkins, Judge.

Action by the City of Woodland against S. A. Leech and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

G. E. Whitney, of Woodland (Chas. W. Thomas, of Woodland, of counsel), for appellant. Arthur C. Huston and Harry L. Huston, both of Woodland, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from the judgment on the judgment roll. The defendant Leech was not served and did not appear at the trial. He was elected marshal of the city of Woodland, a municipal corporation of the fifth class, and the respondents signed his official bond containing the following condition: "Now, therefore, the condition of this obligation is such that, if the said S. A. Leech shall well and faithfully perform all official duties now required of him by law, and shall well and faithfully execute and perform all the duties of marshal and ex officio superintendent of streets required by any law to be enacted subsequently to the execution of this bond, then this obligation is to be void and of no effect, otherwise to remain in full force and virtue." The action grew out of the fact that said Leech, while acting as marshal, collected quite a sum of money, representing a license tax, and appropriated the same to his own use. The court found that the money collected by him was not by virtue of his office as marshal or ex officio superintendent of streets, and that as such marshal he was not authorized or employed to collect any license in the city of Woodland; nor was it the duty or right of said Leech to collect such licenses, but that, by virtue of an ordinance duly passed by the board of trustees of said city, it was the duty of the city treasurer to collect all licenses in the city of Woodland. The sureties were therefore exonerated from liability, since their obligation contemplated and embraced only the faithful discharge of official duty on the part of their principal.

It is not disputed—indeed, it is conceded—that the sureties have a right to stand upon the strict letter of their bond, and that the only question involved in the case is whether, under the law, it was the duty of the marshal to collect said license tax. This is to be determined by the construction of sections 751 and 790 of the municipal corporation bill (St. 1883, pp. 250, 261). The former, as amended in 1901 (St. 1901, p. 70), after designating the officers in whom the government of a city of the fifth class shall be vested, contains this provision: "Provided, that the board of trustees may, in its discretion, by an ordinance adopted, published and recorded as required for general ordinances, at least thirty days before a general city election, at which city officers are to be elected, unite and consolidate certain offices by declaring: * * *

(3) The city treasurer elected shall be ex officio city tax collector and license tax collector." Said section 790, in prescribing the duties of the city marshal, provides that "he shall receive from the clerk all city licenses and collect the same." It is not disputed that said section 751 is a later enactment than section 790.

[1] Reading these two sections together, we think no reasonable doubt can exist that, after providing that the marshal should collect these license taxes, the Legislature concluded to authorize the board of trustees in their discretion to relieve the marshal of this duty and impose it upon the city treasurer. This view is immediately suggested by the most casual consideration of the terms employed. We would have no more significant or definite expression of the legislative intention if, in one section, it were enacted that "the marshal shall receive from the clerk all city licenses and collect the same, provided that the board of trustees may, in its discretion, by ordinance empower and direct the city treasurer to collect said licenses." If the two sections were so combined, the learned counsel for appellant would probably not deem it worth while to argue as to what the Legislature intended. It is true that, by said section 751, it is not provided in amplified form that the city trustees may authorize the city treasurer to collect the license tax, but this duty is necessarily implied in the term "license tax collector." When the Legislature empowered the city trustees to make the city treasurer ex officio license tax collector, it could mean nothing else than that they might constitute him "collector of the license tax." Manifestly certain public functions could not be so sentimentously designated, but in the case at bar the public duty is clearly and unequivocally set forth by the simple phraseology employed. Appellant suggests some examples wherein more elaboration would be required to make the grant of power specific and certain. The creation of an office, the incumbent being called "health officer," with no duties assigned, would probably not operate to relieve the marshal of his duties imposed by the statute appertaining to the public health. A similar situation would be presented in case of the designation "peace officer," or "police officer," or "executioner." These terms are too vague and indefinite to express any clear legislative intent as to the respective public duties to be performed. But we do not consider such instances analogous to this. The Legislature having authorized the city trustees to impose the duty of collecting these taxes upon the city treasurer, they are necessarily clothed with power to pass such subsidiary acts or ordinances as are incidental and necessary to the exercise of this duty by said treasurer.

[2] No one disputes the rule to be as stated by Mr. Dillon (1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations [4th Ed.] § 89) that: "It is a general and undisputed proposition of law that a municipal corporation possesses and can exercise the following powers and no others: (1) Those granted in express words; (2) those necessarily or fairly implied in or incident to the powers expressly granted; (3) those essential to the declared objects and purposes of the corporation—not simply convenient, but indispensable." It follows that we must give effect to the presumption that whatever ordinance was necessary to carry said section 751 into operation was adopted by said city trustees.

[3] We find nothing in the Constitution to preclude the Legislature from delegating this authority to the board of trustees. The condition simply amounts to a grant of power, to be exercised in the discretion of the trustees, to relieve one municipal officer of a ministerial executive duty and transfer it to another. Even if it be regarded as a legislative attempt to confer authority upon the local lawmaking body to create the office of city tax collector, it does not seem to be obnoxious to any constitutional provision. It is manifestly not the case where by ordinance the city trustees attempt to repeal or nullify a statute or to deprive any official of authority conferred by the Legislature, but it presents the instance, as already seen, of the exercise of power expressly delegated by legislative enactment.

It is not, of course, necessary for the Legislature to prescribe the duties of all city officers. This power may be conferred upon the city, and it is certainly competent for the Legislature to authorize the city to make changes in the duties of the various officers when it is deemed for the best interests of the community to do so. The constitutional limitation is prescribed in article 2, § 6, which provides that: "Corporations for municipal purposes shall not be created by special laws; but the Legislature, by general laws, shall provide for the incorporation, organization and classification, in proportion to population, of cities and towns, which laws may be altered, amended or repealed." It is not disputed that the grant of power in controversy is general in its nature within the contemplation of said constitutional provision, and, conceding that we have an instance of the creation of a municipal office, no reason is apparent why we may not accept, as an accurate statement of the governing principle in the case, the following from 28 Cyc. p. 400: "Municipal offices can only be created by legislation. This creative act may be either immediate when done by the General Assembly in which rests all inherent creative power for corporations, or delegated when the corporation is expressly empowered by charter or general law to create the office for itself. Creation by the municipality can only be effected by means of ordinance or by law. Offices may be created not only by express and positive act of legislation, but also by implication, as where an office is referred to as existing and the duties of the officers are prescribed, but the implication must be plain and certain."

In this connection the case of DeMerritt v. Weldon, 154 Cal. 545, 98 Pac. 537, 671, 16 Ann. Cas. 955, is somewhat instructive, although the facts there were different. The question involved was the authority of the city trustees to fix the salary of the marshal according to the following provision in section 855 of the municipal corporation bill: "The clerk, treasurer, marshal, and recorder shall severally receive, at stated times, a compensation, to be fixed by ordinance by the board of trustees, which compensation shall not be increased or diminished after their election or during their several terms of office." It was held that the power was clearly granted to the board of trustees to fix the compensation of the marshal "at any sum it deems proper, free from supervision or review on the part of the courts, subject to the limitation that it may not effectually provide that there shall be no compensation at all, nor practically destroy the office by fixing the compensation at so low a figure that no one would discharge the duties of the office for the compensation fixed. Such a provision by the trustees would conflict with the act of the Legislature and therefore would be void."

Instead of fixing his compensation, the trustees in the case at bar, authorized as they were by said section 751, relieved the marshal of a certain duty which otherwise, under said section 790, he would be required to perform. The effect is not to destroy the office of marshal or to contravene any general law, but the legislation is in furtherance of the general scheme to clothe the local governing body with a large measure of authority in the determination of the extent and character of the duties to be exercised by their subordinate executive officers. The rule, it may be said as to county officers, is different, and this explains many of the cases cited by appellant, as is indicated by the following quotation from People v. Wheeler, 136 Cal. 655, 69 Pac. 435: "For, with relation to county offices, it is the constitutional duty of the Legislature not only to provide for the election of the officers, but also to fix their terms of office, to prescribe their duties, and to regulate their salaries or compensation; and this duty could not be delegated to the board of supervisors or others. Const. art. 2, § 5; Ventura v. Clay, 112 Cal. 70 [44 Pac. 488]; County of Eldorado v. Meiss, 100 Cal. 274 [34 Pac. 716]; Farrell v. Board of Trustees, 85 Cal. 415 [24 Pac. 868]; County of Los Angeles v. Lopez, 104 Cal. 258 [38 Pac. 42]; People v. Johnson, 95 Cal. 471 [31 Pac. 611]; Dougherty v. Austin, 94 Cal. 601 [28 Pac. 834, 29 Pac. 1092, 16 L. R. A. 161]; Dwyer v. Parker, 115 Cal. 544 [47 Pac. 372]."

We think effect should be given to the intention of the Legislature as declared, and the judgment is affirmed.

WILSON et al. v. LEO. (Civ. 1,137.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Sept. 25, 1912. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 23, 1912.)

1. PROCESS (§ 96*)—PUBLICATION — SUFFICIENCY OF AFFIDAVIT.

Between the time of the filing of the complaint in October, 1908, and the filing of an affidavit for summons by publication in August, 1911, plaintiff sent two persons, at different times, to where he was informed defendant resided, in order to obtain service, and each person stated that they found the gates of the premises locked, with warnings thereon against vicious dogs, and that a gardener said that defendant was not there, and he did not know when she would be, though once a woman answering defendant's description came out upon the porch, but it was impossible to speak with her because of the dogs, in view of which facts the affidavit averred that defendant could not be found within the state, after diligent search made to find her. Held, that the affidavit was insufficient to support an order for service by publication.

2. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT (§ 57*)—SERVICE.

Plaintiff could resist a motion to dismiss, made for want of service of summons, by showing that defendant was absent from the state, or concealed herself to avoid service.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1011*)—CONCLUSIVENESS OF FINDINGS.

Whether defendant was absent from the state, or concealed herself to avoid service, is an issue of fact for the trial court; and its conclusion will not be disturbed where the evidence thereon substantially conflicts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by C. N. Wilson and another against Martha Herbst Leo. From a judgment of dismissal and an order quashing service of summons, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. J. Wood, Charles Lantz, and Davis, Lantz & Wood, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. George H. Kelch, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The complaint herein was filed and summons issued on October 31, 1908. On August 22, 1911, plaintiff Lantz filed and presented his affidavit, upon which, in accordance with his prayer, the court made an order directing that service of summons be made by the publication thereof. Affidavit of publication was made and filed October 31, 1911. Thereafter, and more than three years after the filing of the complaint, defendant moved to quash the service of summons so made by publication and dismiss the action; the ground therefor, among others, being the insufficiency of the affidavit upon which the order of publication was made, and that more than three years had elapsed since the filing of the complaint without due return of service of summons. This motion was granted; judgment of dismissal following. Plaintiffs appeal from the orders and the judgment of dismissal.

As appears from the affidavit filed on August 22, 1911, which was nearly three years after the filing of the complaint, the right to the order for service by publication was based upon the ground that, after diligent search to find her, defendant could not be found in the state, and that she concealed herself to avoid the service. Section 412, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that, "where the person on whom service is to be made * * * cannot, after due diligence, be found within the state, or conceals himself to avoid the service of summons, * * * and the fact appears by affidavit to the satisfaction of the court, or a judge thereof, * * * such court or judge may make an order that the service be made by the publication of the summons." In Rue v. Quinn, 137 Cal. 651, 66 Pac. 216, 70 Pac. 732, it is said: "In making the order for the service by publication, the judge acts judicially upon the evidence which the Code requires to be presented to him for that purpose, and can act upon no other evidence than such as is prescribed by the Code." And this evidence, according to the provisions of the Code, must be presented in the form of an affidavit, stating the fact upon which the court bases its conclusion that the party cannot be found, or conceals himself. The order recites that "upon reading and filing the affidavit of Charles Lantz, and it satisfactorily appearing therefrom to me that the defendant, Martha Herbst Leo, cannot, after due diligence, be found within the state," etc. It thus appears that at the time of making the order the court was satisfied of the existence of the fact that the defendant could not be found in the state. The question, therefore, presented is whether or not the matters stated in the affidavit were sufficient to establish the fact that defendant could not be found in the state.

[1] The affidavit shows that between the time of the filing of the complaint in October, 1908, and the date of the filing of the affidavit in August, 1911, plaintiffs sent "two persons, at different times," to the place where affiant was informed defendant resided in the county of Los Angeles, for the purpose of obtaining service upon defendant; that each of said persons returned the papers to affiant "with the information that they found the gates of said premises locked, and with signs thereon warning persons from entering the said premises on account of vicious dogs confined therein"; that these persons so attempting to make service of the papers were informed by a gardener upon the said premises that said defendant was not there, and that he did not know when she would be, "though at one of said times a woman answering the description of Mrs. Leo came out of the house located upon said premises, upon the front porch thereof, but that it was impossible for either of said process servers to reach the said house, or to speak with said woman, on account of said guard and of the said vicious dogs. Affiant therefore avers that the said defendant, Martha Herbst Leo, cannot be found within the state of California, after diligent search made to find her therein." This affidavit, in our judgment, was clearly insufficient to justify the making of the order for service by publication. No effort was made to obtain service through the sheriff of the county, whose official duty it is to serve process; nor is it made to appear that the two persons directed to make the service were in any manner qualified to serve papers. Moreover, the statements as to the efforts made by these two persons to serve the summons are based entirely upon the information obtained from them. "This statement is but hearsay, and may be wholly untrue, in fact, without any impeachment of the truthfulness of the affiant." See Kahn v. Matthai, 115 Cal. 689, 47 Pac. 698, where it is further said: "Where service of process upon a defendant within the county is attempted to be made by a person other than the sheriff, his affidavit should, as a rule, be required, showing the nature of the effort made to serve the party." Not only measuring the right to the order by the statute, but upon the authority of the case just cited, we are constrained to hold that the order was inadvertently and improperly made. Since this is true, it must necessarily follow that there was no abuse of discretion on the part of the court in making the order quashing service of summons.

[2, 3] Section 581a, Code of Civil Procedure, imposes upon the court the duty of dismissing an action, "unless the summons shall be served and return thereon made within three years after the commencement of said action." When the motion was made to quash the service and dismiss the action, more than three years had elapsed since the filing of the complaint, and by reason of the order quashing the service of summons there had been no service of summons, nor return thereon; hence defendant was clearly entitled to an order of dismissal, unless as provided for in the exception contained in said section 581a, the failure to serve summons on her was due to the fact that she had secreted herself within the state to prevent the service of summons, or was absent therefrom. While the order of publication, as shown by the recital therein, was based upon the fact, satisfactorily appearing to the court from the affidavit, that defendant could not, after due diligence, be found in this state, and not that she concealed herself to prevent service, we are, nevertheless, of the opinion that the plaintiffs might successfully resist a motion to dismiss, made for want of service of summons, by showing that defendant was absent from the state, or concealed herself to avoid service. This, however, like any other fact in issue, is for the trial court to determine upon the evidence introduced; and where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence touching the issue the conclusion of the trial court will not be disturbed. Conceding that at the hearing affidavits were presented to the court, on behalf of plaintiffs, tending to show that defendant did conceal herself within the state to prevent the service of summons, on the other hand, counter affidavits were filed presenting evidence which strongly tended to prove the contrary. The court having by its order of dismissal determined the issue against plaintiffs, such determination must be deemed conclusive thereon.

For the reasons given, the judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action by Bradley Bros., Incorporated, against Giles Bradley. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hillyer, Stringham & O'Brien, of San Francisco, for appellant. John T. Thornton and Leo C. Lennon, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. The plaintiff in this action sets up in three counts three distinct causes of action, all of which relate to and affect the title and the possession of several separate pieces of real estate situate in the county of Santa Clara.

Plaintiff alleges in its complaint that within five years preceding the commencement of the action it had the seisin and was in the possession of the several pieces of property in controversy. The complaint is not entirely free from ambiguity as to whether the plaintiff or the defendant was in the actual possession of the property at the precise time of the commencement of the action. No demurrer, however, was interposed upon this ground, and the complaint, when read and construed in conjunction with the prayer, warrants the inference that it was the purpose of the pleader to allege that, although the plaintiff had been in possession of the property at some time within five years of the commencement of the action, the defendant held the actual possession at the time of such commencement.

Each of the plaintiff's causes of action was founded upon the theory that the defendant holds the legal title to the property in dispute as trustee, in trust for the plaintiff, by virtue of involuntary and resulting trusts. The prayer of the complaint, in effect, was, among other things, that the defendant be declared to be the trustee for the plaintiff as to all of the property described in the complaint, and that the legal title thereto and the possession thereof be conveyed and restored to the plaintiff. At the trial of the case the third cause of action attempted to be set up in plaintiff's complaint was abandoned, thus leaving for the consideration of the trial court only the question of the defendant's trust relation to the two pieces of property involved and described in the first and second counts of plaintiff's complaint.

The action was commenced November 12, 1908; and it was alleged that the trust pleaded in the first cause of action was violated by defendant on December 26, 1903. The trust pleaded in the second cause of action was alleged to have been repudiated by the defendant within five years of the commencement of the action. The defendant, by his answer, denied all of the material allegations of the complaint, and, in addition to admitting a repudiation of the alleged trusts in the manner and at the time pleaded by the plaintiff, interposed as a defense to the action the statute of limitations as embodied in sections 343 and 318 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The facts alleged in the first cause of action were substantially as follows: Richard Bradley, plaintiff's grantor and predecessor in interest, purchased and paid for the land described in the first cause of action; but at his request the deed to said land was made out and recorded in the name of one Joseph L. Taafe by the vendor, Green. The property was conveyed to Taafe on December 15, 1898. The legal title thereto remained in and was held by Taafe up to December 26, 1903, when he, without the consent of plaintiff's grantor, Richard Bradley, conveyed the property by deed of this date to the defendant, Giles Bradley.

Assuming the allegations of the complaint to be true, the legal title was, in the first instance, undoubtedly in Taafe as a resulting trustee for the plaintiff's grantor, Richard Bradley; and the conveyance from Taafe to the defendant, Giles Bradley, merely transferred the outstanding legal title to the defendant as an involuntary trustee of Richard Bradley or his successors in interest.

It appears from the allegations of the second cause of action that one Robert J. Butler and wife were the owners of the parcel of land therein described; and that Richard Bradley, plaintiff's grantor, purchased said land from the Butlers and paid the price therefor. He requested that the deed therefor be made, executed, and recorded in the name of the defendant, Giles Bradley. This request was complied with, and subsequently and within five years, but more than four years preceding the commencement of the action, the defendant expressly repudiated the resulting trust thereby created.

It will thus be seen that the purpose of the action in part was to procure a decree declaring that the defendant held the legal title to the property in dispute in trust for the plaintiff under an involuntary trust in the first instance, and by virtue of a voluntary resulting trust in the second instance.

The case was tried without a jury, and judgment rendered and entered for the defendant upon the single finding of the ultimate fact that both causes of action finally relied upon by the plaintiff were barred solely by the provisions of section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appeal is from the judgment, and the case comes here upon the judgment roll alone.

The only point presented upon the record before us involves the correctness of the trial court's finding that plaintiff's causes of action were barred by the provisions of section 343, rather than by the provisions of section 318, Code of Civil Procedure.

In the absence of full findings upon all of the material issues raised by the pleadings, the judgment must stand or fall with the trial court's finding of fact that the plaintiff's causes of action were barred solely by the provisions of section 343, Code of Civil Procedure.

It is plaintiff's contention that the paramount purpose of the action is the recovery of real property and the possession thereof; and that therefore the limitation provided by section 318 of the Code of Civil Procedure is the only limitation of time which could be successfully invoked to bar and defeat plaintiff's cause. On the other hand, counsel for defendant insist that the sole purpose of the action was to establish, in the first instance, a constructive trust, and, in the second instance, a resulting trust, both of which were barred by the provisions of section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which declares that "an action for relief not heretofore provided for must be commenced within four years after the cause of action shall have accrued."

[1] If the present action, in its entirety, could be considered as one instituted solely for the enforcement of the trusts specified therein, it is certain that plaintiff's first cause of action, which is founded upon the allegation of the creation of an involuntary trust, would be barred upon the expiration of four years from the inception of the trust. In other words, the four-year limitation prescribed by section 343, Code of Civil Procedure, would commence to operate against plaintiff's first cause of action immediately upon the execution of the conveyance alleged to have been made, in the first instance, from Taafe to the defendant.

[2] The same limitation of time would commence to run against plaintiff's second cause of action from the time of the repudiation by the defendant of the resulting trust therein alleged, or rather from the time the notice of repudiation was brought home to the beneficiary. Hecht v. Slaney, 72 Cal. 363, 14 Pac. 88; Nougues v. Newlands, 118 Cal. 102, 50 Pac. 386; Norton v. Bassett, 154 Cal. 411, 97 Pac. 894, 129 Am. St. Rep. 162; Barker v. Hurley, 132 Cal. 21, 63 Pac. 1071, 64 Pac. 480; Butler v. Hyland, 89 Cal. 575, 26 Pac. 1108; Luco v. De Toro, 91 Cal. 405, 18 Pac. 866, 27 Pac. 1082; Odell v. Moss, 130 Cal. 352, 62 Pac. 555.

[3] Plaintiff insists, however, that the finding and enforcement of the specified trusts were not the only purposes of the action, but that it had for its purpose as well the conveyance of the property and the restoration of its possession to the plaintiff. From this it is argued that the action, in its entirety, must be considered and disposed of as one for the recovery of real property, and for the recovery of the possession thereof, within the meaning of section 318, Code of Civil Procedure.

In support of this contention the plaintiff relies mainly, if not entirely, upon the rule declared in the case of Murphy v. Crowley, 140 Cal. 141, 73 Pac. 820, where it was said, in effect, that the nature and purpose of a civil action must be determined largely from the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, and in a measure by the character of the relief sought and necessarily incident to the purpose and final determination of the action.

The primary purpose of the action in the case of Murphy v. Crowley was to set aside a conveyance of a tract of land alleged to have been procured by fraud and undue influence, and to enforce an alleged trust as to another tract. Incidentally the plaintiff there asked to have her title in one-half of each tract quieted, and at the same time sought to recover the possession thereof as against the defendants, who were alleged to be in adverse possession.

Although the gist of that action was the alleged fraud or mistake whereby the defendants obtained the legal title to the land in controversy, it was nevertheless held that, inasmuch as the complaint alleged facts which, as a matter of law, entitled the plaintiff to the possession of the property, the action was in reality one for the recovery of real property.

The purpose of the present action was, in effect, first, to determine who was the real owner of the property in dispute, and then to compel a conveyance of the legal title and the restoration of the possession thereof to the rightful owner. In other words, the pleaded facts of the present case showed that the plaintiff, upon the establishment of the trusts alleged, would, as a matter of law, be entitled to a decree placing it in possession of the property in controversy. Payne & Dewey v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 220, 243; Garwood v. Hastings, 38 Cal. 216; Goodnow v. Parker, 112 Cal. 437, 44 Pac. 738; Haggin v. Kelly, 136 Cal. 481, 69 Pac. 140; Daniels v. Dean, 2 Cal. App. 421, 84 Pac. 332.

[4] This being so, and applying the rule announced in Murphy v. Crowley, there is no escape from the conclusion that the present action must be considered and treated as an action, in part at least, for the recovery of real property and the possession thereof, within the meaning of section 318, Code of Civil Procedure. Accordingly, the five-year period prescribed by that section is the only limitation of time which can be properly invoked and applied in bar of the plaintiff's causes of action; and that limitation would commence to operate only from the time when the plaintiff lost the seisin or the possession of the property in suit, rather than from the time of the alleged repudiation of the trusts involved. Goodnow v. Parker, 112 Cal. 437, 443, 44 Pac. 738; Murphy v. Crowley, supra; Daniels v. Dean, supra; Union Ice Co. v. Doyle, 6 Cal. App. 284, 92 Pac. 112; Unkel v. Robinson (Sup.) 126 Pac. 485.

[5] In the case of Murphy v. Crowley the question of the applicability of the statute of limitations arose, and was decided upon an appeal from a judgment rendered upon an order sustaining a demurrer to the plaintiff's complaint; while the point presented for decision here comes to us upon an appeal from a judgment rendered after a trial was had upon the issues raised by the pleadings. In the present case counsel for the plaintiff and the defendant have assumed that the correctness of the lower court's finding might be properly determined solely upon a consideration of the nature of the action as revealed by the plaintiff's complaint; and the point is not made that upon the record before us the question involved could not be considered at all. This, however, in our opinion, presents the only debatable question in the case. It is the rule generally that, in the absence of a bill of exceptions or a statement of the case showing the evidence adduced at the trial, the findings of fact as made by the lower court are conclusive upon appeal to this court; and if the conclusions of law deduced from the findings of fact necessarily follow as a matter of law the judgment founded thereon will not ordinarily be disturbed.

The rule, however, cannot be applied to the situation here. Ordinarily a material defect in the findings is fatal to the judgment; and clearly no judgment should be sustained upon the findings alone, where it affirmatively appears that no such findings could have been properly made in any possible view of the case.

[6] Presumably the action was tried within the issues raised by the pleadings; but, even if this were not so, we cannot conceive a plausible theory of the case, or a possible turn in the evidence, which would take the case out of the category of an action for the recovery of real property, as defined in Murphy v. Crowley. However that may be, it is certain that no judgment in any given case could be sustained if it was based upon a conclusion of law which in turn rested upon a single finding of fact which was obviously foreign to the issues raised by the pleadings. For instance, if the lower court in this case had found as a fact that the plaintiff's causes of action were barred by the provisions of section 346, Code of Civil Procedure, which limits the time within which an action may be commenced to redeem a mortgage, it could not be successfully contended that such a finding would support the judgment. The present situation, we take it, is no different from the supposed one.

It is apparent, even in the absence of a record showing the evidence, that the action was erroneously determined upon the application of a statute of limitations which in no view of the case had any possible bearing upon the issues raised by the pleadings; and, if this be so, then it must be held that neither the lower court's conclusion of law, nor the judgment based thereon, are supported by the single finding of fact that the action was barred by the provisions of section 343, Code of Civil Procedure.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

Lajos Von Perhacs was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Philip C. Boardman and A. L. O'Grady, both of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

LENNON, P. J. The defendant in this case was convicted of the crime of rape. The information charged the defendant with having committed an act of sexual intercourse with a female child who was at the time under the age of 16 years and not his wife. The defendant has appealed from the judgment and from an order denying him a new trial.

The insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, the alleged erroneous modification of certain requested instructions, and the refusal of the lower court to grant a new trial upon alleged newly discovered evidence are the only points urged for a reversal.

[1] It is earnestly insisted, upon behalf of the defendant, that the verdict of the jury is not supported by the evidence, because the testimony of the prosecuting witness, taken as a whole, was so highly improbable that it is unworthy of belief. The facts upon which the prosecution sought and secured a conviction are substantially as follows: At the age of 13 years the prosecutrix was placed by her father in the home of and under the care and control of the defendant. The defendant was the father of several minor children, two boys and a girl, all of whom resided with him. The prosecutrix remained in the defendant's home and under his control for a period of two years or thereabouts, during all of which time she was cared for and treated as a member of his family. When the prosecutrix first entered the home of the defendant, she slept in the parlor of his residence, but shortly thereafter she was assigned by the defendant's mother-in-law—who apparently was also a member of his family—to a couch, which was located in the same room that the defendant and his wife occupied as a sleeping apartment. The prosecutrix was but 15 years of age at the time the defendant is alleged to have had intercourse with her. Her story, in effect, was that, shortly after she was received into the home of the defendant, he frequently fondled and caressed her. Sometimes this would occur when she was alone with the defendant, but oftentimes the defendant kissed and caressed her in the presence of his wife. Finally the defendant, on the 16th day of May, 1911, after he had retired with his wife for the night, and after the lights in the apartment had been extinguished, left his bed, went over to the prosecutrix, who had also retired, and sought her permission to share her bed. To this the prosecutrix objected and audibly protested. He pleaded, however, with her, and finally, upon the assurance of the defendant's wife that no harm was meant, she assented.

Without going into further details, the defendant on this occasion, notwithstanding the presence of his wife in an adjacent bed, eventually succeeded in accomplishing an act of sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix. Upon four succeeding nights the conduct of the defendant was repeated. Subsequently it developed that the prosecutrix was pregnant, and in course of time she gave birth to a child. Upon the trial the defendant and his wife both flatly contradicted the testimony of the prosecutrix at every point. In support of the claim that the evidence is insufficient to maintain the verdict, it is argued that it is inherently improbable that the defendant would attempt to perpetrate the offense charged against him in the presence of his wife, and that it is altogether inconceivable that the latter, who was the mother of a girl of about the same age as the prosecutrix, would acquiesce in and encourage its commission. While it must be conceded that there is much force in this contention, it is nevertheless not an argument directed against the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the prosecuting witness. Doubtless such an argument was addressed to the jury, and presumably it was by them given the consideration which it deserved.

[2] The weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses are in the first instance peculiarly within the province of the jury when deliberating upon the guilt or innocence of a defendant; and, once their verdict has been rendered, the determination of such questions rests solely with the trial judge in passing upon a motion for a new trial.

[3] His conclusion as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict will not be disturbed by this court save in those rare cases where it obviously appears that the testimony upon which the conviction was had is in and of itself, or when considered in conjunction with the undisputed facts of the case, so inherently improbable as to be impossible of belief, and therefore must be considered to be in effect no evidence at all. Fowden v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co., 149 Cal. 151, 86 Pac. 178; De Arellanes v. Arellanes, 151 Cal. 443, 90 Pac. 1059; Stout v. State, 22 Tex. App. 339, 3 S. W. 231.

The story of the prosecutrix in the case at bar is so out of the ordinary, and so revolting in many of its details, as to be startling in the extreme; and, while we doubt very much that its counterpart is to be found in the annals of criminal jurisprudence, nevertheless we are not prepared to say that it is so inherently improbable as to be absolutely unworthy of credence. Standing alone, the story of the prosecutrix is difficult to believe; but it is not unbelievable merely because it portrays an exceptional depth of domestic depravity. To so hold would be, as was said in the case of Stout v. State, supra, "purely a speculative attempt to sound the depths of human depravity and to assign arbitrary rules beyond which desire and passion are to be held incapable of seducing or impelling human nature." But, apart from these considerations, the record reveals the fact that the defendant, during his incarceration in the county jail, practically confessed his guilt to a fellow prisoner. In that behalf the defendant was quoted as saying: "I am like any other man. I like a young chicken. I did very wrong, but I can't help it. I think I will get out of it." This testimony was strengthened rather than shaken by a vigorous and searching cross-examination. The witness who gave it left the stand unimpeached; and, although the defendant subsequently became a witness in his own behalf, he did not attempt to explain or deny the statements attributed to him, notwithstanding that they were tantamount to a confession of guilt and were certain to weigh heavily against him in the deliberations of the jury.

Under the rule above stated, we would be powerless to disturb the judgment, even if the verdict upon which it was founded had rested solely upon the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecutrix; and, when considered in connection with the defendant's undisputed admission of guilt, the credibility of the story told by the prosecutrix is taken out of the realm of speculation, and such testimony becomes more than sufficient to support the verdict and judgment. Many matters of evidence are adverted to in detail by counsel for the defendant in an effort to support the claim of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict and judgment; but these likewise were matters exclusively for the jury to determine, and it would serve no useful purpose to specifically detail and discuss them here.

[4] The defendant's motion for a new trial was grounded in part upon the claim of newly discovered evidence; and, in support of the motion, the affidavits of three witnesses, who had testified on behalf of the defendant at the trial, were used. Their testimony had been introduced for the purpose of impeaching the statement of the prosecutrix that she habitually slept upon a couch in the same room with defendant and his wife. To the surprise and discomfiture of counsel for the defendant, their testimony tended to corroborate rather than discredit the story told by the prosecutrix. The affidavits of these witnesses were to the effect that, when testifying at the trial, they were so excited and disconcerted that they gave false and mistaken testimony upon the subject of where the prosecutrix was in the habit of sleeping, and that, if the defendant was granted a new trial, they would testify that the prosecutrix did not sleep in the same room with the defendant and his wife. Assuming all this to be so, and assuming further that these witnesses were in a position to testify upon the subject from their own knowledge, their modified testimony would be but corroboration of other witnesses to the same effect who so testified, and therefore, at its best, would be merely cumulative. A new trial will not be granted because of newly discovered evidence which is merely cumulative. This rule is so well settled and generally so well understood that we need not support it by the citation of authorities.

[5] The affidavits of several prisoners in the county jail were also offered and received upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial, which tended in some slight degree to impeach the evidence of the witness who testified to the defendant's admission of guilt. No showing was made, however, in explanation of the failure to produce these affiants as witnesses at the trial, and it does not appear that with reasonable diligence their testimony could not have been had in the first instance.

[6] Moreover, the only tendency of their testimony, if it had been produced, would have been to impeach the testimony of a witness for the prosecution, and therefore it was not of a character to warrant the granting of a new trial. People v. Anthony, 56 Cal. 397; People v. McCurdy, 68 Cal. 576, 10 Pac. 207; People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 328, 19 Pac. 161; People v. Holmes, 126 Cal. 462, 58 Pac. 917. In its entirety, we are satisfied that the showing made in support of the motion for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence was insufficient, and therefore the motion was properly denied.

[7] The defendant requested the court to give to the jury the following instruction: "Evidence of good character is evidence relevant to the question of guilty or not guilty, and is to be considered by you in connection with the other facts and circumstances in the case. One object in laying it before the jury is to induce the jury to believe, from the improbability that a person of good character should have conducted himself as alleged, that there is some mistake or misrepresentation in the evidence on the part of the prosecution, and in this connection you must take it into consideration." This instruction was given as requested, with the modification by the trial court that, "If you are satisfied to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty as charged in the information herein, it will be your duty to so find him, notwithstanding such evidence of good character." Counsel for the defendant insists that the requested instruction as modified is contradictory and confusing, and that the modification might be construed by the jury to mean that they were at liberty to entirely disregard the evidence of the defendant's good character. The instruction, as modified by the court, correctly and without conflict stated the law (People v. Shepardson, 49 Cal. 630; People v. Ashe, 44 Cal. 288; People v. Bell, 49 Cal. 485); and no confusion as to its meaning could possibly arise in the minds of the jury except upon a strained and unreasonable interpretation of the language employed. The plain meaning of the instruction as a whole was that if, after weighing all the evidence, including that of the good character of the defendant, the jury believed him guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, they should bring in a verdict accordingly, notwithstanding the fact that the defendant had previously borne a good reputation.

[8] At the request of the defendant, the trial court also charged the jury that, "Where, as in this case, the prosecution relies for a conviction of the defendant upon the testimony of the prosecutrix alone, and no other witnesses are called by the state to testify directly to the time or place or circumstances of the alleged offense, then and in such case you should view such testimony with great caution, and it is the duty of the court to warn the jury of the danger of a conviction upon such testimony." In this connection the court further charged, in the language of section 1844 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that, "The direct evidence of one witness who is entitled to full credit is sufficient proof of any fact * * *"; and then proceeded to say, "This provision of the law attaches to the testimony of Catherine Clark (the prosecutrix); and therefore, if you are satisfied to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt from her testimony that the defendant had sexual intercourse with her within the meaning of the allegations of the information herein, it will be your duty to resolve that proposition of fact on the side of the people, notwithstanding that no other witness has testified to the same effect." Counsel for the defendant would have us construe these instructions to mean "that the direct testimony of Catherine

Clark, who is entitled to full credit, is sufficient proof of the fact testified to by her." Obviously the instructions complained of cannot be so construed without transposing the language used and deliberately distorting the very evident purpose and intent of the instructions to advise the jury that, although they should be cautious in accepting the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecutrix, nevertheless they were not required to acquit the defendant merely because her testimony was uncorroborated. Such is the law; and in our opinion the instructions complained of could not have been given by the jury the interpretation claimed by counsel for defendant.

This disposes of all the points raised by the defendant. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Thomas Davis against W. J. Davis and others. From the judgment and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Tanner, Taft & Odell, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Bernard Potter, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Defendants W. J. Davis and Ida R. Davis on March 25, 1904, executed their promissory note payable to J. R. Thacker for the sum of $1,000 one year after date, and contemporaneously therewith gave a mortgage upon two certain lots of land at Santa Monica to secure the payment of said promissory note. On the 24th day of March, 1905, the mortgagee assigned the note and mortgage to plaintiff, who thereafter remained the owner of same. On the 30th day of June, 1910, the mortgagors entered into an agreement which was thereafter consummated, by the terms of which they exchanged the property, so mortgaged with appellant Lula H. Plowman, the agreement of exchange containing this clause relative to the mortgage indebtedness referred to and existing against the property of defendants W. J. and Ida R. Davis: "Above property subject to a mortgage of one thousand dollars to be assumed by owners of first piece." The Davises on their part assumed an incumbrance of $1,500 then existing against the property of Lula H. Plowman which they received in exchange for their own lots. This action was brought on September 22, 1910, to foreclose the mortgage given by the Davises to secure the payment of the $1,000 note; Lula H. Plowman and her husband, A. J. Plowman, being made defendants, and it being alleged in the complaint that on the 30th day of June, 1910, the date of the making of the agreement of exchange between the Davises and Lula H. Plowman, "the said defendants W. J. Davis, Ida R. Davis, Lula H. Plowman, and A. J. Plowman, in writing, acknowledged said note and mortgage and indebtedness, and assumed and agreed to pay the same." Defendants Davis made no appearance in the action, and their default was therefore regularly entered. Defendants Plowman appeared, and among other defenses, set up the plea that the note and mortgage debt was barred by the provisions of section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The trial court made its findings generally in favor of plaintiff, and found that the agreement of exchange with the conditions hereinbefore mentioned had been duly made between the parties, but found in favor of defendants Plowman on the plea of the statute of limitations.

[1] It will be noticed from the foregoing statement of facts that at the time the agreement of exchange was made between the Plowmans and Davises the statute of limitations had already run against the mortgage debt of $1,000 owing by the Davises to Thomas Davis, the assignee of their mortgage, and hence also the statute had completely run at the time this action was commenced. The case presents mainly the one question as to whether the Plowmans, having expressly assumed the mortgage indebtedness theretofore existing against the property which they received in exchange for their own, could in an action brought to foreclose the mortgage be allowed to defend on the ground that the statute of limitations had run against the debt. It very clearly appears that the assumption of the $1,000 mortgage debt by the Plowmans was a part of the consideration moving from them to the Davises in the exchange of properties; in other words, as a part of the purchase price, instead of paying $1,000 to the Davises in addition to the transfer of their real estate, they agreed to pay the debt then admitted to be owing by the Davises to the plaintiff.

The agreement in this respect was one which the parties had the right to make and one which they did voluntarily and expressly enter into. In the case of Washer v. Independent M. and D. Co., 142 Cal. 708, 76 Pac. 656, our Supreme Court, referring to contracts of a similar nature, has said: "It was nothing to defendant as to whom the purchase money should be paid. If its grantors requested the payment of $4,500 to plaintiff, and defendant agreed to pay said sum, it will not now be allowed to defend this action upon the ground that its grantors did not owe plaintiff. It is not the business of the defendant to go upon a tour of investigation as to the merits of plaintiff's claim against its grantors after agreeing to pay it. If its grantors were satisfied that they owed plaintiff, defendant cannot, after agreeing to pay the indebtedness, claim that nothing was due. It was said by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in Merriman v. Moore, 90 Pa. 81: 'A vendor may direct how the purchase money shall be paid. He may reserve it to himself, donate it to a public charity, or may make such other disposition of it as may best meet his views, and if his vendee agrees to pay it, according to such directions, he cannot set up a defense that his vendor was under no duty to apply it in such manner.'" See, also, Hopkins v. Warner, 109 Cal. 133, 41 Pac. 868. We quote again from the case of Williams v. Naftzger, 103 Cal. 440, 37 Pac. 411, on the same subject: "An agreement on the part of a grantee to pay and discharge a mortgage debt upon the granted premises for which his grantor is liable renders the grantee liable therefor to the mortgagee, and in an action for the foreclosure of the mortgage, if the mortgaged premises are insufficient to satisfy the mortgage debt, judgment may be rendered against him as well as against the mortgagor for the amount of such deficiency. This liability results from the familiar doctrine in equity that a creditor is entitled to the benefit of all securities or collateral obligations that his principal debtor may have given to the surety for the payment of the debt. By the conveyance of the mortgaged premises and the assumption of the mortgage debt by the grantee, the latter, as between him and his grantor, becomes primarily liable to the mortgagee, and his vendor becomes his surety. Halsey v. Reed, 9 Paige [N. Y.] 452; Crowell v. Currier, 27 N. J. Eq. 154; Crawford v. Edwards, 33 Mich. 354; Keller v. Ashford, 133 U. S. 622 [10 Sup. Ct. 494, 33 L. Ed. 667]; Biddel v. Brizolara, 64 Cal. 354 [30 Pac. 609]; Jones on Mortgages, 741, 752."

[2] The argument of these cases is that a party who expressly agrees to pay a particular debt which the person contracting with him admits that he owes to a third party cannot thereafter be heard to say that the debt is not owing, and much less, to our minds, should he be permitted to urge that, while the debt was once due from the person with whom he has contracted, the statute of limitations has intervened to prevent its collection. The Plowmans by their contract made with the Davises expressly admitted that the premises which they received were subject to the lien of the mortgage incumbrance, and the Davises chose to consider that debt as being a live and existing obligation required to be performed by them on their part. It follows that, if the Plowmans were permitted to maintain this defense, the result would be that they would not pay for the property all that they had agreed to pay. In line with what we have said, the Supreme Court of Michigan has decided that, where a vendee assumes the payment of a mortgage indebtedness he waives all defenses thereto except payment. Terry v. Durand Land Co., 112 Mich. 665, 71 N. W. 525.

We think that the complaint was properly framed in the form it was presented, plaintiff seeking to foreclose his mortgage and alleging the assumption of the mortgage debt by the Plowmans in the manner stated. For the reasons we have given, we think the trial court erred in concluding that the indebtedness was barred as to respondents.

The appeal is taken by plaintiff from the judgment and also from an order denying a new trial, which judgment and order are reversed.

2. HIGHWAYS (§ 6*)—ESTABLISHMENT—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The statute (Pol. Code, § 2619), in effect January 1, 1873, providing that roads laid out and recorded as highways by order of the board of supervisors, and roads used as such for five years, are highways, is in the nature of a statute of limitations which gives to the public the right to use a road as a highway in case it has been so used for five years prior to the repeal of the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 8, 9; Dec. Dig. § 6*]

3. HIGHWAYS (§ 5*)—ESTABLISHMENT BY USER—EVIDENCE.

Where there was evidence that a traveled track was not confined to the center of a strip, but was sometimes on one side and sometimes on the other, but the width of the space passed over was at least 40 feet, a finding of a highway 40 feet wide by user was authorized.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 6, 7; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

4. HIGHWAYS (§ 158*)—OBSTRUCTIONS—ACTIONS FOR REMOVAL—FINDINGS—SUFFICIENCY—"DEDICATION."

Where the complaint in a suit to abate a nuisance on a highway alleged that the strip of land was duly laid out as a highway, and both parties introduced, without objection, evidence of the laying out or establishing of the highway, its user and dedication, a judgment granting relief would not be disturbed merely because the court found that the strip had been used as a highway since a designated date, and that since such date it had been a duly dedicated highway; the term "dedication" being used to define the right arising from the user shown and found.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§§ 533, 717*)—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—RECORD—OPINION OF TRIAL COURT.

The opinion of the trial court appended to respondent's brief is no part of the record, and may not be used to supply findings or to support the findings or judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2339, 2400, 2967; Dec. Dig. §§ 533, 717.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 934*)—FINDINGS—CONSTRUCTION—REVIEW.

The court on appeal must give the trial court's findings such a construction as will support the judgment, provided that can reasonably be done without violating the plain import of the language used; and a finding that a road "is now, and ever since" a designated past date has been, used as a highway does not apply to any period prior to the designated date.

7. HIGHWAYS (§ 158*)—ESTABLISHMENT—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

A deed conveying for road purposes a strip 20 feet wide does not justify a finding of a way 40 feet wide.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 430, 431, 435; Dec. Dig. § 158.*]

8. EVIDENCE (§ 67*)—PRESUMPTIONS—EXISTENCE OF FACTS.

The maxim in Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 32, that a thing once proved to exist continues as long as is usual with things of that nature does not work backwards.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 87, 88, 103; Dec. Dig. § 67.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by the People of the State of California against Quong Sing and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

Meredith & Landis, of Sacramento, for appellants. Chas. A. Tuttle and Ben. P. Tabor, both of Auburn, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action for the abatement of a nuisance alleged to consist of obstructions placed and now being maintained by defendants on a public highway. Plaintiff had judgment, from which defendants appeal.

The charging part of the amended complaint reads as follows: "(1) That a certain road and highway in the town of Newcastle, county of Placer, state of California, described as commencing at the northeast corner of the Rice tract, according to the plat of the Rice tract now on file in the office of the recorder of the county of Placer, running thence in a southeasterly direction to a point opposite a house known as the C. M. Silva house in the said town of Newcastle, said road and highway being 40 feet in width along the east line of the said Rice tract, is now, and at all the times herein-after mentioned was, a duly laid out public highway of the county of Placer, state of California. (2) That defendants, during the month of December, 1910, built and constructed a fence and barn on said highway at a place known as Newcastle Chinatown, and are now maintaining said fence and barn on said highway at said place."

A general demurrer was overruled, and defendants answered, denying the existence of the alleged highway, in the following terms:

"(1) Deny that a certain or any road or highway in the town of Newcastle, county of Placer, state of California, described as commencing at the northeast corner of the Rice tract, according to the plat of said Rice tract on file, at the time of the commencement of the foregoing entitled action, or now, in the office of the recorder of the said county of Placer, state of California, and running thence in a southeasterly direction to a point opposite a house known as the C. M. Silva house in said town of Newcastle, is now, or was at the time of the commencement of the foregoing entitled action, or was at any of the times referred to in said amended complaint, a duly, or otherwise, or at all, laid out public, or otherwise, highway, either of the said county of Placer, state of California, or otherwise, or at all; deny that said alleged road or highway is, or was at the time of the commencement of the foregoing entitled action, or was at any of the times mentioned in said amended complaint, of the width of 40 feet, or any number of feet, or any width whatever." Defendants also deny that they or either of them constructed the fence or barn as alleged in the complaint "or at any other place or point"; deny that said fence and barn obstruct said alleged highway; and deny maintaining said or any obstruction.

The court made the following findings: "(1) That a certain road and highway in the town of Newcastle, county of Placer, state of California, described as commencing at the northeast corner of the Rice tract according to the plat of the Rice tract now on file in the office of the recorder of the county of Placer, and running thence in a southeasterly direction along the east line of the Rice tract to Cypress street, said road and highway being 40 feet in width, is now, and ever since the 14th day of April, 1902, has been, used by plaintiffs as a highway. (2) That defendants, during the year 1910, built and constructed a fence and barn on the road and highway hereinbefore described in finding 1, and are now maintaining said fence and barn on said road and highway. (3) That the said fence and barn, built, constructed, and maintained on said road and highway by defendants, are an obstruction on said road and highway, and interfere with the free and comfortable use and enjoyment of said road and highway by plaintiffs."

As conclusions of law the court found: "That the said road and highway described herein in finding 1 is now, and ever since the 14th day of April, 1902, has been, a duly dedicated highway of the county of Placer. (2) That the fence and barn, built and constructed by defendants on said highway, constitute a nuisance." There is a separate appeal from the order denying motion for a new trial, No. 857, which, by stipulation, is to be heard with the appeal from the judgment.

The finding is that said parcel of land "is now, and ever since the 14th day of April, 1902, has been, used by plaintiff as a highway." The judgment employs the terms, used in the conclusion of law, that said parcel of land is "now, and ever since the 14th day of April, 1902, has been, a duly dedicated public highway." The averment of the complaint is that said strip of land "is now, and at all the times hereinafter mentioned was, a duly laid out public highway." Defendants state in their brief that there is but one question to be determined, namely, "Is the strip of land described in the complaint a public highway or a private right of way?"

[1] The record is voluminous, comprising the testimony of many witnesses, and, as to the existence and location of the highway, is sharply conflicting. Without confining themselves to the issues presented by the pleadings, both sides submitted evidence, without objection, as to the existence of a public road along the land described in the complaint, when it was first used as such, how it was used by the public and became a public way, and tracing the title to the land from the general government to the present owners. There was evidence tending to show that a roadway was used by the public along the strip of land in controversy, leading to and from the town of Newcastle, as early as in the year 1863, and that this use had been continuous. The proceedings of the board of supervisors of Placer county were introduced, which showed that in May,

1872, a roadway therein described was recognized as then in use as a highway, and it was shown that this roadway was substantially along the strip of land in question. This declaration of the board of supervisors was made under the act of February 24, 1872 (Stats. 1871-72, p. 142), which provided that all public roads and trails in Placer county, "located in accordance with the provisions of this act, are hereby declared public highways." Section 6 of the act provided that the board should, in the month of May, 1872, "inspect the records of the roadmasters and, by order entered in the Record Book of Roads, shall determine and declare what roads and trails heretofore used as public highways shall be highways, which order shall distinctly state the beginning, general course and terminus of such roads and trails, and that from thenceforth that such roads and trails shall be declared and dedicated as public highways." The act of March 30, 1874 (Stats. 1873-74, p. 833), declared that all public roads in the county of Placer, located and established "in accordance with the present road law, and recorded in the Record Book of Roads and Highways of said county or which may hereafter be so located, are hereby declared public highways." In 1872 the title to this land was in the United States, and passed to the Central Pacific Railroad Company in 1875 by patent. In 1866, prior to the date of the grant to the railroad company, Congress granted the right of way over public lands for roads, highways, ditches, etc. (U. S. Rev. Stats. § 2477 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 1567]); and the Supreme Court has held that proof of user by the public for the statutory period, under the act of 1873, constitutes the dedication of the land as a highway. S. P. R. R. Co. v. City of Pomona, 144 Cal. 339, 345, 77 Pac. 929, and cases there cited.

[2] There was no evidence that this road was ever abandoned as a highway. Section 2619, in effect January 1, 1873, provided that: "Roads laid out and recorded as highways by order of the board of supervisors, and all roads used as such for a period of five years are highways." There was evidence that the parcel of land involved was used as a highway for more than five years prior to 1873. This act was repealed in 1874 (Stats. 1873-74, p. 116), but it has been held that the act of 1873 was "in the nature of a statute of limitations, which gives to the public the right to use the road as a highway in case it has been so used." Bolger v. Foss, 65 Cal. 250, 3 Pac. 871, and cases noted in S. P. R. R. Co. v. City of Pomona, supra. There was evidence tending to show that in 1879 one Haight, the then owner, conveyed to Quong Yet Lung certain land lying mostly north of this strip but embracing a portion of it at its northerly end and south of the railroad right of way; also certain land to Quong Sing lying along the north boundary of this strip. Haight conveyed to Quong Sing a strip of land containing one-twentieth of an acre, which occupies a part of said road southerly from the land of Quong Yet Lung to Cypress street. The deed contains the following clause: "Conditioned that said strip of twenty feet shall be dedicated to and exclusively used for road purposes, for the benefit of property east of same, deeded to Quong Sing, and on the north deeded to Quong Yet Lung." It was by right of this deed, as we gather from the evidence, that the obstructions complained of were placed in the highway. The fence was erected along the highway, but did not connect with any other fence, and performed no office except to prevent the occupants of the land on the west side of the road from reaching it. There was evidence that this roadway was traveled from the year 1863, without its being interfered with, until the Central Pacific Railroad crossed it with trestle work under which the highway was traveled; that about 1876 an earth fill was substituted for this trestle work, thus shutting off the travel by that road past Chinatown, but travel to the inhabitants of Chinatown continued over this road to the railroad embankment without interference until obstructed as now complained of.

[3] As to the width actually traveled, witnesses varied in their testimony, but there was evidence that, after Chinatown was established, the buildings on the east of the road were treated as the eastern boundary, and the buildings and inclosures on the west as the western boundary. There was evidence that the traveled track was not confined to the center of this strip, but was sometimes on one side and sometimes on the other, as well as at points in the middle, but that the width of the space thus passed over was at least 40 feet. It was held in S. P. R. R. v. City of Pomona, supra, that, where the evidence tends to show the user of a street to the width found by the court, the fact that the main travel was confined to narrower limits is not conclusive of the width. The record of the proceedings of the board of supervisors of 1872 does not mention the width of the road then declared to be a highway, but it is fair to assume that the board contemplated a width at least equal to that in use. That there was a roadway used by the public continuously from about the year 1863 over this strip of land is abundantly shown by the testimony, and upon this point there is no serious conflict. The conflicting testimony was chiefly as to its precise location. We think, however, there was sufficient evidence that the location was substantially as claimed in the complaint and shown in the findings. We think, too, that, regardless of any claim of a highway by virtue of the proceedings of the board of supervisors in 1872, and regardless of any view that may be taken of the reservation in the Haight deed of April 14, 1902, there was sufficient evidence to show, by user for 10 years prior to 1873, that the land in question became a highway by virtue of the act of 1873.

[4] In this condition of the record we are asked for a reversal of the judgment and order for the reason that finding 1 is not responsive to the issue presented by the pleadings, and this because the complaint alleges that this strip of land was "duly laid out" as a highway, while the finding is that it "has been used" as a highway since April 14, 1902, and the conclusion of law was, as is also the judgment, that the land, "ever since the 14th day of April, 1902, has been a duly dedicated highway." (Italics as used by appellants.) The argument runs thus: The complaint avers that this strip of land was "duly laid out," and it cannot be said that a finding that it "has been used" as a highway is in any sense responsive to the issue, and there is no finding that the strip was "duly laid out" as a highway. Furthermore it is contended that a finding that a strip of land "has been used as a highway" cannot sustain a conclusion of law and judgment that said strip of land is and has been "a duly dedicated public highway"; that the judgment decrees more than is asked in the complaint, and the finding of a user is in excess of the averment of the complaint. These points are followed up by authorities showing the distinction in law between these various forms of expression and that they are not legal equivalents. Had these points been raised in the course of the trial, and the court had been asked to limit the evidence strictly to the averments of the complaint, a different question would be before us, had the rulings been such as to raise it. But both sides invited the greatest latitude, and evidence, without objection, was addressed to the laying out or establishing of the road to its user and to its dedication. We think the court was justified in dealing with the case as counsel dealt with it, and was not confined strictly to the paper-made issues, for counsel seem not to have observed them. The question both sides were seeking to solve was the question as appellants stated it in their opening brief—Is the strip of land in controversy a public highway or a private right of way? The question as to how it became the one or the other, if either, was opened up and free hand given for its exploitation. It may safely be assumed that terms used by the learned trial judge were not used in their strictest legal sense, and that, in the sense intended, the "dedication" adjudged might arise from the user shown and found. Proof of user under the act of 1873 for the statutory period was said, in the Pomona Case, supra, to constitute a dedication.

[5-8] The question of more difficulty arises out of the finding and conclusion of law that the said road "is now, and ever since the 14th day of April, 1902, has been, used by plaintiffs as a highway" (finding) "a duly dedicated highway" (conclusion of law and judgment). It is contended that the "findings and conclusions of the court show an election on the part of the court to stand upon the deed from Haight to the defendants hereinbefore set forth, and to eliminate from consideration entirely the testimony addressed to the period anterior to February 14, 1902." It is further contended that, even if this deed may be construed to constitute a dedication of the strip of land to the public, the court erred in doubling the width so dedicated. The court rendered a written opinion which is appended to respondent's brief. This, however, forms no part of the record, and cannot be used to supply findings or to support either findings or judgment. This opinion shows that the court had in view all the evidence as well as the condition in the Haight deed in reaching its conclusion that a highway "is now, and ever since the 14th day of April, 1902, has been, used by plaintiffs as a highway." It is our duty to give the findings and conclusions of law a construction in support of the judgment, if it can reasonably be done without violating the plain import of the language used. We find ourselves unable to give the language used a reasonable construction which would justify our holding that the terms "ever since the 14th day of April, 1902," meant any period prior thereto. If the court had intended to place its finding in part on proof of user or dedication prior to that date, it would have been a very simple matter to accomplish it by framing a finding accordingly. The correspondence of the date with that of the Haight deed is more than a coincidence; and, if we were to consult the written opinion of the court, it would plainly appear that the date, and the earliest date at which the court fixed the existence of a highway, was a date founded on the Haight deed, which the court regarded as evidence of dedication to the public. But the finding is not thus supported, for this deed conveyed a strip 20 feet wide, whereas the court found the strip to be 40 feet wide. If a court should find that on April 14, 1902, A. was, and ever since has been, a trespasser on certain land, we do not think such a finding could be reasonably construed to mean that A. was a trespasser years before that date. If an issue had been tendered by the pleadings or by the evidence, in the case supposed, of trespass at some prior date, the findings should respond to such issue. Counsel for respondents say that April 14, 1902, "was selected, not because the right to use as a highway, in the opinion of the court, dated from that day, but as a convenient date from which to reckon." The language bears out no such explanation. We have a Code maxim "that a thing once proved to exist continues as long as is usual with things of that nature (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 32); but this maxim does not work backwards. The evidence, other than the Haight deed and user after April 14, 1902, was not of itself sufficient to support the finding.

The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered upon the evidence submitted at the former trial and such additional evidence as may be offered by either or both of the parties.

Edward Wilson was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Edward O'Dea and John F. Brady, both of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of robbery, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for a term of 12 years. The appeal is from the judgment and an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The cause was on our last calendar for argument, and, when called, counsel for defendant failed to argue it, but obtained time within which to file a brief. No brief having been filed, and the time allowed therefor having expired, the court this day ordered the matter to be submitted for decision.

On examination of the record, we find that no reporter's transcript has been filed, and the time for such filing, under section 1247 of the Penal Code, or any extension thereof which could be granted under section 1247d of said Code, has long since elapsed. The appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial cannot, therefore, be considered.

So far as the appeal from the judgment is concerned, we have examined the judgment roll, and find nothing therein which lends any support to the defendant in such appeal.

The judgment and order are accordingly affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by F. Schumacher against Arthur B. Langford, as Sheriff. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Thomas E. Haven, of San Francisco, and H. E. Wilcox and D. M. Burnett, both of San Jose, for appellant. S. G. Tompkins, of San Jose, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This action was brought for the purpose of obtaining a writ of mandate, commanding the defendant, as sheriff of the county of Santa Clara, to execute and deliver to plaintiff a deed of conveyance of certain real estate theretofore sold by him under execution. Judgment was entered as prayed, and this appeal is from such judgment and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The facts of the case are that on December 21, 1906, a judgment was duly rendered against Ada B. Moody for a certain sum of money. On July 10, 1907, the judgment being still in full force, a writ of execution was duly issued thereon, to satisfy which the defendant, as sheriff of said county of Santa Clara, on the 8th day of August, 1907, regularly sold to the plaintiff the property described in the complaint belonging to the judgment debtor, Mrs. Ada B. Moody. On the 7th day of August, 1908, Mrs. Moody called at the office of Herman Murphy, a loan broker doing business in San Francisco, and informed him that the following day would be the last on which he could redeem such property, and requested him to obtain for her the sum of $2,300 to assist her in effecting a redemption thereof. She already had the sum of $916.54, and she turned it over to Murphy to be used with the $2,300 to make up the sum necessary to make the redemption. Murphy arranged to have Henry S. Bridge, a client of his, advance the $2,300. For this sum a promissory note was executed by Mrs. Moody, secured by an assignment of her interest in the estate of her deceased husband; and assignment of a note and mortgage owned and held by her brother, one Guy Hinton, and a promissory note of her mother to Bridge for the sum of $2,300, secured by a deed of trust covering real estate in San Francisco. "Nothing," says the statement on appeal, "was said or done at that time or thought of with regard to a deed of the property in question in this suit from Mrs. Moody to Bridge." On the 8th day of August (the following day) Murphy, accompanied by Mrs. Moody, went to the sheriff's office at San Jose, and having made a proper tender of the amount of money necessary to effect a redemption, demanded a sheriff's deed to the property and requested that it be made to Bridge. The sheriff informed Murphy and Mrs. Moody that in order to obtain such deed to Bridge it would be necessary to have an assignment by the purchaser of the certificate of sale. Being unable to procure such assignment, the parties were referred to the sheriff's attorney, who instructed them that in order to carry out their desire it would be necessary for Mrs. Moody to make a deed to the property to Bridge. This was done. Murphy exhibited the deed to the sheriff, and demanded a certificate of redemption in the name of Bridge, which, upon payment of the amount due, was issued as requested. The statement on appeal shows that no arrangements had been made with regard to a deed, nor had any been thought of between the parties until it was mentioned by the sheriff's attorney, and the purpose of the deed was solely to enable Bridge to redeem in his own name. It also appears that at the time of the transaction nothing was said by either Mrs. Moody or Murphy or anybody as to reconveying the property in case of repayment of the $2,300, and that the first mention of it was about 25 days afterwards, when Murphy wrote a letter to Mrs. Moody stating that Bridge would reconvey the property to Mrs. Moody upon the repayment of the loan.

Upon these facts the court found that the redemption thus effected was made by Bridge as a redemptioner (mortgagee) and not as successor in interest of Mrs. Moody, and was void for the reason that Bridge, being a redemptioner under section 701, Code of Civil Procedure (subd. 2), had not produced to the sheriff, or served with his notice to that officer, a note of the record of his mortgage certified by the recorder, nor an affidavit showing the amount then due upon his lien, as required by section 705 of the same Code.

In this we think the court erred.

[1] A mortgagee, when redeeming from an execution sale under the provisions of section 705, Code of Civil Procedure, is acting in his own interest to protect his lien already existing, and upon the completion of the redemption becomes, (in default of subsequent redemption by the judgment debtor or other lienholders) the owner of the property freed from the interest of the judgment debtor. The circumstances of the redemption in this case were entirely different.

It is strongly urged by the appellant that Murphy, in making the redemption, was acting in behalf of Mrs. Moody, and that there had been no agreement between them that the property when redeemed should be held by Bridge as further security for his loan; that Mrs. Moody, being unversed in legal matters and without any independent legal advisor, made the deed to Bridge, which enabled him to obtain from the sheriff the certificate of redemption, without intending anything more than a redemption in her own interest. There is strong support in the record for this contention, but in the view we take of this case it may be freely admitted that the making of the deed from the judgment debtor to Bridge, followed by the redemption in his name with the consent of the judgment debtor, was for the purpose of affording additional security for the loan of the $2,300; and that the deed will, therefore, in equity be regarded as a mortgage. But it will not be so regarded until the advance, for which the deed is given as security, is actually made.

[2] If a deed should be made and delivered as security for a loan, and the loan never in fact made, it will hardly be contended that the grantee is in the position of a mortgagee. He would hold the mere naked legal title as trustee for the grantor. So, in the present case, when Murphy presented himself to the sheriff, produced the deed to Bridge from the judgment debtor, and demanded a certificate of redemption in the name of Bridge, it matters little whether he was acting for the judgment debtor or for Bridge, for the latter, not yet having made any loan to Mrs. Moody, being still in possession of his money, could only redeem as her successor in interest; and the deed from her to him only assumed the character of a mortgage upon the actual advance of the redemption money. It was at that precise moment that the loan to the judgment debtor was made; and until that moment Bridge held but the naked legal title. He was therefore not required, under the provisions of section 705, Code of Civil Procedure, to produce a note of the record of his mortgage nor an affidavit as to the amount due.

[3] If it should be contended that the $2,300 in the hands of Murphy at the time of the redemption was in his hands as the agent of Mrs. Moody and not of Bridge, then the redemption was made entirely with Mrs. Moody's money; and as Mrs. Moody had obtained the loan for the express purpose of enabling her to redeem, had added to it nearly $1,000 of her own money, and had gone to the sheriff's office accompanied by Murphy for the purpose of making the redemption, it must be held that the redemption was made by her and not by Bridge.

[4] Again, regarding the redemption as having been made by Bridge, it was only incidentally for his own benefit; for Mrs.

Moody, in making her deed to him and in supplying him with part of the money needed for the redemption, did so principally in order that the property might be redeemed for her; and in this view of the case, when the redemption was effected Bridge held the property in a twofold capacity. He was the trustee of the legal title and a mortgagee for the money advanced by him. It is a well-established rule that, where the purchase money is paid by one person and the conveyance is made to another, "a resulting trust immediately arises against the person to whom the land is conveyed in favor of the one by whom the purchase money is paid."

* * * The same rule prevails if the money paid by the party taking the title is advanced by him as a loan to the other, and conveyance is made to the lender for the purpose of securing the loan. * * * In such case the grantee holds the double relation to the real purchaser; he is trustee of the legal title to the land, and is mortgagee for the money advanced for its purchase." Campbell v. Freeman, 99 Cal. 546, 34 Pac. 113; Gerety v. O'Sheehan, 9 Cal. App. 447, 99 Pac. 545. So in the present case, when the transaction is looked into, it is seen that Bridge advanced money for the purpose of redeeming the property for Mrs. Moody, taking the title in his own name, being enabled to do this through Mrs. Moody's deed to him. He was thus her successor in interest, and entitled to receive from the sheriff a certificate of redemption without complying with the provisions of section 705, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to a mortgagee. Having been redeemed by her trustee, the property was in effect redeemed by her. Kofoed v. Gordon, 122 Cal. 314, 325, 54 Pac. 1115.

[5] A judgment debtor may convey property to another for the purpose of redemption. Southern Cal. L. Co. v. McDowell, 105 Cal. 99, 38 Pac. 627; 3 Freeman on Execution, § 317, p. 1864; 17 Cyc. 329.

In applying these equitable principles each party gets his due. The plaintiff, the purchaser at the execution sale, receives back the money expended by him, plus the interest to which he is legally entitled; Bridge gets security for his advance; and the judgment debtor recovers her property, incumbered, however, with a lien in favor of Bridge.

The judgment and order are reversed.

The holding of jurors to be qualified cannot be disturbed, the evidence justifying the conclusions that their opinions were based on Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

S. H. Overacker was convicted of manslaughter, denied a new trial, and appeals. Affirmed.

Davis & Rush, of Los Angeles, and B. E. Tarver, of Santa Ana, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant was charged with having committed the crime of murder by killing one Gustavus A. Winn. Upon trial under that charge he was found guilty by a jury of the crime of manslaughter. An appeal has been taken from the judgment of imprisonment entered against him and from an order made denying a motion for a new trial. Upon a former trial the same defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and this court upon appeal reversed the judgment and order denying a new trial. See People v. Overacker, 15 Cal. App. 620, 115 Pac. 756. In the decision just cited is contained a general statement of facts from which the evidence heard at the second trial made no substantial variance. It will therefore not be necessary to reiterate here that narrative.

[1] Among the errors assigned, it is claimed on behalf of defendant that the trial court decided wrongly in its rulings on challenges for cause interposed as to a number of the jurors. Only two of such jurors so objected to remained upon the jury, however, as the defendant, exercising his right to peremptorily challenge the persons offered, excused all of them except L. C. Shadel and William Boyer. When the jury was finally completed and sworn, defendant had exhausted all of his peremptory challenges. It is therefore shown that the defendant, by reason of not having the right to exercise further peremptory challenges, was compelled to accept two men who were not satisfactory to him. All of the jurors challenged on the ground that they entertained an actual bias as to the defendant's guilt or innocence disclosed upon their examination that they had formed opinions upon the matter at issue, and nearly all of them stated that it would require evidence to remove such opinion. They were therefore disqualified to act, unless it was made to appear, under the exceptional cases provided for by section 1076 of the Penal Code, that their opinions were founded upon public rumor, statements in public journals, or common notoriety, and that they could, notwithstanding such opinions, act impartially and fairly upon the matters to be submitted to them. A trial judge, in determining the competency of a juror, and in deciding whether such juror can lay aside any preconceived opinion which he may have and act fairly and impartially, is called upon to determine questions of fact, and an appellate court in reviewing such rulings will find no question of law presented unless the evidence taken upon the examination of the juror is entirely uncontradictory. In other words, if the evidence as presented to the trial judge is such as might justify a conclusion to be made thereon, either in the affirmative or negative, of the question of competency, the determination of the trial court upon that question is final and conclusive. In the case of People v. Ryan, 152 Cal. 364, 92 Pac. 853, the Supreme Court has stated the rule in the following language: "The trial court must decide which of the answers most truly shows the juror's mind. It should, of course, be liberal in giving the defendant and the people the benefit of any doubts that may arise as to the fairness of the juror and his ability to lay aside any preconceived impressions and should excuse the juror if such doubt is created. But where there are such contradictions its decision is binding upon this court." To the same point may also be cited the following cases: People v. Fredericks, 106 Cal. 554, 39 Pac. 944; People v. Loper, 159 Cal. 6, 112 Pac. 720, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1193; People v. Edwards, 127 Pac. 58. We have made a close and careful examination of the record of the proceedings had upon the impanelment of the jury and are of the opinion that the evidence given as to the state of mind of each of the jurors objected to by the defendant is sufficient to sustain the conclusions of the trial judge and his rulings made upon challenges for cause. In the case of none of the jurors objected to on the ground of actual bias can it be said that the evidence did not show that their opinions were based upon some of the matters mentioned in section 1076 of the Penal Code as being insufficient to disqualify a juror, provided it appeared that he could lay aside such opinion and act fairly and impartially. Neither can it be said from the evidence that it did not appear to the trial court that such jurors could lay aside such opinions and act in the trial without bias.

[2] It is the earnest contention of counsel for defendant that the court by its instructions misdirected the jury. The claim is made that under the instructions as given the jury could have reasonably understood the court to say that, if they believed the defendant to have been insane at the time he killed the deceased, they should, nevertheless, find him guilty of manslaughter, and that the plea of self-defense under such facts would be of no avail. To us the plain effect and meaning of the instructions do not support the construction given them by the defendant. The charge was lengthy, and, as is usually the case, many instructions were offered on the part of the prosecution, and perhaps more submitted on behalf of the defendant. As ordinarily happens, the instructions on behalf of the prosecution were framed to support particularly the side of the people, and those for the defendant were designed to give great prominence to all features of the law favorable to the defense. The rule of analysis is, where instructions of the trial court are presented for examination, to take into view not an isolated portion thereof, but to consider the charge as a whole. If, when so considered, the instructions may be said to make a fair statement of the law, then they will be held to be sufficient and without error. This rule has been so often laid down in the decisions of our Supreme Court as to make unnecessary the citation here of particular decisions. Measured by this standard, we are of the opinion that the instructions as given in this case by the trial judge were not such as to mislead the jury, but that they sufficiently defined the law as applicable to the facts shown by the evidence. Nor do we find any error of a substantial nature in any of the rulings of the court upon the admission or rejection of testimony, or because of remarks made by the judge during the course of the trial. The evidence was entirely sufficient to support the verdict of the jury, for in no instance where a contention is made in behalf of defendant that there is a failure of proof can it be said that there was not some testimony on both sides of the question. We have scrutinized the record very closely and are impressed with the conviction that in the trial of this defendant all of his substantial rights were fairly guarded, and that by his conviction of the crime of manslaughter there is not shown to have been a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Oscar Arnold was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Nathan C. Coghlan, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

HALL, J. The defendant is the husband of Dessie Arnold, whose conviction of the crime of grand larceny, under an indictment in which she was jointly charged with this defendant, one Emma Smith and one E. C. Miles, has heretofore been sustained by this court. See People v. Arnold, 17 Cal. App. 68, 118 Pac. 729. The appeal now before this court, however, is from a conviction of the crime of grand larceny, under an indictment in which all of the same parties are jointly charged, but is for a different larceny than that of which Dessie Arnold was convicted, though perpetrated by similar methods.

Appellant in this case was convicted of the same larceny, and under the same indictment, as that under which Miles was convicted, and whose conviction was sustained by this court in an opinion (People v. Miles, 125 Pac. 250), filed June 1, 1912.

It is now contended, as it was contended in the Miles Case, that the evidence does not show any criminal connection of this appellant with the crime of which he was convicted. The evidence in the present case does not materially differ from the evidence presented upon the trial of Miles, and is ample to prove defendant's criminal connection with whatever crime was committed in getting the money ($1,000) from the prosecutrix. And for the same reasons that we assigned in the Miles Case we think the evidence sufficient to support the conclusion that the prosecutrix did not intend to part with the title to the money when she gave her check or when the money was drawn on the check and taken into the possession of Miles, appellant's codefendant and fellow conspirator. We have not, and shall not repeat, a summary of the evidence as it is quite sufficiently stated in the opinion rendered in the Miles Case, to which reference may be made for a full statement of the facts.

[1, 2] It is now urged that there is a variance between the indictment and the proof, in that the proof shows a larceny of a check rather than of money. It may be conceded that, if the proof had stopped with the giving of the check, the charge of larceny of the money would not have been sustained. But the proof showed that the check was indorsed by Miles and promptly cashed by the bank on which it was drawn, at San Francisco where the check was drawn. Miles thus obtained possession of the money with intent to steal it. As Miles and appellant were fellow conspirators, jointly engaged in the same criminal enterprise, both were guilty of the larceny of the money thus obtained by means of the check. The check having been cashed and the money obtained thereon, the case is within the rule followed in People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 472, 98 Pac. 194. The evidence therefore, sufficiently proves a larceny of money.

[3] It is next urged that the court erred in sustaining an objection made by the district attorney to a question put to the defendant while a witness as to whether or not he had, before the giving of the check by the pros-ecutrix to Miles, upon which the money was obtained, made inquiry as to the marketability and the probable value of the "fountain tooth brush." This evidence, it is claimed, would have tended to show the good faith of defendant in urging and advising the prosecutrix to turn over her money to Miles for investment in the company that it is claimed was to be formed to manufacture and market the "fountain tooth brush" when it should be patented. The theory of the prosecution was that defendant and his fellow conspirators by trick and device falsely and fraudulently caused the prosecutrix to believe that certain voices that she heard at a series of seances conducted by Mrs. Arnold were the voices of spirits from the other world. These voices urged and advised her to invest in this Fountain Tooth Brush Company. The theory of the prosecution is amply sustained by the evidence, which shows a bald and cruel scheme to mulct the prosecutrix out of her savings by causing her to believe that she was being advised by spirits to invest her money in the alleged Fountain Tooth Brush Company. From the abundant evidence in the record, clearly and beyond peradventure showing the bald fraud practiced by defendant and his codefendants upon the prosecutrix, it is unbelievable that the proffered evidence could have had any result upon the verdict if it had been admitted. But, in addition, it is clear that it had but a very remote, if any, bearing upon the real question at issue. It would have been no defense to the charge as proven. If the defendant obtained the possession of the money of the prosecutrix by false and fraudulent spiritual manifestations, with intent to convert the money to his own use, it is no defense to the charge of larceny, that he had been informed by others that in their opinion the fountain tooth brush would be a valuable article. This would be but a matter of opinion. The trick and device by which the money was obtained was in representations by words and acts that departed spirits were talking to the prosecutrix, and advising her to invest in the enterprise. If these representations were false and made to deceive the prosecutrix—and the evidence beyond question so proves—and defendant and his fellow conspirators by such means obtained possession of the money of the prosecutrix, with intent to convert it to their own use, it would be no defense to say that they believed that the investment that they were advising would be a good one. We do not think that a new trial should be granted because of the ruling complained of.

Complaint is made as to some modifications which the court made to certain instructions requested by defendant. These we have examined, and find no error therein.

[4] The court did not err in refusing the instruction to the effect that, if the prosecutrix intended to buy the shares of stock referred to in the evidence at the time when she gave her check, the jury should acquit the defendant, for the reason that the same matter was fully covered by the instruction given by the court as follows: "You are instructed that, if you have a reasonable doubt as to whether the said complaining witness intended to buy the said shares of stock, you must resolve that doubt favorably to the defendant and acquit him."

[5] So also the court did not err in refusing an instruction to the effect that the charge against defendant could not be sustained by proof of the larceny of a check. The same matter was clearly covered by an instruction which the court gave to the effect, and, if the jury had any reasonable doubt as to whether or not the defendant actually intended by trick, device, or fraud to procure the property of the prosecutrix described in the indictment, they should resolve such doubt favorably to the defendant and acquit him. The only property described in the indictment was $1,000 in lawful money of the United States of America.

[6] The refused instruction, although correct as an abstract proposition of law, would, we think, in view of the condition of the evidence, have probably been confusing to the jury, and could only have properly been given in connection with explanatory matter. In this behalf it must be noted that, although the evidence shows that the prosecutrix gave her check to the codefendant of appellant, it also shows without contradiction that such check was promptly cashed, and the money ($1,000) obtained thereon without resort to any other trick, device, or fraud than such as had resulted in procuring the check, which was but a step towards procuring the money. Under such circumstances, defendant might be guilty of larceny of both the check and the money. If the check was obtained by larceny thereof, no right or title to the money was acquired thereby. In this case, under the evidence in the record, if the defendant was guilty of a larceny of the check, he was necessarily also guilty of a larceny of the money obtained thereby, and for that reason the court was justified in refusing the requested instruction.

This disposes of all the points urged for a reversal.

In conclusion we may say that after a careful examination of the entire record, including the evidence, we are satisfied that no miscarriage of justice has resulted from any ruling of the trial court.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Norton, Judge.

John C. Carroll was convicted of grand larceny, and appeals from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

Geo. F. McNoble, of Stockton, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, of Sacramento, for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of grand larceny on an information jointly charging defendant and Walter Flavin and George Armstrong with its commission. He appeals from the judgment of conviction, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. The prosecuting witness was one F. M. Katsura, a Japanese who resided at the city of Fresno.

The Attorney General makes the point that "the appellate record has not been properly perfected, and the appeal should be dismissed." The objections having been removed, it is not necessary to notice them.

Katsura testified: That he came to Lathrop on February 23, 1912, on his way to Sacramento: his train arriving at Lathrop at about 1 o'clock p. m. That he left his car to take the Sacramento train, which was to leave in a few minutes. He hastened to the front of the first car; but there was a crowd of people getting on, and, to avoid them, he went back to get in the rear car. That he had a grip or hand bag in the right hand, and his left hand in his pocket, where his purse was. That, as he neared the platform of the car, and was about to step on the platform, he took his left hand out of his pocket and used it to hold on his hat, as a gust of wind threatened to blow it off. He testified that his purse was in his pocket at that time. As he approached the platform, Flavin, one of the three men charged with the crime, stepped up ahead of him and halted, obstructing Katsura's passage. Another of the three, Armstrong, stepped to the right side of Katsura and commenced pushing him, crying, "Hurry up, hurry up," while the third, Carroll, the defendant, stood at the left side of Katsura. At this time, and while Katsura was holding on his hat and was about to step on the platform, he heard the man standing at the left say, "I have got it, I have got it," and at once he realized he had been robbed. He put his left hand to his pocket and found it pulled out and his purse gone, in which there was $23.50 and 3 pennies. These three men immediately withdrew and went forward towards the front end of the train and disappeared. Their subsequent movements in the town of Lathrop, up to the time of their arrest on the same day, are partly accounted for, and tended to confirm the testimony of Katsura that they were engaged in a conspiracy to rob him. It appeared that they had no tickets for that train; that two of them purchased tickets for Merced not long after the theft. The evidence was quite sufficient to show that the "job" was "pulled off" in a way common among this class of pickpockets, and it is not now urged that the evidence was insufficient to establish larceny.

A reversal of the judgment of conviction is urged on two grounds: First, because the court refused to give the following instruction requested by defendant: "If the jury are satisfied from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty, that the defendant John C. Carroll, did, on or about the 23d day of February, 1912, at and in the county of San Joaquin, state of California, steal, take, and carry away the sum of $23.53, the personal property of F. M. Katsura; but if at said time and place said sum of $23.53 was not in the possession of and not upon the person of one F. M. Katsura, then they cannot convict said defendant of grand larceny, but may bring in a verdict of guilty of petit larceny;" and, second, because the court gave the following instruction: "Evidence is to be estimated, not only by its own intrinsic weight, but also according to the evidence which it is in the power of one side to produce and the other to contradict; and therefore, if weaker and less satisfactory evidence is offered when it appears that stronger and more satisfactory was within the power of the party, the evidence offered should be viewed with distrust."

Counsel, in his cross-examination, endeavored to show by the witness that his pocketbook might have fallen out of his pocket while he was in the act of removing his hand from it, and that the defendant might have picked it up from the ground. The following questions and answers will illustrate the point: "Q. You had never seen Mr. Carroll before that day; that is the first time you ever saw him, was it? A. Yes; first time. Q. Do you know who took the purse out of your pocket? A. Well, I have not seen take off. At same time he say, 'I have got it.' Q. You don't know who took the purse out of your pocket? A. No. Q. You don't know whether, when you pulled your hand out, you may have dropped the purse, do you? A. No. Q. You don't know? A. I don't know. Q. You don't know but what you may have dropped the purse out of your pocket—might have fallen out of your pocket when you pulled your hand out—do you? A. I don't understand. (Question read.) A. Pretty hard to understand. The Court: You understand the question? A. Pretty hard to understand that question. Mr. McNoble: Q. Did you see Mr. Carroll, the defendant, take your pocketbook out of your pocket? A. I don't see him take it. Q. You didn't see him take it out? A. No. Q. What? A. No. Q. Do you know whether somebody took him out, or whether it fall out, for sure? A. I can't tell. Q. You can't tell. It may have fallen out then—out of your pocket? A. I can't tell. Q. You can't tell whether it fell out, or somebody take it? A. No. Q. Is that right? A. Yes; that is right. Q. Then it may have fallen out of your pocket on the ground when you went to get up in the car. Is that right? A. But I know sure I had the pocketbook on the ground before I get on the car. Q. You say you are pretty sure you had it when you were on the ground? A. Yes; sure. I sure I got on the ground, because I have hold of it. Q. But you don't know how it got out of your pocket. That right? A. Pretty hard to understand your question. Q. I say you don't know how your pocketbook got out of your pocket? It might have fallen out, or may have been taken out. Is that it? A. I don't know that. Q. You don't know that. You wouldn't say for sure then—you wouldn't say that for sure then? A. What do you mean? Q. Do you know for sure? Do you know for sure how your pocketbook got out of your pocket? A. I don't know sure. Q. You don't know for sure? A. No. Q. Somebody might have taken it out, or it might have fallen out, or you might have dropped it. That right? A. Yes." Following this cross-examination, the witness testified: "Q. State whether or not you dropped your purse on the ground outside of the car. A. I don't understand now. Q. You know before you step up on the car? A. Yes. Q.

You take your hand out of your pocket, you say? A. Yes. Q. Grab your hat? A. Yes. Q. Now, when you take your hand out, you pull your purse out and drop him that way? (Shows.) A. No. Of course, my hand was on pocketbook. Q. You look out for— A. Yes. I look out for pocketbook." Recross: "Mr. McNoble: Q. I understand you to say, however, you don't know how that pocketbook get out of your pocket? The Court: I think it has been answered. He said before that he didn't know. Mr. McNoble: Very well."

[1] Appellant cites the following cases in support of his contention: People v. Stofor, 3 Cal. App. 417, 421, 86 Pac. 734; People v. Comyns, 114 Cal. 107, 112, 45 Pac. 1034. It is undoubtedly the rule that, where there is any evidence from which a reasonable inference may be drawn that the crime of which the defendant was convicted was of a lesser degree—in this case, petit larceny, as is claimed—it is prejudicial error to withdraw from the jury the consideration of such evidence and confine the instructions to the crime of grand larceny. In the Stofor Case, supra, there was considerable evidence tending to show that the money taken by the defendant could have been abstracted from his victim's purse while it was in defendant's possession, with the consent of the owner, and also that it might have been taken when the purse was on the table and out of the owner's possession. In the Comyns Case, supra, the question related to the value of the articles found in defendant's possession, which was taken from the jury.

[2] In the case here the evidence leaves no rational inference that defendant picked up the purse from the ground, and, even if he did so, the evidence shows that it could not have dropped to the ground but for the maneuvers of these men, who were on the spot with the design to rob him. If the purse dropped, which is a mere surmise or possibility unsupported by any evidence, and it was caused to drop by these men in their effort to commit the larceny, it was, in point of law and common sense, a taking from the person. If these men had caused Katsura to fall down, and his purse had slipped from his pocket in falling, and defendant had picked it up, and the three men had then departed with the money, the law would have regarded it as taking from the person's possession. These three men had Katsura surrounded—one obstructing his entry to the car, another jostling him and attracting his attention by crying "Hurry up," when he could not enter the car for the obstruction they offered, and the third stood at his left side, and, while these proceedings were going on, and at the same time Katsura was told to hurry up, the defendant said, "I have got it, I have got it," and the three immediately left the car. The condition of Katsura's pocket when he put his hand down to it showed that it had been pulled out, which must have been done by the defendant. Katsura's testimony was that the defendant stood at his side and back of him when he said to his confederates, "I have got it."

[3] Instructions must be applicable to the facts; and it is not error to refuse instructions inapplicable to the facts. People v. Turley, 50 Cal. 469; People v. Chaves, 103 Cal. 408, 37 Pac. 389; People v. Chaves, 122 Cal. 140, 54 Pac. 596.

[4] We do not think the evidence showed that there was a reasonable probability or a reasonable possibility that the defendant picked up the purse from the ground, or that it came out of Katsura's pocket otherwise than through defendant's agency.

[5] The second of the above instructions was given in connection with several other general instructions usually given in criminal cases. The court also instructed the jury as follows: "The jury are instructed that it is the constitutional right of the defendant to stand mute in a criminal action; and his neglect or refusal to be a witness cannot in any manner prejudice him, nor be used against him in the trial or proceeding. The jury are instructed that if the defendant has neglected or refused to become a witness in his own behalf such fact or circumstance cannot in any manner prejudice him in this trial; and you are not to consider such fact or circumstance as any evidence against him in this trial."

Appellant cites People v. Cuff, 122 Cal. 589, 55 Pac. 407, and People v. Charles, 9 Cal. App. 338, 99 Pac. 383, in which latter case the Cuff Case was commented upon, and in which case, also, a petition for hearing in the Supreme Court was denied January 12, 1909. In the Cuff Case the instruction complained of was given, and also a similar instruction to the one last above quoted, wherein the court said to the jury that "no inference of guilt can be drawn against him [defendant] for a failure to testify in his own behalf." After the admonition given by the Supreme Court in the Cuff Case, that "in criminal cases the proper occasions are so few, and the improper occasions are so many, that it were best they should be given rarely, if at all," we must infer that the instruction found its way to the jury through inadvertence. But this fact cannot lessen the prejudicial effect it may have had upon the jury.

[6] We think, however, that the rule established by the amendment to our Constitution (article 6, § 4½) was designed to meet just such a case as this, and should be applied at this time. It reads: "No judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted in any criminal case on the ground of misdirection of the jury or the improper admission of or rejection of evidence, or for error as to any matter of pleading or procedure, unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." Adopted October 10, 1911.

The instruction under consideration did not go to the degree of the crime, as did the other one, which latter admitted the crime of larceny, but gave the jury the right to pass upon the degree—whether grand or petit larceny—and this was a fact in the case as to which the defendant had the right to the verdict of the jury, had there been evidence applicable. It may be that the constitutional amendment was not designed to take away such right, where there is evidence reasonably tending to establish a different crime, or a crime of less degree, than that of which the defendant was convicted. There is a difference between misdirecting the jury and in refusing to direct them correctly in matters as to which defendant is entitled by right to have the jury instructed. In the instance before us, the jury were misdirected, from which it is urged that the jury were prejudiced by the fact that the defendant offered no evidence; whereas he might have himself testified, or have called his confederates. There were, in fact, no other witnesses of the transaction whom he could have called. The evidence was convincing that the crime charged was committed. Defendant does not challenge the evidence, except to claim that he should have had an instruction as to what constitutes petit larceny. After an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, we cannot say that the error complained of resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SEBRING v. HARRIS. (Civ. 980.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Oct. 4, 1912.)

1. TRIAL (§ 164*)—NONSUIT—MOTION.

Defendant moved for a nonsuit in an action for false imprisonment on the ground that plaintiff had not "established any cause of action at all; * * * also they must show that there was a want of probable cause on the ground that the testimony, so far as introduced by the plaintiff, does not substantiate anything at all connecting the defendant with the matter." Held, that the motion did not raise the point that there was a fatal variance between the proof and allegations.

2. FALSE IMPRISONMENT (§ 22*)—PROBABLE CAUSE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Upon showing a wrongful arrest, the burden of proving probable cause was on defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Imprisonment, Cent. Dig. §§ 98, 99; Dec. Dig. § 22.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 163*)—NONSUIT.

The ground relied upon for a nonsuit should be stated to the trial court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 371; Dec. Dig. § 163.*]

4. FALSE IMPRISONMENT (§ 20*)—PLEADING—VARIANCE.

Where, in an action for false imprisonment, the answer denied that defendant caused plaintiff's arrest upon the pretended charge of larceny, as alleged in the complaint or "upon any other charge," proof that plaintiff was arrested for disturbing the peace was not a material variance under Code Civ. Proc. § 469, providing that no variance is deemed material unless it actually misleads the adverse party, to his prejudice on the merits.

5. FALSE IMPRISONMENT (§ 34*)—DAMAGES—MENTAL ANGUISH.

The evidence in an action for false arrest showed that defendant directed two police officers to arrest plaintiff, and took her to a fire engine house through a crowd of several hundred, and detained her there for an hour, awaiting the arrival of the patrol wagon, but, on her protest, she was not taken to the police station in the wagon, but was allowed to walk, escorted by a fireman and two police officers, and was detained for a time at the police station. Held, that the jury were properly authorized to consider the question of humiliation and mental anguish in awarding damages.

6. NEW TRIAL (§ 123*)—GROUNDS—LIMITATION BY NOTICE OF INTENTION—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

A ground that the damages were excessive, not stated in the notice of intention to move for a new trial, could not be considered upon the hearing of the motion under Code Civ. Proc. § 659, requiring the grounds of the motion to be stated in the notice.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Emma Sebring against L. Harris. From an order denying defendant's motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Henry Ach and H. E. Michael, both of San Francisco (Wm. Hoff Cook, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. William M. Cannon, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HALL, J. This is an appeal from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The action was brought to recover damages for the wrongful and false arrest and imprisonment of plaintiff caused and procured by defendant.

Among other things it is alleged in the complaint "that on the 22d day of June, 1907, at the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, the defendant caused the plaintiff to be arrested upon a pretended charge of larceny." Defendant in his answer denied that he "caused the plaintiff to be arrested upon a pretended charge of larceny, or upon any other charge." At the close of plaintiff's case, defendant moved the court for a nonsuit, which motion was by the court denied. This ruling of the court is the first matter urged by appellant as ground for the reversal of the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The only contention of appellant upon this point is that the evidence tends to show that the defendant caused plaintiff's arrest upon a charge of disturbing the peace, instead of upon a charge of larceny, and which appellant contends presented a case of fatal variance between the proof and allegations of the complaint. As will appear later on in this opinion, we do not think the variance at all material.

[1] But it is a sufficient answer to appellant's contention to say that the motion for a nonsuit was not made upon any such ground. The motion as it appears in the record is as follows: "I desire to make the motion for nonsuit on the ground that they have not established any cause of action at all. They have not shown any connection with Mr. Harris. Also, they must show that there was a want of probable cause, and on the ground that the testimony so far introduced by the plaintiff does not substantiate anything at all connecting the defendant with the matter." It is perfectly clear that appellant's motion was directed to a failure to prove that defendant caused the arrest of plaintiff at all, and to a failure to prove want of probable cause for the arrest.

As to the first of these grounds, the evidence in the record establishes beyond question that the defendant did cause the arrest of plaintiff. It is not now contended to the contrary.

[2] As to the second ground, the arrest being shown, the burden of proving probable cause is upon the defendant. Ah Fong v. Sternes, 79 Cal. 30, 21 Pac. 381; People v. McGrew, 77 Cal. 570, 20 Pac. 92.

[3] The ground relied upon for a nonsuit should be stated to the trial court. Miller v. Luco, 80 Cal. 257, 22 Pac. 195; Loring v. Stuart, 79 Cal. 200, 21 Pac. 651. Especially does this rule apply where, as in this case, an amendment could have been allowed to the pleadings which would have obviated the objection now made by the appellant, and without possible inconvenience or injustice to the defendant. Daley v. Russ, 86 Cal. 114, 24 Pac. 867. The court did not err in denying appellant's motion for a nonsuit. Upon the trial there was some conflict in the evidence as to whether the arrest which the evidence clearly shows defendant caused to be made of plaintiff was upon a charge of larceny or upon a charge of disturbing the peace. There is in the record evidence to support either theory. The court gave instructions addressed to both theories.

[4] Appellant contends that the instruction which the court gave to the effect that a verdict for plaintiff might be rendered if it plaintiff upon a charge of disturbing the peace was error. It is not contended that the instruction is incorrect in the abstract, but that it was error to give an instruction upon such a theory of the case because of the allegation in the complaint that the arrest was upon a charge of larceny. In other words, it is claimed that the evidence and theory upon which the instruction was predicated presents a case of a material variance between the allegations of the complaint and the proof. We do not think so. It may be true that in some jurisdictions it would be so considered, but we do not think that it should be so considered under the law of this state.

The gist of the action in this case was the wrongful arrest. The charge upon which the arrest was made was but an incidental matter, peculiarly within the knowledge of defendant, and need not have been alleged by plaintiff. A denial that the arrest was made upon a charge of larceny would not have met the gist and substance of the allegation of the complaint. This defendant recognized by denying, as he did, that he caused the plaintiff to be arrested upon a pretended charge of larceny or upon any other charge. By this denial he challenged proof that he had caused the arrest of plaintiff upon any charge whatever. The evidence tending to show an arrest upon a charge of disturbing the peace was addressed to the issue presented by the denials in defendant's answer; and the instruction predicated upon the theory of the case resting upon such evidence was thus pertinent both to the evidence before the jury and court, and the issues presented by the pleadings. "No variance between the allegation in a pleading and the proof is to be deemed material, unless it has actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense upon the merits. Whenever it appears that a party has been so misled, the court may order the pleading to be amended, upon such terms as may be just." Section 469, Code Civ. Proc. That the defendant was in no respect misled by the variance between the allegation in the complaint and the proof is perfectly clear, for he went to trial upon the issue as to whether or not he had caused the arrest of plaintiff upon any charge at all. It is thus clear that the variance now complained of as a foundation for the attack upon the instruction was not material, and the court was not even required to direct an amendment to the pleading to conform to the proof. Section 470, Code Civ. Proc. The proof was addressed to the issue framed by the pleadings, and the instruction was pertinent both to the issue thus presented and the evidence bearing thereon. The cause of action proved under either theory of the facts was in substance the one alleged. The court therefore did not err in giving the instruction complained of.

It is next urged that the court erred in an instruction which it gave upon the question of damages. Stress seems to be laid upon that portion of the instruction in which the jury were told that they were entitled to consider whether the plaintiff was subjected to humiliation or suffered great or any mental anguish by reason of such arrest.

[5] Where it is alleged, and the proof is sufficient to support such allegation, that the arrest was malicious, no reason occurs to us why humiliation and mental anguish caused by such arrest are not proper elements to be considered by the jury in fixing damages for such arrest. The evidence shows that defendant directed two police officers to arrest plaintiff. They arrested her accordingly, and took her to a fire engine house through a crowd of several hundred persons. There they detained her for about an hour pending the arrival of the police patrol wagon. Upon its arrival, however, upon her protest she was not taken to the police station in the wagon, but was allowed to walk there, escorted for a part of the way by a fireman, and for the balance of the way by two police officers. She was detained for a time at the police station, but was eventually released without any charge being preferred against her. That humiliation and mental anguish to a woman would be the natural and proximate result of such an arrest goes without saying. The instruction was correct in the abstract, and was justified by the evidence in the record.

[6] The only other point raised by appellant is that the damages awarded by the jury are excessive. This point was first raised at the oral argument. It was not even stated as ground for the motion in the notice of intention to move for a new trial, and therefore could not be considered by the trial court upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial. Section 659, Code Civ. Proc.

The court did not err in denying appellant's motion for a new trial, and the order appealed from is therefore affirmed.

4. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 167*)—CONDEMNATION—STAY PENDING APPEAL—REPEAL OF STATUTES.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1254, authorizing the superior court in certain cases to stay further proceedings pending appeal from the judgment in condemnation proceedings, is not repealed by Code Civ. Proc. § 949, specifying cases where the appeal does not stay execution and not including condemnation proceedings; the law not favoring repeals by implication, especially not the repeal of special by general statutes, and any conflict in these two sections being controlled by Pol. Code, § 4481, providing that, if the provisions of any title conflict with the provisions of any other title, the provision of each title must prevail as to all matters and questions arising out of the subject-matter of such title.

8. STATUTES (§ 162*)—REPEAL—GENERAL AND SPECIAL ACTS.

Where two statutes treat of the same subject, the one being special and the other general, unless they are irreconcilably inconsistent, the latter, although latest in date, will not be held to have repealed the former, but the special act will prevail in its application to the subject-matter, as far as coming within its particular provisions.

9. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 258*)—APPEAL—SUPERSEDEAS.

The fact that the railroad company paid into court the amount of the judgment in condemnation proceedings in favor of several claimants without specifying the amount deposited for any particular claimant was not ground for granting a writ of supersedeas to prevent the railroad company from taking possession of the land pending appeal from the judgment of condemnation; the statute merely requiring the plaintiff in condemnation proceedings to deposit the amount of the judgment.

10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 458*) — SUPERSEDEAS.

Nor was it ground for the granting of such writ of supersedeas that the verdict and judgment were informal or erroneous, where there was no jurisdictional defect; mere irregularities not being reviewable on supersedeas.

11. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 258*)—APPEAL—SUPERSEDEAS—PETITION.

Where the petition for a writ of supersedeas to prevent the railroad company from taking possession of the land during the pendency of an appeal from a judgment of condemnation, while alleging as a ground for the writ that the verdict was insufficient because it did not find the amount of the interest of each of the various defendants, alleged that one petitioner, who was a defendant in condemnation proceedings, was the owner of the condemned property, its allegations considered together did not disclose an insufficient verdict; the presumption being in the absence of a contrary showing that the value found in the verdict was the value of such petitioner's interest, and that the interest of the other defendants was merely of normal or of no value.

19. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 258*)—APPEAL—SUPERSEDEAS—GROUNDS—LEASE.

It was not ground for the granting of a writ of supersedeas to prevent the railroad company from taking possession during the pendency of an appeal from a judgment of condemnation, that there was a lease upon the property condemned of which the judgment took no account, where from the pleadings it presumptively appeared that such lease ceased to be operative on condemnation of the land.

Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, and White, Miller & McLaughlin, of Sacramento, for petitioners. T. T. C. Gregory, of Fairfield, John S. Partridge, of San Francisco, Elmer W. Armfield, of Woodland, and C. J. Goodell, of San Francisco, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. This is an application for a writ of supersedeas to prevent the Vallejo & Northern Railroad Company from taking possession of certain real estate during the pendency of an appeal from a judgment of condemnation. The petition for the writ alleges that the Reed Orchard Company has been and now is the owner in fee of a certain tract of land containing 140 acres, more or less, in Yolo county, known as the Reed orchard; that petitioner, the People's Savings Bank, has been and now is the holder of a deed of trust covering the whole of said property and securing over $35,000 due from the said Reed Orchard Company to said bank, the said deed of trust being of record in the county recorder's office of said Yolo county; that petitioner Komano has a lease of said premises for the term of five years beginning November 1, 1907, and that he has paid the rental to date including $3,750 due January 1, 1912 (being one-half of the rental for the year ending November 1, 1912), but that the $3,750 due July 1, 1912, has not been paid; that on the 5th day of May, 1910, the Vallejo & Northern Railroad Company began an action in the superior court of said Yolo county against petitioners to condemn for railroad purposes 104.1 acres of said tract of land; that the summons in said action was served on the defendants named therein, petitioners herein; that said Reed Orchard Company appeared in said action and answered said complaint; that People's Savings Bank and said Komano did not appear in the action, but that evidence was received at the trial, without objection, "showing that the deed of trust to said People's Savings Bank was in full force and effect and the said lease so owned and held by S. Komano was offered and received without objection, and also testimony showing the net value of the crops grown on said premises and to which said tenant S. Komano would be entitled under said lease and other evidence was received tending to show the value of his interest and the jury viewed the premises"; that a jury trial was had, and a verdict was rendered on the 22d day of March, 1912, in favor of plaintiff, awarding to it the 104.1 acres sought to be condemned and fixing the value thereof at the sum of $104,100, but that said verdict did not separately assess or fix the value separately of the several estates and interests of the defendants; that on March 23, 1912, the superior court entered judgment on said verdict awarding the plaintiff the said 104.1 acres, but said court did not, by said judgment or at all, fix, determine, or ascertain the interests or estates or value of the interests or estates of the various defendants in said action or in any manner designate or show the value of each estate or interest therein separately; that within the time required by law petitioners herein appealed from said judgment; "that the said Vallejo & Northern Railroad Company deposited in court the amount of the verdict together with the costs for the defendants generally to be distributed to those entitled thereto without naming the persons to whom the same was to be paid nor the respective amounts to be paid to any person or defendant in said action; that a final order of condemnation was entered by said court from which petitioners have appealed; that a notice has been served on petitioners by said railroad company that it would move said court to enter an order putting said company into possession of said property and authorizing it to use the property during the pendency and until final conclusion of the litigation; and that said superior court and the judge thereof threaten to and will proceed to hear said motion and grant the same." A demurrer on the general ground has been filed herein by respondent, and also an answer and return, in which some of the allegations of the petition are denied and the proceedings in the condemnation suit are more fully set forth than by petitioners. At the hearing it was also stipulated that this court might consider the fact that the lower court "made and entered its order fixing the sum of $25,000 as a further sum for a fund to pay any further damages and costs that might be recovered in said proceeding, as well as all damages that might be sustained by defendants, if for any cause the property shall not be finally taken for public use, and that then and thereafter the Vallejo & Northern Railroad Company deposited with the clerk of the said superior court of the county of Yolo the said further sum of $25,000, which said sum is still in the custody of said clerk."

For the two following reasons it is urged that the court should issue the writ: (1) By reason of said appeals, the enforcement of the judgment in said condemnation proceeding has been stayed, and therefore the superior court has no authority to authorize the plaintiff in said action to take possession of or use said property until after the final determination of said appeals; and (2) in consequence of the failure of the jury and of the court to fix the value of the respective interests of the defendants in said action in and to the property condemned none of petitioners can determine or demand from the clerk the amount of his respective interest. The duty of the jury to segregate the damages and to make the respective awards as contended for is claimed to be imposed by section 1254 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and by reason of said omission it is urged that there is really no valid judgment to be executed.

[1] It is virtually conceded that the writ of supersedeas will issue to prevent action on a judgment only where the appeal from the judgment operates as a stay of proceedings; or, as it has been stated: "Where the appeal acts as a supersedeas, the appellate court will issue a writ of supersedeas or stay of proceedings when the trial court is about to issue an execution or other order with the intention of carrying the judgment into effect." Dulin v. Pacific W. & C. Co., 98 Cal. 304, 33 Pac. 123; Foster v. Superior Court, 115 Cal. 279, 47 Pac. 58; Rose v. Mesmer, 131 Cal. 631, 63 Pac. 1010; McAneny v. Superior Court, 150 Cal. 6, 87 Pac. 1020.

[2] The first question to be determined, then, is whether the appeal taken by petitioners operated to stay proceedings upon the judgment of condemnation; and this is to be considered in the light of the principle that no stay of execution is effected by an appeal unless by virtue of some statutory provision. In the Foster Case, supra, it is said: "The effect of an appeal from the judgment upon the judgment appealed from is a matter of statutory regulation, and, as this effect is to be determined by a construction of the statutes under which an appeal is taken, the decisions in other states upon statutes differing from our own are not entitled to a controlling consideration." Under the facts admitted herein, it is perfectly clear that certain provisions of the statute authorize the court below to make an order to permit plaintiff, the said railroad company, to take possession of and use the said property during the pendency of the litigation.

[3] Section 1254 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "at any time after trial and judgment entered or pending an appeal from the judgment to the Supreme Court whenever the plaintiff shall have paid into court, for the defendant, the full amount of the judgment, and such further sum as may be required by the court as a fund to pay any further damages and costs that may be recovered in said proceeding, as well as all damages that may be sustained by the defendant, if for any cause the property shall not be finally taken for public use, the superior court in which the proceeding was tried may, upon notice of not less than ten days, authorize the plaintiff, if already in possession, to continue therein, and if not, then to take possession of and use the property during the pendency of and until the final conclusion of the litigation, and may if necessary stay all actions and proceedings against the plaintiff on account thereof." Section 1257, following, is another special provision in reference to condemnation proceedings, and it makes applicable to said proceedings the general provisions of part two of the Code of Civil Procedure, relative to new trials and appeals, except as they are inconsistent with the provisions of the title under which are found said sections 1254 and 1257. From the statement of facts already made it appears that a trial has been had, a judgment entered, an appeal has been taken, the plaintiff has paid into court for the defendants the full amount of the judgment and costs, together with the other sum demanded by said section 1254, and the statutory notice has been given for the hearing of the motion for an order to be let into possession of the property. There has been therefore a full compliance on the part of plaintiff with the requirement of said section 1254, and unless there is some reason for holding said section invalid, or that it has been repealed, petitioners' case as to the effect of the appeals, it would seem, must fail. The validity of the section, it may be said, has been directly adjudicated and it cannot now be questioned. In San Luis Obispo v. Simas, 1 Cal. App. 175, 81 Pac. 972, it was held, as stated in the syllabus, that "since the amendment to section 1254 of the Code of Civil Procedure an order for possession after payment of the money into court may be made pending an appeal from the decree of condemnation; and it was not error to refuse to permit proof of the appeal in making the order."

In Spring Valley W. W. v. Drinkhouse, 95 Cal. 220, 30 Pac. 218, after judgment and pending an appeal, plaintiff took possession of the property by virtue of said section 1254, and in discussing that provision the Supreme Court said: "The final conclusion of this litigation has not yet been reached, and, if said section of the Code is not in conflict with the Constitution of the state, then this proceeding must fail for the order of the trial court is still in full force and effect. This section is not in violation of any provision of the Constitution, but directly in line with that instrument wherein it treats of such matters. * * * It would seem that the framers of both the Constitution and the statute had in view the delays incident to condemnation proceedings, and the necessity in many cases of allowing property to be taken and used for a public use during the progress of the litigation provided an adequate fund to fully reimburse the landowner was first paid into court." So in Heilbron v. Superior Court, 151 Cal. 275, 90 Pac. 707, in refutation of petitioners' argument that in no conceivable instance can a plaintiff in condemnation have a right of entry upon the condemned property until the end of litigation has come, the Supreme Court declared: "This, of course, is not the meaning of the Constitution, which, from its very reading, as well as from the construction which has been given to its language by this court, contemplates that such right of entry vests in plaintiff after the award by the jury of the amount of damages which the defendant will sustain by the taking of his property, whether that amount in the ultimate outcome of the litigation shall prove to be the true amount, or whether, as the result of appeals and new trials, the amount shall be finally determined to be more or less. The constitutional provision is framed to accomplish this result, and unquestionably section 1254 of the Code of Civil Procedure has been carefully devised and drawn to further and effectuate the constitutional intent." Therein also is found this further statement: "The Constitution merely guarantees that there shall be ascertained and paid into court before plaintiff's right of entry attaches the amount of the judgment, and this, notwithstanding that that judgment may be reversed, and that the defendant may ultimately obtain a verdict for a much larger amount of money. We can see no constitutional objection, and none has been pointed out to us, which would invalidate a statute which confers upon a defendant in condemnation proceedings even greater rights, and even greater security for his recovery, than that which the Constitution itself awards him." This section, it may be remarked, has been variously amended by the Legislature, but we need not trace its history fully. It seems advisable, however, to call attention to some of its vicissitudes. As enacted in 1872 it provided that "at any time after service of summons, the court may authorize the plaintiff" to continue in possession or to take possession upon the terms therein prescribed. Subsequently this was changed so as to read: "At any time after trial by jury and judgment entered upon their verdict or pending an appeal from the judgment to the Supreme Court," etc., substantially as it is now. In 1897 the statute was amended so as to authorize the plaintiff "at any time after the filing of the complaint and the issuance and service of the summons thereon" to take possession and use the property. In this form it was decided to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court in the case of Steinhart v. Superior Court, 137 Cal. 575, 70 Pac. 629, 59 L. R. A. 404, 92 Am. St. Rep. 183, in an opinion filed November 8, 1902. Therein

It was held that, under the terms of the Constitution, the preliminary possession cannot be authorized until the damage resulting therefrom has been judicially determined and the amount has been paid or tendered to the owner; the court saying, through Mr. Justice Temple: "I do not agree to the proposition that compensation is made to the owner by paying into court a sum of money before the damage has been judicially determined and where the property owner cannot take the money. Surely he is not compensated until he may take the money. It is not paid into court for him until he can take it." No doubt it was in view of this decision and to overcome the said constitutional objection that in 1903 the section was again amended to read as it is now.

[4-8] The other consideration to be noticed in this connection grows out of the contention of petitioners that this section has been repealed by implication by virtue of the amendment of section 949 by the Legislature of 1905. St. 1905, p. 22. To state the proposition in the language of petitioners: "Section 949, C. C. P., therefore, being general in terms and upon its face providing for a stay of proceedings in all cases not expressly exempt from its operation, and said section being the latest expression of the will of the Legislature, should control section 1254, C. C. P. Section 949 expressly specifies cases where the appeal does not stay execution. In 1905, as stated, the Legislature enacted this section, but did not include among the exceptions therein specified condemnation proceedings. It is well settled that a revised or amended act must be construed as a new and original piece of legislation. Donlon v. Jewett, 88 Cal. 530 [26 Pac. 370]." It is believed, however, that respondent is wholly right in the contention that petitioners have thus furnished a striking example of non sequitur. It is well illustrated by respondent as follows: "At the time of the amendment to 1254, in 1903, section 949 read the same as it reads now, except that in 1905 another exception was added, namely, that relating to a judgment giving a stockholder or director the right to inspect the records of a corporation. In other words, the contention of counsel amounts to this: The title on eminent domain provided that an appeal should not stay proceedings in the court below. The general section upon the effect of appeals was amended by adding another exception having no reference whatever to eminent domain. Ergo, the sections on staying proceedings in eminent domain were repealed." The argument of petitioners seems rather to proceed upon the assumption that the provision in reference to appeals in eminent domain was contained in the exceptions provided in said section 949 as it existed prior to said amendment of 1905. Whereas, the truth is, as we have seen, there was and is a special statute applicable to eminent domain, and section 949 contains the general law upon the subject of appeals. This last is found in title 13 of part 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure designated "Appeals in Civil Actions." Sections 1254 and 1257 are in title 7 designated "Eminent Domain" of part 3 headed, "Special proceedings of a civil nature." If any conflict in those sections should seem to exist, therefore, it is proper to invoke section 4481 of the Political Code, reading as follows: "Conflicts between titles, which to prevail. If the provisions of any title conflict with or contravene the provisions of another title, the provisions of each title must prevail, as to all matters and questions arising out of the subject-matter of such title." As to the rule of construction of general and special provisions in a statute the authorities are uniform. It is thus stated in People v. Pacific Improvement Co., 130 Cal. 445, 62 Pac. 740, through Commissioner Cooper: "It is the established rule of construction that the law does not favor a repeal by implication, but that, where there are two or more provisions relating to the same subject-matter, they must, if possible, be construed so as to maintain the integrity of both. It is also the rule that where two statutes treat of the same subject, one being special and the other general, unless they are irreconcilably inconsistent, the latter, although latest in date, will not be held to have repealed the former, but the special act will prevail in its application to the subject-matter as far as coming within its particular provisions." Therein is quoted Judge Cooley (Cooley's Constitutional Limitations [6th Ed.] 182), wherein he said: "The repugnancy between two statutes should be very clear to warrant a court holding that the one later in time repeals the other, when it does not in terms purport to do so. This rule has peculiar force in the case of laws of special and local application, which are never to be deemed repealed by general legislation except upon the most unequivocal manifestation of intent to that effect." See, also, Lewis' Sutherland on Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) § 274, and Miller v. Engle, 3 Cal. App. 330, 85 Pac. 159. It is submitted that no intention was actually manifested by the Legislature, in the said amendment of 1905, to repeal section 1254 or 1257, and in the light of the foregoing familiar rule of construction it should be held that no repeal by implication was effected.

We do not understand that the cases cited by petitioners are necessarily inconsistent with this position.

In Estate of McGee, 154 Cal. 204, 97 Pac. 299, the two sections of the statute under consideration related to the same special subject—that is, the devolution of the title to the homestead premises in case of the death of one of the spouses—and it would seem that no doubt could exist as to the soundness of the decision that the later enactment, being irreconcilable with the earlier, must be recognized as the law upon the subject. The case, however, was decided upon the ground that the question had been settled by the decision in Weinreich v. Hensley, 121 Cal. 647, 54 Pac. 254, and Estate of Fath, 132 Cal. 609, 64 Pac. 995, the court stating, through Mr. Justice Sloss: "It must be taken to be settled that the two Code sections cannot be harmonized, and that, as between them, effect is to be given to the later enactment." In Kennedy v. Board of Education, 32 Cal. 492, 22 Pac. 1045, it was held that the general statute applied to all cities. It would therefore necessarily follow that it controlled special statutes made applicable to particular cities. This case followed People v. Henshaw, 76 Cal. 436, 18 Pac. 413, wherein it was held that the act of March 18, 1885 (St. 1885, p. 213) entitled "An act to provide for police courts in cities having thirty thousand and under one hundred thousand inhabitants, and to provide for officers thereof," repealed the act of March 10, 1866, establishing a police court in the city of Oakland, a city of a population between 30,000 and 100,000 inhabitants. The conclusion from the language used by the Legislature was reasonable that the intent was to make the general statute applicable to all cities coming within its terms. It therefore became operative in the city of Oakland, and, while the Supreme Court properly said that "the law does not favor the repeal of statutes by implication, and will in all proper cases, in the absence of an express clause repealing a former act, so construe the new law that both may stand," yet it was compelled to hold that the later statute was repugnant to the earlier, that both could not stand together, and that, therefore, the earlier was repealed.

The case of City of Los Angeles v. Pomeroy, 132 Cal. 340, 64 Pac. 477, apparently in line with the contention of petitioners, was decided March 25, 1901, while section 1254 contained the unconstitutional provision permitting plaintiff to take possession "at any time after the filing of the complaint, and the issuance and service of the summons thereon." Attention is called to this fact in the opinion filed in the Simas Case, supra, wherein it is said: "Since that decision was made section 1254 of the C. C. P. has been so amended that as now in force it must be taken as creating an addition to the class of cases theretofore constituting exceptions to the general stay of proceedings provided for in section 941 of the Code of Civil Procedure." It may be added that this latter decision, as well as that of the Heilbron Case, supra, was rendered subsequent to the enactment of said section 949 as amended in 1905, although it does not appear that the attention of the reviewing court was called to the amendment. We are satisfied, however, that both cases were correctly decided, and that effect should be given to the said special as well as to the general provision.

[9] As to the contention of petitioners in reference to the segregation of the amount found due the defendants, we think several answers may be made, as suggested by respondent.

In the first place, plaintiff is required by the statute to deposit the amount of the judgment, whatever that may be. Plaintiff is not commanded to make any division of the fund among claimants or to specify how much is deposited for any particular claimant.

[10] Nor is it material that the judgment may be informal or erroneous, as this is a consideration for appeal or motion for a new trial. It is manifest that the asserted infirmity as to the verdict is not a jurisdictional defect which invalidates the judgment, but at most an irregularity to be reviewed in the proper proceeding. If from the record the judgment appeared to be void a different question, of course, would be presented, but that is not the incident case. If there was any failure by the jury to find upon the interest of any particular defendant, and this was error, it can be reviewed hereafter on appeal. The right of the plaintiff to obtain possession of the property is not made dependent upon the impeccability of the verdict. It is well settled that the regularity of the proceedings of the court, if within its jurisdiction, cannot be reviewed on prohibition. Beaulieu Vineyard v. Superior Court, 6 Cal. App. 248, 91 Pac. 1015; Lange v. Superior Court, 11 Cal. App. 5, 103 Pac. 908; Clark v. Superior Court, 55 Cal. 199; Powelson v. Lockwood, 82 Cal. 614, 23 Pac. 143; Bishop v. Superior Court, 87 Cal. 226, 25 Pac. 435. In this respect the same rule must apply to supersedeas.

[11] Again, since it appears from the petition herein that the Reed Orchard Company was the owner of the condemned property and the value of said property was found by the jury, the presumption would be, in the absence of a contrary showing, that this was the value of the owner's interest, and that the interest of the other defendants was of nominal or of no value. In this connection it is to be observed that the petition herein does not negative this presumption, since there is no allegation that the interest of either of the other defendants was of any value at the time the verdict was rendered. The situation here is analogous to that of Scheerer v. Hutton, 7 Cal. App. 527, 94 Pac. 850, wherein it is said: "While it is true that the court did not make a finding as to the ownership of the leasehold, nor of its value, the intendments in favor of such judgment, however, lead to the conclusion that the court found as a question of fact, either that the leasehold possessed no value, or that no leasehold interest was held by petitioner in said premises." But the court goes on to say that: "Whatever may have been the finding of the court in that regard as to the questions of fact, if not warranted by the evidence, it would have been error only. Or assuming that petitioner was the owner of the leasehold, and that it had some value, the legal conclusion of the court that petitioner was entitled to no part of the compensation would have been at most but an error at law, either of which errors could properly be reviewed upon appeal." See, also, In re Road in Kingston Township, 134 Pa. 409, 19 Atl. 750; Taintor v. Mayor of Cambridge, 197 Mass. 412, 83 N. E. 1101.

[12] It would also seem clear that the defendants had the burden of alleging and proving their interests and the value thereof, and that only the defendant meeting that burden should be permitted in this proceeding to question the disposition of the fund. The People's Savings Bank and Komano, having been regularly served with summons and having failed to appear and urge any claim to whatever fund might be awarded, should not be indulged now to stay this public improvement on the ground that the jury did not find the value of an interest which was not alleged to have any value and did not award these defendants money which in the lower court they declined to claim. If the owner of a mortgage or of a leasehold interest can lie by in this way until after judgment and successfully interpose such an objection, it is manifest that fraud is likely to be encouraged thereby at the expense of the public welfare.

In the case of Yellowstone Park Railroad Co. v. Bridger Coal Co., 34 Mont. 545, 87 Pac. 963, 115 Am. St. Rep. 546, 9 Ann. Cas. 470, the Supreme Court of Montana discusses the question at length, reviewing the constitutional and statutory provisions, which are apparently similar to ours, and declares that, "construing these provisions together, it is apparent that the defendant is required to appear and make his defense as in ordinary actions. And, if he fails to appear and save default by one of the modes provided, he has no right to be heard in the subsequent proceedings. This is so notwithstanding the provisions of section 2221 which requires the commissioners appointed to assess the damages to hear the allegations and evidence of all persons interested. The latter provision certainly contemplates cases where the parties defendant are not in default, for if they must, notwithstanding their default, be heard by the commissioners, they may appeal (section 2224) and still have a jury trial as to the amount of damages—a situation which, in view of the provisions applicable to ordinary actions, would be absurd." As suggested by respondent, this precise question as to the effect of the default of a defendant in a condemnation proceeding as to his subsequent conduct in the cause has not been determined in this state, yet it has been held that the burden of establishing value is upon the defendant, and that he must allege and prove his damages. Monterey County v. Cushing, 83 Cal. 509, 23 Pac. 700; Drinkhouse v. Spring Valley W. W., 87 Cal. 255, 25 Pac. 420; San Diego Land Co. v. Neale, 88 Cal. 55, 25 Pac. 977, 11 L. R. A. 604; Alameda v. Cohen, 133 Cal. 5, 65 Pac. 127.

[13, 14] It necessarily follows that if a defendant must allege and prove the value of his property or the amount of his damage, and he declines to claim any amount therefor, he is in no position to complain of any finding of a court or jury, at least in a proceeding like this, as to the value of the property sought to be condemned. The default of said defendants, of course, did not affect the duty of the jury to determine the value of the land which was taken nor would they have been relieved of such duty if the owner had suffered default, since it is a constitutional requirement that property shall not be taken until compensation be made, but, without attempting to prescribe the exact limitations of the principle, it is sufficient to say that the defaulting defendants should not be heard here to question the disposition of said fund. A defaulting defendant undoubtedly has the right of appeal, but even then his attack must be confined to the consideration of jurisdiction or of the sufficiency of the pleadings. San Gabriel Valley Bank v. Lake View Land Co., 4 Cal. App. 630, 89 Pac. 360; Morenhout v. Higuera, 32 Cal. 295; Hutchings v. Ebeler, 46 Cal. 559. In the Morenhout Case, supra, referring to the effect of a default, it is said: "To say that the judgment is not conclusive upon them because they neglected to appear and exhibit their interests is preposterous. Such a doctrine would place it in the power of an obstinate tenant to defeat and prevent a partition in all cases by merely staying out of court. They were made parties and had an opportunity to appear and take part in the proceedings. Their default was a confession that they had no interest in the land, and the court had jurisdiction to so adjudge expressly. But had it not done so, and passed them in silence, the result would have been the same, for a judgment that the land belonged to the parties between whom it was divided would have been equally as conclusive against their title; they having been made parties and served with process."

[15] Since there is no allegation to the contrary in the petition, we may assume, also, that no objection was made to the form of verdict rendered by the jury.

[16] It is true that the jury are directed by the statute (section 1248, Code Civ. Proc.) to "ascertain and assess the value of the property sought to be condemned and all improvements thereon pertaining to the realty, and of each and every separate estate or interest therein." But in a case where there are such separate interests of value, and the jury returns a verdict informal in this respect, it is manifestly the duty of the aggrieved party to point out the defect that it may be corrected. If he fail to do so, it is only just that he should thereafter be precluded from complaining. Of course, the general principle is universally recognized as stated by Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, p. 1555, as follows: "So that no principle or rule of appellate practice is more strongly entrenched, both by reason and by precedent, than that which requires objections or errors to be first brought to the attention of the trial court before the appellate court is asked to review them."

[17] Section 619 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "When the verdict is announced, if it is informal or insufficient, in not covering the issues submitted, it may be corrected by the jury under the advice of the court, or the jury may be again sent out." It is readily admitted that the verdict may be so defective as to be subject to subsequent attack, although no objection be made at the time it is rendered, but the situation here is of a very different nature. Upon this point respondent cites the following cases: Winans v. Christy, 4 Cal. 80, 60 Am. Dec. 597; Algier v. Steamer Maria, 14 Cal. 170; Campbell v. Jones, 41 Cal. 515; Pacific Coast Railway Co. v. Porter, 74 Cal. 262, 15 Pac. 774; Big Lost River Irr. Co. v. Davidson, 21 Idaho, 160, 121 Pac. 92; Metropolitan, etc., Ry. Co. v. Eschner, 232 Ill. 210, 83 N. E. 809; Golden Gate Mill Co. v. Joshua Hendy Machine Works, 82 Cal. 184, 23 Pac. 45; Ryan v. Fitzgerald, 87 Cal. 347, 25 Pac. 546; Johnson v. Vishner, 96 Cal. 314, 31 Pac. 106; Southern Missouri v. Wyatt, 223 Mo. 347, 122 S. W. 688.

In the Davidson Case, supra, decided by the Supreme Court of Idaho, it seems that a reversal was sought because separate awards had not been made for several tracts of land, section 5220 of the Revised Codes of that state being the same as said section 1248 of the California Code of Civil Procedure. After stating that it appeared that the several tracts were necessary for the intended use, and that it would be presumed evidence was received of the value of each parcel, it was declared that, in the absence of the instructions, "it will be presumed that the court correctly instructed the jury and told them that in determining the question of value they should separately assess and determine each different parcel. In returning the verdict, however, the jury seems to have found the aggregate value of the several parcels or tracts of land, and to have included therein the value assessed by them upon each separate parcel. This, of course, is not in accordance with the requirements of the statute, and it would have been better and more in conformity with the statute to have found separately the value of each separate parcel and the aggregate value of the damages for the several parcels. When said verdict was returned, the appellant made no objections to the form of the verdict, or in any way called the trial court's attention to the fact that the verdict was not in conformity with the form required by the statute, and the insufficiency of the verdict was in no way called to the attention of the trial court. * * * We think, under the authorities and the decisions of this court, that appellant waived any objections to the form of the verdict, and cannot present the matter for the first time in this court."

In the Johnson Case, supra, the Supreme Court of this state said: "If the defendant was dissatisfied with the form of the verdict, he should have asked at the time it was announced, that it be made formal and certain; otherwise it was the duty of the court to construe it so as to give it the effect intended by the jury, if the intended effect could be ascertained from its language, considered in connection with the pleadings and evidence; provided, however, that the intended effect was not unlawful, and not irrelevant to the pleadings. Truebody v. Jacobson, 2 Cal. 270; People v. McCarty, 48 Cal. 557; People v. Perdue, 49 Cal. 425. And, as a general rule, a party will not be heard to object to a verdict for the first time on appeal from the judgment, if it is susceptible of a construction which may have a lawful and relevant effect (Douglass v. Kraft, 9 Cal. 562), and this case does not appear to fall within any exception to the rule."

[18] It may be added that upon the assumption that the defaulting defendants had some interest in the property that was and is of substantial value it is a fair inference that its adjustment is a matter of mere computation, and that the apportionment among the claimants of the entire fund, which represents the full value of the property, will give rise to no unfriendly or troublesome dispute. It there should be any serious controversy as to the extent of these interests, there is ample authority for the settlement of it by the court. In connection with said section 1248 of the Code of Civil Procedure must be read section 1247 which provides that "the court shall have power * * * (2) to hear and determine all adverse or conflicting claims to the property sought to be condemned and to the damages therefor."

[19] Again, as before seen, since there is no allegation that the lease is still in force, we may assume, as alleged in the answer of respondent, that by its terms it ceased to be operative on condemnation of the land, and it may for that reason be ignored as of no value.

[20] As for the deed of trust or mortgage, it may be inferred that the residue of the 140-acre tract is abundant security for the payment of whatever may be due the mortgagee. At any rate, under a long line of authorities, if there should be any necessity for it, the mortgagee may resort to the fund in the custody of the court to satisfy any deficiency.

In the Matter of Morris Avenue, 118 App. Div. 121, 103 N. Y. Supp. 182, it is said: "The question as to the right to an award as between a mortgagee and the owner of the equity has arisen in several cases and the rule seems to be well established that, where a mortgage has been given upon property prior to the taking of a portion thereof by the city, if upon a foreclosure and sale after the taking by the city the amount realized is insufficient to meet the mortgage debt, the lien of the mortgage would extend to and embrace so much of the damages as awarded as should be needed to make good the deficiency. In the Matter of the City of Rochester, 136 N. Y. 83, 32 N. E. 102, 19 L. R. A. 161, where title to a part of certain mortgaged premises was subsequently foreclosed and the land sold by the original description leaving a deficiency, the court said: 'The balance of the land only could be sold and conveyed on the foreclosure. The referee's deed could convey and did convey only that balance and the right of the mortgagee became merely an equitable lien on the fund in the hands of the court to the extent of any deficiency which the land still should pay. The fund was not sold. It simply remained in the hands of the court for distribution.'" Numerous other decisions bearing upon the subject have been cited, among which are the following: Kansas City v. North American Trust Co., 110 Mo. App. 647, 85 S. W. 682; Chicago, K. & W. R. Co. v. Sheldon, 53 Kan. 169, 35 Pac. 1105; Bright v. Platt, 32 N. J. Eq. 370; Union Mutual Life Insurance Co. v. Slee, 123 Ill. 95, 12 N. E. 543; Markley v. Langley, 92 U. S. 152, 23 L. Ed. 701; Buchanan v. Kansas City, 208 Mo. 674, 106 S. W. 531, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 834; Wood v. Westborough, 140 Mass. 410, 5 N. E. 613; Bates v. Boston Elevated Railway, 187 Mass. 337, 72 N. E. 1017.

The foregoing considerations, in the main, probably would be more apposite to a motion for a new trial or an appeal from the order denying it or from the judgment, but it is conceived that they are also of importance in the determination of the character of the judgment, a question necessarily involved in the application before us.

Petitioners attach much importance to the case of Butte County v. Boydston, 64 Cal. 110, 29 Pac. 511, but it is to be observed that the decision therein was rendered on appeal from the judgment and order refusing a new trial, and no question was raised as to conflicting claimants to the fund. There was a failure to find the several elements of damage as required by the statute, and it was properly held that "the judgment is erroneous and must be reversed."

Some other points are discussed by counsel, but it is believed that sufficient consideration has been devoted to the subject, and that no reasonable doubt exists that under the law respondent can be justified in taking the contemplated action.

The demurrer is therefore sustained, and the order to show cause discharged.

REED ORCHARD CO. et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR YOLO COUNTY et al.
(Sac. 2,057.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 6, 1912.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 477*)—POWER TO ISSUE.

The power to issue a writ of supersedeas is one of the inherent powers of the Court of Appeals to be exercised in any proper case when it appears necessary so to do to preserve the rights of a litigant until final determination of his appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2247-2249; Dec. Dig. § 477.*]

In Bank. Petition by the Reed Orchard Company and others against the Superior Court in and for Yolo County and judge thereof for writ of supersedeas. Upon a demurrer to the petition being sustained and order to show cause being discharged by the Court of Appeals (128 Pac. 9), the petitioners seek a hearing in the Supreme Court. Hearing denied.

Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, and White, Miller & McLaughlin, of Sacramento, for petitioners. T. T. C. Gregory, of Fairfield, and John S. Partridge, of San Francisco, Elmer W. Armfield, of Woodland, and C. J. Goodell, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The petition that the application in the above-entitled matter for a supersedeas, originally heard and determined in the Court of Appeals, be given a hearing in this court is denied. This denial, however, is not to be construed as an affirmation of the views expressed by the Court of Appeals as to the scope of the writ of supersedeas and the circumstances under which such a writ will be issued.

The power to issue such a writ is one of the inherent powers of a Court of Appeals, to be exercised in any proper case when it appears necessary so to do to preserve the rights of a litigant until final determination of his appeal. Rogers v. Superior Court, 158 Cal. 467, 111 Pac. 357.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH-CABLE CO. v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES. (L. A. 2,972.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 14, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 13, 1912.)

1. TAXATION (§ 319*)—ASSESSMENT—FRANCHISE—DESCRIPTION.

If a telegraph company owned a state franchise in the streets of a city, the description in the assessment as the "franchise of the P. Telegraph Company in the city of Los Angeles" will be deemed to refer to the state franchise alone, and not to the federal, nontaxable franchise.

2. TAXATION (§ 425*) — ASSESSMENT — FRANCHISES—DESCRIPTION.

A description of a franchise of a telegraph company as the "franchise of the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company in the city of Los Angeles" sufficiently described it as a state franchise.

3. TAXATION (§ 117*)—"FRANCHISE"—USE OF STREETS.

A right to occupy the streets is a franchise for purposes of taxation.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 3, pp. 2929-2942; vol. 8, p. 7666.]

4. TAXATION (§ 155*)—FRANCHISE.

The franchise granted by the act of Congress to the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company only authorizes it to use the highways of the state subject to charges imposed by the state, and the right to use a highway without compensation is a privilege which is taxable as a franchise in each city and county in which the highways are located.

5. TAXATION (§ 155*)—FRANCHISES—USE OF HIGHWAYS.

Civ. Code, § 536, permitting telegraph corporations to construct lines upon any public highway, is a continuing offer by the state to permit telegraph companies to use streets and highways without compensation for telegraph purposes, and the acceptance of such privilege gives to the company a right which is taxable as a state franchise, distinct from its federal franchise.

6. PLEADING (§ 8*)—CONCLUSIONS.

In an action by a telegraph company to recover a sum claimed to have been illegally paid to the state as a franchise tax, the complaint described its federal franchise and alleged that, under such franchise and not otherwise, plaintiff had for years maintained lines through the highways of the state, and that such lines were declared post roads by act of Congress, and plaintiff had never had any franchise from the state or any municipal corporation. Held, that the allegations that plaintiff used the streets solely under its federal franchise, and had none from the state, were but conclusions; the essential allegation of fact being that of use of the streets.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 12-28½; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

7. TRIAL (§ 404*)—FINDINGS—CONSTRUCTION.

A finding that the allegations of fact in a complaint are true is not a finding that any conclusions of law contained therein are likewise true.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company against the City of Los Angeles. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

John W. Shenk, City Atty., E. R. Young, Asst. City Atty., and Myron Westover, Deputy City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Hunsaker, Britt & Fleming, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The object of this action was to recover the sum of $625 paid by plaintiff, under duress, in discharge of city taxes of 1907, alleged to have been illegally assessed against the plaintiff upon certain of its property which, it is claimed, was not subject to taxation by said city. The validity of the plaintiff's claim depends on the question whether or not the property was thus subject to taxation. The defendant appeals upon the judgment roll alone.

The assessment shows that it was made upon property of the plaintiff described as "franchise of the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company in the city of Los Angeles." Respondent claims that it has no franchise within the city of Los Angeles, except a federal franchise under the act of Congress of July 24, 1866, to operate and maintain telegraph lines over the military and post roads of the United States. It is conceded by the city that the streets of Los Angeles are military and post roads of the United States, that the plaintiff has a franchise from the United States under said act to operate telegraph lines thereon, and that said franchise is not taxable for local, state, or municipal purposes. The position of the counsel for the city is that the plaintiff, in addition to its federal franchise, owns and is in the use of a franchise from the state of California to operate its telegraph lines over said streets, and that it is this state franchise, and not the federal franchise, which is described in said assessment.

[1, 2] If, under the facts as found by the court, plaintiff owns a state franchise in said streets, then, under the decisions of this court in Western U. T. Co. v. Los Angeles County, 160 Cal. 124, 116 Pac. 564, and Postal T. C. Co. v. Los Angeles County, 160 Cal. 129, 116 Pac. 566, the description given in said assessment is to be deemed to refer to that franchise alone and not to the federal nontaxable franchise, and it is a sufficient description of the state franchise. The descriptions held sufficient in those cases were in the words, "right to occupy the streets of the city of Los Angeles." It was held that it would not be assumed from the face of the description that the assessor thereby intended to describe the nontaxable federal franchise, but, on the contrary, that he intended to refer only to the state franchise which he had the power to assess.

[3] A "right to occupy the streets" is a franchise. There is no material difference between the language of the descriptions in those cases and that in the case at bar and the same reasoning applies.

The finding is that "the allegations of fact contained in plaintiff's complaint are true." It is contended that these allegations of the complaint show that the plaintiff did not own any state franchise, but was operating its lines in the city solely under its federal franchise. This claim is not supported by the allegations of fact referred to. After describing the federal franchise, the complaint alleges that "under and by virtue of such federal franchise, and not otherwise, plaintiff has been for many years last past, was on the first Monday of March, 1907, and still is, constructing and maintaining and operating lines of telegraph through and over the public roads and highways of the city of Los Angeles," that all said lines in said city are maintained and operated only through and over public highways which have been declared post roads by act of Congress, and that "plaintiff has not now, and never had, any franchise of any kind or description for any purpose whatever from the state of California," or from any political or municipal incorporation thereof. The controlling fact here averred is that the plaintiff is, and was at the time of the assessment, maintaining and operating its telegraph lines through and over the streets of Los Angeles.

[4] It is now the settled law of this state that the franchise granted by the act of Congress aforesaid does not give the telegraph company an unincumbered right to occupy the highways of a state by its poles and wires, but that the right is subject to charges which may be imposed by the state for such occupancy and use of its public ways, and that if the state grants the right to such company to use such part of the highways without compensation, such right is a privilege which is nothing more nor less than a franchise in such highways, a franchise having a local situs and assessable in each city or county in which such highways are situated. Western U. T. Co. v. Hopkins, 160 Cal. 106, 116 Pac. 557; Western U. T. Co. v. Los Angeles County, supra; Postal T. Co. v. Los Angeles, supra.

[5] It is also settled by these cases that section 536 of the Civil Code constitutes a continuing offer by the state to all telegraph companies of the right to use without compensation such portions of the streets of any city as may be necessary or convenient for the operation of its lines, that, when such company accepts this offer by placing and maintaining its poles and wires in, along, and over said streets, it thereby acquires from the state a right in the parts of the streets so occupied, which right is a taxable franchise, and distinct and separate from the federal franchise. The parts of the streets so taken are in the exclusive occupancy of the company. The state and the public are excluded therefrom, and cease to use such portions for ordinary highway purposes. The company which erects its poles and wires in the streets of a city in this manner, by permission of the state so given, cannot lawfully claim or maintain that it does this solely under and by virtue of the federal franchise, or that it has no franchise from the state. The statement by the plaintiff of the physical fact that it is and has been maintaining and operating its lines of telegraph through and over the public highways of the city of Los Angeles establishes, as a matter of law and of fact, the proposition that it has accepted and owns the state franchise for that purpose which was offered to it by section 536. The state cannot deny that this right is vested in the company, nor can the company dispute it while admitting and averring that it is using the streets as a place for its poles and wires.

[6] The additional averments of the complaint that the plaintiff does this solely by virtue of the federal franchise, and that it has no franchise from the state, are nothing more than conclusions, and, in view of the other facts stated, they are mere erroneous conclusions of law.

[7] The finding that the allegations of fact in the complaint are true is not a finding that any conclusions of law therein are true, much less that these unfounded conclusions are true. It follows that the tax was lawfully assessed upon property lawfully taxable, and that plaintiff had no right to demand reimbursement.

The judgment is reversed.

1. TAXATION (§ 373*)—PUBLIC SERVICE CORPORATION—REPORTS OF OPERATIVE PROPERTY—PROTEST—TIME.

Under St. 1911, p. 538, § 10, relative to taxation of property of public service corporation, its operative property being taxable only for state purposes, providing that, if an assessor finds in the company's report of its operative property in his city any property he regards as nonoperative, he shall, within 30 days after receiving the report, give notice of protest to the State Board of Equalization, which shall then consider and decide the matter, his giving notice in such time is jurisdictional, so that being given later the board need not consider the protest.

2. MANDAMUS (§ 117*)—PUBLIC OFFICERS—BREACH OF DUTY.

Mandamus will not lie to the State Board of Equalization to make an order disposing of an assessor's protest that a public service company's report of operative property for taxation includes nonoperative property, its failure to make the order not being a breach of duty, because the protest was made within the time required by St. 1911, p. 538, § 10, to entitle it to a hearing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 249; Dec. Dig. § 117.*]

In Bank. Application by the Pacific Electric Railway Company for writ of mandate to Edward Rolkin and others, members of the State Board of Equalization. Denied.

J. W. McKinley, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. [1, 2] The city assessor of Los Angeles did not file any protest against the taxation of the property in question as operative property of the Pacific Electric Railway Company until more than 30 days after he had received the copy of the company's report which the law requires to be served upon him. The provision of the statute (Stats. 1911, p. 538, § 10) that such protest shall be filed within 30 days thereafter is jurisdictional. A protest filed later has no effect, and does not require the state board to revise or alter its action in placing such property on the roll as operative property, or to dispose of the protest in any way. Its failure to make any order disposing of the protest is therefore not a breach of duty, and mandamus will not lie to compel the entry of such order. Its act placing such property on the roll as operative property is as valid as if the belated protest had not been filed.

For these reasons, the application for a writ of mandate is denied.

In view of Civ. Where an irrigation company which appropriated water from a river to irrigate a named county, organized subsidiary corporations for the purchase of the land in that territory, and transferred to them perpetual water rights for the irrigation of land owned by them, there was no dedication of the water right to public use; the essential feature of a public use being that it shall not be confined to privileged individuals, but open to the indefinite public, while in this case not every landowner could use water.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; George H. Hutton, Judge.

Petition by C. E. Thayer and another for writ of mandamus against W. H. Holabird, as receiver of the California Development Company, in which the Imperial Water Company No. 1 intervened. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants and intervenor appeal. Reversed.

W. B. Mathews and S. B. Robinson, both of Los Angeles (J. W. McKinley and S. V. McClure, both of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. Conkling & Brown, of El Centro, for respondents. Hunsaker & Britt, of Los Angeles (W. N. Goodwin, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for intervener and appellant.

PER CURIAM. This is a proceeding in mandamus, instituted in the superior court of Imperial county on December 20, 1910, to compel the California Development Company, a corporation, through its receiver, to deliver to plaintiff C. E. Thayer, the wife of her co-plaintiff, W. A. Thayer, out of its central main in Imperial valley, water to irrigate her lands, upon the theory that the water therein is appropriated and held by it for sale, rental, and distribution generally to the members of that farming neighborhood. Defendants and intervener joined issue on that question. The trial court found with plaintiffs and entered judgment accordingly. These are appeals from such judgment by defendant Holabird, the receiver, and by the intervener.

The California Development Company was organized under the laws of the state of New Jersey for the purpose, among others, of acquiring, holding, constructing, and maintaining headings, dams, ditches, etc., for collecting, storing, and conducting water and irrigating land; supplying and distributing water to and irrigating and cultivating the land of itself and of others; and of selling or letting such water or the right to use the same. On December 15, 1895, it caused to be posted at a point on the Colorado river in this state, distant 1,600 feet north of the point where the international boundary line between the United States and Mexico crosses said river, a notice of appropriation claiming for itself and others 10,000 cubic feet flow per second of the waters of said river at that point. The notice further stated that it claimed the right to said water for the purpose of "developing power and for the irrigation of land in San Diego county, state of California, and in Lower California, Republic of Mexico." It was also stated in said notice that "we purpose carrying the water from the above-described point of diversion through a canal which will run in a southwesterly direction through Lower California, Republic of Mexico, and thence into that portion of San Diego county, state of California, lying to the east of the San Jacinto mountains and known as the 'New River Country.' Said canal will be 200 feet in width, and will carry a depth of 10 feet of water. Its length will be 50 miles, more or less." The detour into Mexico was rendered necessary by topographical conditions. The portion of San Diego county referred to was what is now known as the Imperial valley, and all of the same is now contained in the subsequently created county known as Imperial county.

In furtherance of its general plan, the California Development Company caused a corporation to be formed under Mexican laws, as its agent and instrument in Mexico, known as "La Sociedad de Yrrigacion y Terrenos de law Baja California (Sociedad Anonima)," the capital stock of which has always been owned and controlled by it, and which practically is the California Development Company under another name. Through this agency, it holds all its Mexican property, including some 100,000 acres of land, and enters into contracts, including contracts for the furnishing of water in Mexico. The existence of this separate corporation is really an immaterial matter so far as the questions involved in this case are concerned. Whatever was done through it will be regarded as in fact done by the California Development Company.

Before January 11, 1902, said Development Company had constructed from said point on the Colorado river at which its notice of appropriation was posted, known as "Hanlon's heading," southwesterly through Mexico a distance of 20 miles, and thence northwesterly to a point on the international boundary line, a canal with the capacity sufficient to carry and deliver at said point not less than 1,500 cubic feet of water per second. Said company has never owned any of the land in Imperial valley to which it proposed to furnish water for irrigation. Those lands are naturally arid and desert in character, and without irrigation are worthless and uninhabitable, but are of great and exceptional fertility when irrigated. They are irrigable from the Colorado river and from no other source. At the date of the organization of the Development Company, such valley was unoccupied and a dessert, and substantially the whole thereof was surveyed public land of either the United States or the state of California.

The plan adopted by the Development Company for its disposition of the water for irrigating such lands was substantially as follows: The company mapped out districts of territory in Imperial valley as units of irrigation, each of which was to be occupied by a mutual water company formed under the laws of this state. These companies were to be organized by the Development Company, each of said companies to have a capital stock divided into as many shares as there were approximately acres of land in the district described in its articles of incorporation, which the Development Company believed could be reasonably irrigated. The purpose of each said company was to be to procure water for the irrigation of said tract and distribute the same upon land owned by its stockholder only within said general tract, at the rate of not to exceed four acre feet per annum per acre for such share of stock owned by each stockholder, and for its stockholders only. Each share of stock was to be located upon lands at the rate of one share per acre for each acre of land owned by stockholders, where the same could be served by the ditches of the company. The Development Company was to furnish to each of said mutual companies the requisite water for its purposes at a fixed charge per acre foot.

The Development Company caused seven of such mutual companies to be organized, known as Imperial Water Companies Nos. 1, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 12, with an estimated aggregate of irrigable land of 400,000 acres. Imperial Water Company No. 1 was organized by five agents of the Development Company on March 23, 1900. The district allotted to it was estimated to contain 100,000 acres of irrigable land, and the capital stock therefor was made 100,000 shares, with a par value of $10 per share. Among its purposes declared in its articles was one to secure a supply of water for irrigation, domestic, and other purposes, and to distribute the same at cost among its stockholders only for use on the lands situated in its district, which were described therein. The by-laws were in accord with the plan already referred to, and required each share of stock to be located on land in the district, and restricted the use of water to land on which stock had been located. The stock was transferable, and its place of location could be changed by the owner to any land within the district of a mutual company issuing it. Under a contract between said Imperial Water Company No. 1 and the Development Company, all of the stock of the former, except 2,500 shares, was sold by the Development Company for its own benefit, at an average of $15 per share, in consideration of which the Development Company constructed a main canal through the territory of the mutual water company of sufficient capacity to convey the requisite amount of water to irrigate the lands of the stockholders, being an amount in the aggregate not less than sufficient to furnish annually four acre feet of water for each outstanding share of stock of the mutual water company, and also constructed the necessary lateral or distributing ditches which are owned by the mutual water companies. The Development Company agreed to perpetually furnish said water through such canal and the lateral ditches for 50 cents for each acre foot delivered. Substantially similar contracts were made with each of the other water companies.

All of the stock of Imperial Water Company No. 1, including the 2,500 shares retained by it, has been sold to individuals who have located the same upon land in the district of said company, and are cultivating the same, and the Development Company has been delivering water to such mutual company in accordance with its undertaking. The same is true as to the other mutual companies. Neither the Development Company nor its receiver has ever delivered or furnished any water for irrigation or other purposes to any land in Imperial valley, or to any consumer of water other than under and in accordance with such agreements, except that water has been furnished under contract to the city of Imperial, a municipal corporation, and to the Holton Power Company, and all water delivered to such companies has been delivered under and in pursuance of the terms of said agreement. Since the year 1904, said mutual corporations have not been controlled or dominated by the Development Company.

There are between 15,000 and 30,000 acres of land within the district of Imperial Water Company No. 1 in excess of the number of shares of the capital stock provided in its articles of incorporation. Plaintiff C. E. Thayer owns 40 acres of such land which is in condition for cultivation and irrigation, and which she desires to irrigate and plant, but upon which no water stock has been located. This land is under the flow of the canal of the Development Company, and constitutes a part of the lands for irrigation of which the said waters were appropriated. By reason of the fact that all of the stock of said Imperial Water Company No. 1 has been disposed of to others who have located it upon other land, she is unable to procure stock to locate thereon, and Imperial Water Company No. 1 has no water except such as it has procured for its stockholders. On October 18, 1910, she demanded of the defendant receiver that he deliver to her water for the irrigation of such land, namely, 100 miner's inches for 24 hours, tendering him $20 therefor, which, as we understand, is at the rate of 50 cents for each acre foot, which it is claimed was the rate fixed and charged by said Development Company to the other consumers of water. The board of supervisors of Imperial county has never fixed the rates at which the Development Company shall sell, etc., water in such county. The receiver refused to comply with the demand of Mrs. Thayer.

On December 13, 1909, an action was commenced in the superior court of Imperial county by the Title Insurance & Trust Company, a corporation, against the Development Company and others to foreclose the mortgage held by the plaintiff therein upon the irrigation system of the Development Company, and on the same day defendant Holabird was appointed by said court receiver of said system, and has ever since been in control and management of said system. There was, we think, enough in the evidence to sustain the conclusion of the trial court substantially to the effect that the Development Company had sufficient water to comply with the demand of Mrs. Thayer without impairing its ability to furnish to those with whom it was under contract the water required by them. The evidence shows that the Development Company, through its Mexican agency, furnishes water for irrigation to individual consumers in Mexico at the rate of 50 cents for each acre foot. The agreements between the Imperial Water Company No. 1 and the Development Company provided that all water delivered to the former is delivered at the Mexican boundary line, and the Development Company has no interest in said water so delivered after it is delivered at said place. Said Development Company is the owner of the main canal in such district through which such water is carried.

The claim of the plaintiff is, and of necessity must be, that the California Development Company is, either directly or indirectly through auxiliary companies, engaged in supplying water for public use; that the water controlled by it is dedicated to such use; that the land of plaintiff C. E. Thayer is a part of the lands to which such water is dedicated; and therefore that she is entitled to a portion of the water for the irrigation thereof on payment of the lawfully established rate therefor. See Fellows v. Los Angeles, 151 Cal. 58, 90 Pac. 137. The controlling question in the case, therefore, is whether or not the water here involved is devoted to public use.

[1] Under the law of this state as established at the beginning, the water right which a person gains by diversion from a stream for a beneficial use is a private right—a right subject to ownership and disposition by him, as in the case of other private property. All the decisions recognize it as such. Many of them refer to it in terms which can have no other meaning than that the right is private property. We need not cite them all. The following early cases sufficiently establish the proposition: Eddy v. Simpson, 3 Cal. 251, 58 Am. Dec. 408; Irwin v. Phillips, 5 Cal. 146, 63 Am. Dec. 113; Tartar v. Spring Creek Co., 5 Cal. 398; Conger v. Weaver, 6 Cal. 557, 65 Am. Dec. 528; Hoffman v. Stone, 7 Cal. 49; Maeris v. Bicknell, 7 Cal. 262, 68 Am. Dec. 257; Hill v. King, 8 Cal. 337; Kimball v. Gearhart, 12 Cal. 47; Ortmian v. Dixon, 13 Cal. 38; Kidd v. Laird, 15 Cal. 180, 76 Am. Dec. 472; Rupley v. Welch, 23 Cal. 455.

[2] By the act of Congress of July 26, 1866 (Act July 26, 1866, c. 262, 14 Stat. 251), the United States confirmed all water rights then vested in streams upon the public domain in California, and provided for the acquisition of similar rights therein in the future. These, of course, became private property when so acquired. De Necochea v. Curtis, 80 Cal. 397, 20 Pac. 563, 22 Pac. 198; Natoma Co. v. Hancock, 101 Cal. 43, 31 Pac. 112, 35 Pac. 334.

[3] The Civil Code of 1872 recognizes and declares the same doctrine and prescribes the mode by which water rights may be gained and protected. Section 1410 declares that "the right to the use of running water" of a stream, canyon, or ravine "may be acquired by appropriation." The succeeding sections to 1422, inclusive, prescribe the mode by which it may be acquired. The language plainly imports that the right, when acquired, is the property of the person who claims it and takes the steps prescribed to gain it. And generally it is true that, even when property is dedicated or appropriated to public use for gain by persons or private corporations, the title and ownership is private, and the only interest of the public is that of beneficiaries of the use or trust. The property does not become impressed with a public use or trust until after the owner has first acquired it and then dedicated it to the use. The acts of acquisition and of dedication, respectively, are distinct from each other. Technically the latter must follow the former and cannot precede or accompany it. An "appropriation of water" under the Code is therefore not, ipso facto, a dedication or appropriation to public use. The additional act of dedication is as necessary to the creation of a public use in a water right so acquired as it would be if the right was acquired by conveyance or in any other manner, or as in the case of any other property dedicated to public use. It follows that, if the water appropriated from the Colorado river by the California Development Company is now devoted or dedicated to public use so as to be available to the use of the plaintiffs, it is because of some acts or declarations of that company other than those by which it acquired the right to divert the water from the river.

[4] Definitions of the term "public use" are usually found in decisions involving the right of eminent domain or in those relating to public charities. A bequest to establish a home for the orphans of deceased Odd Fellows is not made to a public use. In deciding this point the court says: "It is an essential feature of the latter (a public trust) that the beneficiaries are uncertain; a class of persons described in some general language, often fluctuating, changing in their individual members, and partaking of a quasi public character. * * * The smallest street is public, for all have an equal right to travel on it; but a way used by thousands, which may be shut against a stranger, is private." Troutman Co. v. De Boissiere, 66 Kan. 1, 71 Pac. 286; Pennoyer v. Wadhams, 20 Or. 274, 25 Pac. 720, 11 L. R. A. 210; Burd Orphan Asylum v. School Dist., 90 Pa. 29. "The general public must have a definite and fixed use of the property to be condemned; a use independent of the will of the private person or private corporation in whom the title to the property, when condemned, will be vested; a public use which cannot be defeated by such private owner." Fallsburg P. Co. v. Alexander, 101 Va. 98, 43 S. E. 194, 61 L. R. A. 129, 99 Am. St. Rep. 855. This case holds that water to be acquired by a company for transmission and distribution to any place "for its own use, or for the use of other individuals or corporations," would not be devoted to public use, because the company retained power to choose who should have it. See, also, Tyler v. Beacher, 44 Vt. 648, 8 Am. Rep. 398; In re Barre, 62 Vt. 32, 20 Atl. 109, 9 L. R. A. 195; Ryerson v. Brown, 35 Mich. 333, 21 Am. Rep. 564. The term "public use" "implies 'the use of many' or 'by the public,' but it may be limited to the inhabitants of a small or restricted locality, but the use must be in common and not for a particular individual." Pocantico v. Bird, 130 N. Y. 249, 29 N. E. 246. Water carried in a ditch to be let out for hire to all who apply for it is devoted to public use. Paxton v. Farmers' Co., 45 Neb. 894, 64 N. W. 343, 29 L. R. A. 853, 50 Am. St. Rep. 585. Market stalls which the owner lets out to such persons and upon such terms as he chooses are not in public use. The test is "whether the public have the legal right to the use, which cannot be gainsaid, or denied, or withdrawn, at the pleasure of the owner." Farmers' Market Co. v. Railroad Co., 142 Pa. 580, 21 Atl. 902, 989. "The essential feature of a public use is that it is not confined to privileged individuals, but is open to the indefinite public. It is this indefiniteness or unrestricted quality that gives it its public character. The smallest street in the smallest village is a public highway of the commonwealth, and none the less so because the vast majority of the citizens will never derive any benefit from its use. It is enough that they may do so if they choose." White v. Smith, 189 Pa. 228, 42 Atl. 125, 43 L. R. A. 498; Donohugh's Appeal, 86 Pa. 306. See, also, Phillips v. Watson, 63 Iowa, 33, 18 N. W. 659; Bennett's Appeal, 65 Pa. 250; Dalles v. Urquhart, 16 Or. 67, 19 Pac. 78.

In the case of the use of water in villages, towns, and cities, the right to the use usually extends to every inhabitant within the range of the distributing system or who can get access thereto. In the case of water for irrigation, the class is necessarily more select, and does not include the general public within the area served. But this is so because it is not every inhabitant that can make that use of the water. Only those occupying land can do so. And for this reason it is held that, while there may be a public use for the benefit of landowners, the use of water for irrigation is not public unless the water is available, as of right, upon equal terms, to all landowners of the class and within the area to be benefited who can get water from the ditches to their lands. If the dispenser of water has the right to say who shall have it, and upon what terms, selling to one and refusing to sell to another at will, it is not devoted to public use.

In Fallbrook Irr. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 161, 17 Sup. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369, the United States Supreme Court was considering the question whether or not the water belonging to an irrigation district organized under the California statute of 1887, and acquired for and applied to its authorized uses and purposes, was water dedicated to a public use. The circuit court had decided that it was not for public use, and that the district works were not public improvements, because the water was held for the exclusive use of the landowners of the district and not for the general public within its limits. Upon this question the Supreme Court on appeal said: "The fact that the use of the water is limited to the landowner is not therefore a fatal objection to this legislation. It is not essential that the entire community, or even any considerable portion thereof, should directly enjoy or participate in an improvement in order to constitute a public use. All landowners in the district have the right to a proportionate share of the water, and no one landowner is favored above his fellows in his right to the use of the water. It is not necessary, in order that the use should be public, that every resident in the district should have the right to the use of the water. The water is not used for general, domestic, or for drinking purposes, and it is plain, from the scheme of the act, that the water is intended for the use of those who expect to use it on their lands. * * * We think it clearly appears that all who, by reason of their ownership of or connection with any portion of the lands, would have occasion to use the water would in truth have the opportunity to use it upon the same terms as all others similarly situated. In this way the use, so far as this point is concerned, is public because all persons have the right to use the water under the same circumstances. This is sufficient." (The italics are ours.)

The decisions in this state are to the same effect. The first and leading case on the general subject is Gilmer v. Lime Point, 18 Cal. 229, at page 252, where it was held that a fort for protection against foreign invasion was a public use for which the state might authorize the condemnation of land. The court said: "This public use need not be a use general or common to all the people of the state alike. It may be a use in which a small portion of the public will be directly benefited, as a street in a town, a bridge, or a railroad, necessarily local in its benefits and advantages, but it must be of such a character as that the general public may, if they choose, avail themselves of it." In Miners' Ditch Co. v. Zellerbach, 37 Cal. 543, at page 590 (99 Am. Dec. 300), the plaintiff corporation was organized to take water from the Yuba river and use the same for mining and mechanical purposes and to sell it to others for mining purposes. It does not appear that it was offered generally to the public. The court said that the corporation was under no obligation to the public to continue the business, and that it "was created for the immediate benefit of its stockholders, with no direct specific public purpose in view, as in the case of a railroad or turnpike or canal company. The only interest the public has in the continuance of the business is the remote, general interest, which it has in the proper development of the resources of the country"—in effect, that its property was not devoted to public use. In Price v. Riverside, 56 Cal. 432, it is said that every corporation formed under the act of 1862 (St. 1862, p. 540), "has impressed upon it a public trust—the duty of furnishing water, if water it has, to all those who come within the class or community for whose alleged benefit it has been created." In McCrary v. Beaudry, 67 Cal. 120, 7 Pac. 264, it was decided that water conducted through pipes laid in the streets by permission of the city of Los Angeles, and supplied by the owner to residences along those streets at fixed rates, was devoted to a public use, and that residents along such streets who had received the water were entitled to have the service continued on paying the rates. In Merrill v. South Side I. Co., 112 Cal. 426, 44 Pac. 720, the defendant company was engaged in selling, distributing, and delivering water for irrigation upon the lands along the line of its pipe. Plaintiff's land was along said pipe line, and defendant had sold plaintiff water to irrigate the same, but refused to continue to do so and extended its pipes to new lands to which it delivered the water previously supplied to plaintiffs. It was held that this was a public use for the lands along the pipe line, and that mandamus would lie to compel a continuance of the supply to the plaintiff. In Hildredth v. Montecito C. W. Co., 139 Cal. 29, 72 Pac. 395, it was held that, if the owners of several distinct water rights in a stream should form a corporation and give to it the duty of diverting and distributing the water to the respective persons entitled, such water was not thereby devoted to a public use. The court said that: "The right of an individual to a public use of water is in the nature of a public right possessed by reason of his status as a person of the class for whose benefit the water was appropriated or dedicated. All who enter the class may demand the use of the water, regardless of whether they have previously enjoyed it or not." In McFadden v. Los Angeles, 74 Cal. 571, 16 Pac. 397, a corporation had acquired water to be used on the land of its stockholders only, and at rates fixed by the corporation. It was not appropriated or offered for sale to others, or to the public generally, but the stockholders were very numerous and the corporation supplied water for some 12,000 acres of land. It was declared not to be a public use; the court saying: "We know of no reason why individuals cannot associate themselves together, take on a corporate form, and acquire water to be used on their own lands"—and that in such a case the supervisors had no power, under the act of 1885 (Stats. 1885, p. 95), to fix rates as for a public use, or at all. The proposition that such a use of the water is not a public use was again affirmed in McDermont v. Anaheim U. W. Co., 124 Cal. 114, 56 Pac. 779, and in Barton v. Riverside W. Co., 155 Cal. 518, 101 Pac. 790, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 331. In Leavitt v. Lassen I. Co., 157 Cal. 83, 106 Pac. 404, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 213, the water had been appropriated for sale, rental, and distribution, the system had been in operation several years, and it was conceded to be a public use. It was held that the purveyor of the public use cannot make binding contracts to deliver to a landowner under the system more than his proportionate share of the water, or give him a preferential right over others, nor make any unfair discrimination between the beneficiaries of the use.

Under the doctrines thus established, it is evident that the California Development Company has not dedicated to public use the water which it diverts from the Colorado river, and that it has not offered it for sale, rental, or distribution in such a manner as to constitute a public use thereof. In its notice of appropriation, it declared that it claimed the water for itself and others. It did not claim it for use by the public, nor designate the "others" to whom it was to be furnished. The notice stated that the water was claimed for the purpose of developing power, and for the irrigation of lands in the "New River Country," situated in what was then San Diego county, but it did not say that it was to be used upon all said lands, nor generally upon the lands in said country. Upon each of these essential elements of a public use, the most that can be said is that the notice is silent. There never was any declaration by that company that the water was to be devoted to public use, or that it was to be offered generally for sale in California, or to all landowners in the New River Country, or in any district or part thereof, or even to all landowners along the lines of its ditches or the ditches of its auxiliary companies. No such offer or declaration has ever been made, nor has it ever been the custom or practice of the company or of its auxiliary companies to sell water in that way. The method adopted by it for the disposition of the water, and its conduct in distributing the same, have been wholly inconsistent with the idea that the water was held out for general sale or distribution, and it has been consistent only with the theory that the intention was to retain control of the water to the extent, at least, of choosing for itself the persons and corporations to whom it should be sold or delivered, and the terms and conditions on which such sales or deliveries should be made. It has, in fact, retained such control, and it has not disposed of the water otherwise than according to this plan. For this purpose it laid out seven separate districts in the New River Country, with distinct boundaries. In each of these it organized a private water corporation. The purpose of each corporation, as expressed in its articles, was to procure water for the irrigation of such lands situated within the exterior limits of the district as should belong to its stockholders, and to no other persons. Each share of the stock was to be located upon certain designated lands—one share being allotted to each acre—and the water was to be apportioned ratably among the stockholders according to the number of shares owned. The stock was not free, but was to be sold at a fixed price. To these corporations, and to no other persons, the Development Company sold the water it diverted, receiving therefor certain shares of stock of said corporations, with the right to sell the same and have them located on lands in the district by the purchasers, and with an agreement by each auxiliary company to pay thereafter an annual charge of 50 cents per acre foot for the water delivered to it. There were other restrictions which it is not necessary to mention. The Development Company sold the stock of these auxiliary companies to the landowners within the respective districts, and the same has been located by the respective companies upon particular tracts of land therein. No water has ever been sold or distributed, or offered for sale or distribution, in any other way, or to any other persons, except small quantities furnished by special agreement to a power company and to the city of Imperial. No right in any other person to demand or receive water upon any terms or at all has ever been recognized, allowed, or conceded either by the Development Company or any of the auxiliary companies. It appears, therefore, that the Development Company has always, either directly or through the auxiliary companies, selected the persons to whom it would sell and distribute the water and fixed its own prices. A use thus restricted, limited, and controlled by the owner is in no proper sense, according to the foregoing authorities, a public use.

[5] We have hitherto considered the case upon the theory that all the other corporations mentioned, including the Mexican Company, are but subsidiary to and agents of the California Development Company for the carrying out of its plan for the distribution of its water. The effect is the same, however, if those companies should become, or be considered, independent companies—that is, merely purchasers of the Development Company's water. It is true that, since their organization, the districts, by reason of the sales of their corporation stock to the landowners, have become independent, so far as management is concerned, of the Development Company, although still bound by the contracts made between them. But if they are viewed as independent companies, the fact remains that the Development Company has not sold, or proposed to sell, or disposed of its water at all, except to those companies and to them only upon the terms and restrictions fixed by the respective contracts, and that those companies have not applied the water to public use, but have held the same exclusively for their respective shareholders upon terms fixed by the by-laws of the company. It appears that the Mexican Company is selling a part of the water to consumers in Mexico along its line. This does not change the result. It does not appear that this water is sold or offered to the public generally, or to all landowners along the line. Even if it were so, the fact that this company is carrying on a public use in Mexico would not affect the character of the service of the other companies doing business in California. It is very clear from all the proceedings taken that the Development Company not only did not intend to engage in a public service, but that it was well advised concerning such service, and carefully devised its plan and drew its contracts to avoid being placed in that position. The company has placed itself clearly within the principles stated in McFadden v. Los Angeles, supra, McDermont v. Anaheim Co. supra, and Barton v. Riverside, supra, under which the use which it makes of the water is not a public use.

[6] The plaintiff claims, however, that, notwithstanding these decisions and the well-established meaning of the phrase "public use," as shown by the other decisions cited, the meaning of the phrase is defined in section 1 of article 14 of the Constitution in terms which necessarily creates a public use whenever any water is sold or distributed, regardless of the number of persons to whom it is delivered, the manner or character of the disposition made of it, or of the transfer of the right thereto. The part of the section defining the phrase is as follows: "The use of all water now appropriated, or that may hereafter be appropriated for sale, rental, or distribution, is hereby declared to be a public use, and subject to the regulation and control of the state, in the manner to be prescribed by law." The remainder of the section provides for the fixing of rates for the use of water in municipalities. Section 2 declares that the right to collect rates for water supplied to a county, city, and county or town, or the inhabitants thereof, is a franchise to be exercised only under and as prescribed by law.

In Merrill v. Southside I. Co., supra, it was held that the word "appropriation," in section 1 aforesaid, does not refer to the act by which the water is acquired, as the taking from the stream, for example, but to the act or acts by which it is designated, set apart, and devoted to the purposes of sale, rental, or distribution. According to the theory of the plaintiff in this case, whenever the owner of a water supply determines to and does sell it for a price agreed on between himself and the purchasers, it immediately becomes subject to public use, and any other person to whom it can be conveniently distributed in the same manner would have the right to a proportionate share of the water on the same terms as the purchasers; and, if the supply is limited, the first purchasers must divide with all others who may come in and claim a share. Under that theory, where a person having a surplus of water parts with a portion of it by sales to others, he thereby appropriates such portion to purposes of sale and dedicates it to public use. This application of the section would destroy private rights in water and convert every sale thereof into a dedication to public use. We do not believe that the Constitution was intended to have such effect, or that it should be so construed. Article 14, taken as a whole, shows plainly that it was intended to regulate the use of water appropriated and dedicated generally for sale and distribution among an indefinite number of users. It could not have been intended to declare that a single sale of a part of his water by one having more than he needs would convert the use into a public use in which others could share. If a single sale could not do this, other sales of like character would not accomplish it. The section must be understood to apply to cases where one has appropriated water generally for sale, rental, or distribution, and not to cases where sales are made to particular persons at a fixed price by ordinary contracts of purchase and sale. To compel such a subdivision and distribution of water supplies as this construction would entail would destroy the value of all water rights. In this state the water supply is so small that large areas must go without irrigation entirely. Such water as there is must be applied, as far as it will go, in quantities sufficient to make the lands profitably productive. The principal benefit of irrigation comes from its use in growing vineyards and orchards. These require a large expenditure and a permanent water supply to make them profitable. If those engaging in such enterprises know that they must be ready always to divide their water supply with those in the vicinity who may subsequently choose to engage therein, such enterprises would be discouraged, the development, growth, and progress of the state would be much retarded, and its productive capacity greatly decreased.

This provision of the Constitution has been in force 33 years. It has never been understood that it had the effect here contended for. There have been many instances in which the owners of large tracts of land have acquired water, conducted the same to the land, and sold and conveyed the land in small tracts to actual settlers with a proportionate share of the water appurtenant to the land, coupled with an agreement to continue the water supply at a fixed annual rate. Such a disposition is essentially a matter of private contract, and it shows no intent to create a public use. It has also been a frequent practice to effect the same general purpose by forming a corporation to hold the water supply and to issue stock at a fixed price entitling the holder to a share of the water at a fixed annual rate, thus making the stockholders themselves the indirect owners of the water. Many decisions of this court in various ways concern corporations of this character. Among them are the following: Richey v. East R. W. Co., 141 Cal. 221, 74 Pac. 754; Estate of Thomas, 147 Cal. 236, 81 Pac. 539; Southside I. Co. v. Burson, 147 Cal. 406, 81 Pac. 1107; Mabb v. Stewart, 133 Cal. 556, 65 Pac. 1085; s. c., 147 Cal. 417, 81 Pac. 1073; Curtin v. Arroyo, etc., Co., 147 Cal. 338, 81 Pac. 982; Arroyo, etc., Co. v. Bequette, 149 Cal. 546, 87 Pac. 10; Fuller v. Azua I. Co., 138 Cal. 204, 71 Pac. 98; Spurgeon v. Santa Ana, etc., Co., 120 Cal. 71, 52 Pac. 140, 39 L. R. A. 701; Hewitt v. Irr. Dist., 124 Cal. 186, 56 Pac. 893; Goodell v. Verdugo, etc., Co., 138 Cal. 310, 71 Pac. 354; Barton v. Riverside W. Co., supra; Miller v. Imperial W. Co., 156 Cal. 27, 103 Pac. 227, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 372. In none of them is there any suggestion that such disposition or distribution constitutes a public use. This method became so prevalent and so satisfactory that in 1895 section 324 of the Civil Code was amended so as to provide that, in such cases, the by-laws might require the stock certificates to describe the land to which the stockholders' share of water was to be applied, and that such stock should thereupon become appurtenant to such land.

This long-continued understanding and application of this section of the Constitution must be deemed to be a practical construction of it, contrary to the theory of plaintiff. It was not intended to declare that specific sales of water, or transfers thereof to a particular person or persons chosen at the will of the holder of the supply, or the distribution thereof by private corporations among their stockholders for an agreed price and at annual rates fixed by the corporation itself, should be considered a dedication thereof to public use. It would follow, as a matter of course, that neither the Development Company, nor either of the water companies organized by it, possesses the power of eminent domain. It is not asserted that either of them has ever claimed or attempted to exercise that power. The Mexican Company has received from the Mexican government a grant of that power. But the fact that that company is carrying on a public service in Mexico and has devoted some water to public use there does not affect the water carried into the United States nor the character of the use thereof in California. Nor is the fact that it is all derived from the same source of any importance. A part of a stream, or a part of a single appropriation therefrom, may be devoted to public use and another part entirely to private use. Leavitt v. Lassen I. Co., supra.

[7] Something is said in the argument in regard to the fact that the Development Company brings more water into California through its canal than is used, and that there is always some waste water discharged from the distributing canals or somewhere along the route, and that this is more than enough to supply the plaintiff. There is generally some unavoidable waste in any large irrigating system. Water must be turned into canals leading to lands where it is to be used. The users may not be ready to commence taking it. As it cannot then be turned back and made to run up hill, it must be allowed to run down and go to waste, unless some independent user takes it below the waste gate. So much of the water as may be unavoidably wasted is to be deemed a part of that which is appropriated to the beneficial use and which the company has the right to take. It is necessary to the use, and is in the same category as that lost in transmission by evaporation and unavoidable seepage.

So far as any other waste of the water is concerned, it is water to which the defendants have acquired no right. Their right is measured by the quantity which is put to beneficial use, by which is meant the quantity necessary to be taken to supply that use at the place of use. The taking of more would be a taking without right. But the excess, if any, has not been applied by any of the defendants to any public use in California. The plaintiff, or any person, could appropriate such excess by an independent diversion from the Colorado river, and thereby prevent defendants from taking it. Until she does so, she has no more right to it than the defendants have. Doubtless she is not in a position to do this, but the defendant is not a common carrier of water, and it cannot be compelled to take it from the river for the benefit of plaintiff, carry it through Mexico for her, and deliver it to her in California. The case, in this aspect, is one of apparent hardship, but the courts cannot compel such service. As a matter of general policy, we doubt if it is important, for it is not likely that the waste will be allowed to continue, since the defendants could readily make a profitable use of it by increasing their capital stock and applying it to the additional lands to which it could thus be made available without any change in their method of distribution. In any event, the plaintiff has no rights in it which can be enforced by mandamus.

The judgment is reversed.

HART v. BUCKLEY. (S. F. 5,883.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 15, 1912.)

1. WORK AND LABOR (§ 27*)—ARCHITECT—QUANTUM MERUIT—EVIDENCE.

Where the complaint was in the form of a common count upon a quantum meruit and the evidence showed that defendant employed plaintiff to construct an entire building, and agreed to pay him a certain per cent. of the cost, and prematurely discharged him without cause, evidence of the reasonable value of the services performed was admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Work and Labor, Cent. Dig. §§ 50-54; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

2. WORK AND LABOR (§ 14*)—DISCHARGE OF EMPLOYÉ—QUANTUM MERUIT.

As a general rule, where an employé is, without cause, discharged by his employer during the term of his employment, he may regard the contract as rescinded and recover upon quantum meruit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Work and Labor, Cent. Dig. §§ 29-33; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 253*)—INSTRUCTIONS—IGNORING EVIDENCE—DEDUCTION FROM COMPENSATION.

Where, in an architect's action for the value of his services and for damages for the premature termination of his employment to plan and supervise the construction of buildings, defendant's counterclaim and evidence showed defective workmanship by the contractor, at variance with the contract and that plaintiff had issued certificates stating that the work was according to the contract, and that defendant had thereupon paid the full contract price, it was error to refuse to instruct that if the work was defective and not according to the specifications, and the plaintiff failed to properly inspect the work and carelessly certified that it was done properly, and if defendant was damaged thereby, such damages should be deducted from the value of plaintiff's services.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 613-623; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

4. CONTRACTS (§ 322*)—INSPECTION BY ARCHITECT—PRESUMPTION.

Where an architect certifies that defective work, not in conformity with the contract, conforms to the contract, the presumption is either that he did not inspect the work, or was negligent in so doing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1306, 1307, 1339, 1347, 1348, 1465, 1492, 1534-1542, 1768; Dec. Dig. § 322.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 253*)—INSTRUCTION—ISSUES—EVIDENCE.

The introduction of contradictory evidence upon an issue merely raises a question of fact to be submitted to the jury, and does not authorize the court to refuse an instruction thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 613-623; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—OTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

Error in refusing defendant's instruction that damages to him from the plaintiff's having, as an architect, certified that defective work was properly done should be deducted from the value of plaintiff's services was not cured by an instruction that, in determining the reasonable value of plaintiff's services, the jury could consider defendant's damages from negligent inspection of the work by plaintiff; such instruction not covering the point, since the amount of damages from plaintiff's negligence was not directly relevant to the value of his services.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Ralph W. Hart against C. F. Buckley. From an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, all of San Francisco, for appellant. De Laveaga & Magee and Frank L. Owen, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Defendant appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The complaint is in two counts, each upon a distinct claim for money due, aggregating $2,706.80. The first count alleges that between February 1, and August 30, 1907, plaintiff performed services, as architect, for the defendant, at his request, in making plans and specifications and in superintending the erection of a building on Market street, in San Francisco, which services were reasonably worth $1,506.80, for which sum defendant is indebted to him, and the same is wholly unpaid. The second count alleges that on February 2, 1907, defendant employed plaintiff, as an architect, to draw plans and specifications for a building to be erected by defendant on Larkin street, and to superintend the erection thereof, and agreed to pay plaintiff therefore a sum equal to 5 per centum on the cost of the building; that plaintiff began the performance of said services; and that while he was diligently engaged therein the defendant, without cause or excuse, terminated his employment and refused to allow him to continue therein, although he was ready and willing to do so, whereby he was damaged in the sum of $1,200, which remains wholly unpaid.

The answer to the first count denies that any service in superintending the building mentioned was performed, except in the excavation of the basement and the erection of the concrete work; and it denies that the service was of any value. It further alleges that the plaintiff was negligent in the performance of said services, and that because of said neglect of the plaintiff the defendant, on August 30, 1907, discharged him. The answer to the second count denies the making of the agreement alleged, the performance of any services thereunder, the wrongful discharge, and the damages. By the way of set-off to both counts, it is alleged that plaintiff was employed by defendant to draw the plans and specifications for the said building on Market street, and to superintend the erection thereof, and that he undertook to use due care and skill therein; that the work was carelessly done by the contractor "in an unworkmanlike manner and not in conformity with said specifications;" that the plaintiff negligently "failed to properly inspect or test said work," and negligently issued certificates, as architect, that said work was properly done, and that $4,279.59 was due the contractor therefor, and thereby caused the defendant to accept said work and pay said sum; and that the said work was not worth more than $1,500.

There was a jury trial, and a verdict was returned for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,500. The defendant claims that the court erred in certain rulings admitting evidence offered by the plaintiff and in refusing certain instructions requested by the defendant.

The Larkin street building was not erected. The plaintiff's services in relation to it consisted only of the preparation of the plans and specifications. The main controversy was over the services upon the Market street building. The plaintiff prepared the plans and specifications for the entire structure, let the contract for the basement excavation and for the concrete foundation walls, and superintended the erection of said walls. He was discharged by the defendant when the foundation was completed.

[1, 2] It was not error to allow testimony as to the reasonable value of the services performed by the plaintiff upon the Market street building. The complaint with respect to that building was in the form of a common count upon the quantum meruit for the value of the services performed. There was evidence that defendant had agreed to employ the plaintiff, as architect, thereon for the construction of the entire building, and to pay him as compensation 5 per cent. of the cost thereof; and that the premature discharge was without good cause. "It is the general rule that, where an employé is, without cause, discharged by his employer during the term of his employment, he may regard the contract as rescinded and sue upon a quantum meruit and recover the reasonable value of his services, as if the special contract of employment had never been made." Brown v. Crown G. M. Co., 150 Cal. 384, 89 Pac. 86, and cases cited. The evidence was therefore relevant to the issue, and there was no variance between this proof and the allegations.

[3] The defendant asked an instruction to the effect that if the jury should find that the contractor for the foundation carelessly did the work in an unworkmanlike manner, and not in conformity with the specifications, and that plaintiff carelessly failed to properly inspect or test the work, and carelessly certified that the work was done properly and as specified, and that this negligence of the plaintiff caused damage to defendant, the damage should be deducted from the value of the plaintiff's services.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

This instruction was refused. There was no demurrer to the counterclaim on the ground of uncertainty, and evidence was given in support of it without objection. It appears to have been treated as sufficient in that respect. The record recites that evidence was given tending to show that the walls of the foundation were not, nor were any of them, constructed by the contractor in a workmanlike manner, nor in accordance with the contract; that they were insufficient to sustain any four-story building; that pieces of the concrete in them could easily be broken off, and would easily crumble in one's hands; and that the value of the work so done by the contractor did not exceed $1,500. It also appeared that plaintiff had issued certificates stating that the work was completed according to the contract, and that the defendant had thereon paid the contractor the full contract price therefor.

[4] The instruction should have been given. It contains a correct statement of the law, and it was applicable to the case as presented by the pleadings and the evidence above recited. It is true that in the recital referred to there is no express statement that there was any evidence tending to show that the plaintiff failed to inspect or test the work, or that he was negligent in his inspection or test. But it was his duty to inspect and test it and use due care and skill thereon. If no part of it was done in conformity with the contract, and he certified that it was all done in accordance therewith, the jury might reasonably infer, either that he did not inspect it at all, or that he was negligent in so doing.

[5] The recital, of course, implies that the evidence tending to show the facts stated was substantial in character and sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that said facts existed. Consequently we cannot consider the error as a trivial one. The introduction of contradictory evidence would merely raise a question of fact to be submitted to the jury. It would not authorize the court to refuse the instruction.

[6] The plaintiff claims that the refusal of this instruction was rendered harmless by an instruction given, directing the jury that "the mere fact that some of the work was negligently done does not defeat the plaintiff's right to compensation. He is still entitled to compensation for the reasonable value of his services; and in determining such reasonable value of his services you may take into consideration the actual amount of damages, if any, which defendant has proved that he has suffered by reason of such negligence." This instruction does not properly cover the point. The amount of damage caused by plaintiff's negligence is not directly relevant to the value of the services performed by him. It might have some bearing on the character of the services, and in that way relate to the question of value. The jury may have understood the instruction to mean that they might consider the damage in this light, not for the purpose of deducting it from the value of the services proved, but to show that the services were poor in character, and that because of that fact they might reduce the estimate of the value of the plaintiff's services. This is not the same process as that of finding the true value of the services and the true amount of damage and deducting one from the other, which was the proposition contained in the instruction refused. The defendant was entitled to have it given as asked.

The order is reversed.

PURCELL v. RICHARDSON. (Sac. 1,983.)
(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 12, 1912.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 93*)—PLEADINGS—CROSS-COMPLAINT.

Code Civ. Proc. § 852, provides that the pleadings available to a defendant in a justice court shall consist of a demurrer or answer to the complaint. Section 855 provides that the answer may contain a denial of any or all the material facts stated in the complaint, and also a statement of any other facts constituting a defense or counterclaim, on which an action might be brought by the defendant against plaintiff or his assignor in a justice court. Held, that section 442, authorizing a defendant in the superior court to file a cross-complaint, has no application to suits before a justice; and hence, no such pleading having been authorized, defendant was not entitled to judgment in a justice court on a pleading claimed to constitute a cross-complaint, because of plaintiff's failure to answer the same.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. § 326; Dec. Dig. § 93.*]

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 92*)—COUNTERCLAIM—DENIAL.

Where, in a suit before a justice of the peace, defendant's pleading, that by plaintiff's negligence in performing the services sued for defendant had suffered damages in the sum of $272, constituted at most a defense and counterclaim, it was deemed controverted by virtue of Code Civ. Proc. § 880, for the purpose of establishing an issue for trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 324, 325; Dec. Dig. § 92.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; James F. Lodge, Judge.

Petition by Marcus Purcell to obtain a writ of mandate to compel R. M. Richardson, a justice of the peace, to issue an execution on a judgment theretofore entered in favor of petitioner and against A. A. Atkinson. From an order denying the petition on the merits, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Marcus Purcell, of Dorris, in pro. per. R. S. Taylor and Taylor & Tebbe, all of Yreka, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. Appellant filed a petition in the superior court of Siskiyou county for a writ of mandate to compel the defendant, as justice of the peace of Lake township, in said county, to issue an execution from his court on a judgment entered therein in favor of appellant and against one A. A. Atkinson. An alternative writ was issued, which respondent answered, and on the hearing an order was made by the superior court denying the petition. From this order an appeal was taken to the District Court of Appeal for the Third District, which affirmed the judgment of the superior court. The matter is here on an order of this court granting a further hearing.

It appears from the record that on July 13, 1910, Atkinson brought suit in said justice's court against the petitioner, Purcell, to recover the sum of $9, the value of services alleged to have been rendered the latter by Atkinson as a physician. On July 18, 1910, Purcell filed a pleading in that action, which he denominated an "answer, demurrer, and counterclaim," wherein he demurred to the complaint, denied the alleged indebtedness, and "by way of counterclaim" alleged negligence on the part of Atkinson in prescribing treatment for him as his physician, and claimed that he had suffered damage thereby in the sum of $272. On July 28, 1910, Purcell applied to said justice for the entry of a judgment in his favor under that portion of his pleading filed as a "counterclaim," upon the theory that, while so denominated, it was in legal effect a "cross-complaint," which, the plaintiff, Atkinson, having failed to answer, entitled him to a judgment by default against said Atkinson on the cross-complaint. The justice accorded with this claim on the part of Purcell, and entered a judgment by default against Atkinson for the full amount of damages claimed—$272 and costs. Subsequently, on August 8, 1910, the justice, on motion of Atkinson, and after notice to Purcell, set the aforesaid judgment aside, and fixed September 15, 1910, as the date for the trial of the cause. On September 3, 1910, Purcell filed a written demand upon the said justice for the issuance of an execution on the said judgment so entered against Atkinson. The justice refused to issue it, and this proceeding in mandate was thereupon commenced by Purcell to compel its issuance.

The position of appellant on this appeal is that, while his pleading was denominated a "counterclaim," still his denomination of it as such is of no consequence; that it is the facts set up in the pleading, and not what the pleader may call it, which determines its character, and that, so tested, the facts set up therein constitute it a "cross-complaint," and not a "counterclaim"; that the failure to answer said cross-complaint in due time entitled appellant to the judgment in his favor against Atkinson which was entered by the justice; and that the attempt subsequently by the justice of the peace under section 859 of the Code of Civil Procedure to set aside this judgment was beyond his jurisdiction, and the order doing so was void, because no affidavit of merits had been filed as by the section it is provided must be done. In this view, and insisting that the judgment by default is a valid judgment, it is claimed that it was the duty of the justice to have issued the execution thereon when demanded, and that it was error on the part of the superior court to have denied appellant a writ of mandate to compel the justice to do so.

[1] It is unnecessary to determine anything respecting the order of the justice setting aside the judgment. We deem this matter immaterial, because we are satisfied that the judgment by default itself, entered by the justice, and upon which appellant relies, was clearly void, as beyond the jurisdiction of the justice to enter it. It was entered by him on the theory that the facts set forth in that portion of the answer filed by appellant and which he denominated a counterclaim constituted it in legal effect a cross-complaint. But this theory of the justice was erroneous, for the clear reason that there is no such pleading as a cross-complaint provided for among the pleadings available to a defendant in a justice's court. The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relative to pleadings in those courts prescribe specifically of what they shall consist, and those available to a defendant consist of a right to demur or answer the complaint. Section 852, Code Civ. Proc. As to the answer, it is provided that it "may contain a denial of any or all of the material facts stated in the complaint * * * and also a statement * * * of any other facts constituting a defense or counterclaim upon which an action might be brought by the defendant against the plaintiff or his assignor in the justice's court." Section 855. It is quite apparent from a simple reading of this last section that no such pleading as a cross-complaint in a justice's court is permitted. Appellant has apparently sought to invoke in aid of the right to set up a cross-complaint in a justice's court the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure which apply to actions in the superior court, and where the filing of a cross-complaint is specifically provided for. Code Civ. Proc. § 442. But that section has no application to pleadings in the justices' courts. While it is true that by section 925 of the Code of Civil Procedure those provisions of that Code which in their nature are applicable to proceedings in justices' courts are made applicable thereto, this section cannot be extended to authorize other pleadings to be filed there-in than those specifically enumerated as being permitted in justices' courts. The Code, having particularly designated of what the pleadings in such court shall consist and what they shall contain, is conclusive on the subject.

[2] In this view the pleading filed by appellant in the justice's court amounted simply to an answer, the only pleading which he was allowed to file, and in which, under section 855, supra, he was permitted in addition to a denial of the allegations of the complaint to set up any facts constituting a defense or counterclaim. As a matter of pleading in the justice's court the facts set forth in the answer of appellant could only be treated as a counterclaim, and as such the plaintiff in that action was not called upon to file any answer respecting it. It constituted an allegation in the answer of new matter, which was deemed controverted. Under section 880 of the Code of Civil Procedure applicable to justices' courts, when the answer of the appellant was filed, an issue of fact arose as to all allegations in the complaint controverted by the answer and "upon any new matter in the answer." Upon such issue being made, it was the duty of the justice to fix a day for the trial of the action and to give notice thereof to the parties. Proceeding, however, on the theory that the matter set forth by appellant in his answer in the justice's court constituted a cross-complaint, the justice entered judgment by default against Atkinson without any notice of the trial being given. As pointed out, this construction of the pleading on the part of the justice was erroneous. The pleading was simply an answer setting up new matter by way of counterclaim under section 855, supra, which, when filed, raised an issue of fact, to be tried under notice given to the respective parties to the action. The justice was without jurisdiction to enter any judgment at all in the case before him until after such notice of the trial had been given, and as, of course, no notice was given, the judgment entered by him against Atkinson in favor of the appellant was void. Jones v. Justice's Court, 97 Cal. 523, 32 Pac. 575; Elder v. Justice's Court, 136 Cal. 364, 69 Pac. 1022.

In this view, as the judgment entered by the justice was void, the refusal of the superior court to grant a writ of mandate in favor of petitioner to compel the issuance of an execution thereon was correct, and the order denying the writ is affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by J. R. Fraser against G. M. Sheldon and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

H. W. Hutton, of San Francisco, for appellants. George Clark and T. T. C. Gregory, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The complaint was filed on April 22, 1909, and the action is to recover possession of the value of certain personal property which plaintiff alleges in his complaint that he "is the owner of, and entitled to the immediate and exclusive possession of," namely, "one twin-screw boat called the Skimmer, formerly named the Fruitvale, including the pair of new Clifton engines upon said boat" and other described articles constituting her equipment; also two old barges and their equipment which, it is alleged, "lay on September 16, 1907, on the mud flat just below Benicia, Cal., at the old Delaney's Ways and Shipyards"; also "one barge known as R. T. & C. Co. No. 1, including the engine centrifugal pump used in or connected therewith," said scow being on September 16, 1907, "anchored at Benicia." It is also alleged that at the time of filing the complaint all said property was in the possession of defendants, and wrongfully withheld from plaintiff, and that "the foregoing description is as accurate as plaintiff can give." A general demurrer to the complaint was overruled, as was also a demurrer that several causes of action had been improperly united.

Defendants answered by general denials of the averments of the complaint, and also claiming ownership and right of possession in themselves then and at all times mentioned in the complaint. The cause was tried by the court, and it made findings: (1) That the defendant company was a duly organized corporation; (2) that at the commencement of the action plaintiff "was and he ever since has been the owner of and entitled to the immediate and exclusive possession of all the personal property mentioned in the complaint"; (3) that at the commencement of the action all said property "was in the possession of defendants" without right and was being wrongfully detained; (4) that prior to the trial of the action the possession of all said property, except the barge described as R. T. & C. Co. and its equipment had been delivered to plaintiff by the sheriff and plaintiff retained such possession "under proceedings duly and regularly had for that purpose in this cause"; (5) that the delivery of possession of the said barge last above particularly referred to and its equipment had not been made, and was being withheld from plaintiff, and that the value of said property so withheld was $500. As conclusion of law, the court found that "plaintiff is entitled to judgment against defendants for the possession of the personal property described in the complaint, and, if delivery of the personal property mentioned in finding 5 cannot be had, then, in addition, plaintiff shall have judgment against defendants for the value thereof amounting to $500 in lieu of said property, and costs of suit." Judgment was entered accordingly.

[1] Defendants appeal "from the judgment * * * entered * * * on the 25th day of February, 1910, and also from the order * * * denying defendants' motion for a nonsuit" on bill of exceptions. The order denying defendants' motion for a nonsuit is not an appealable order. Such an order, however, can be reviewed on an appeal from the judgment.

[2] While the notice of appeal from the judgment was not filed within 60 days from the date of entry of the judgment, it was filed within 6 months after said date, and the appeal was one perfected under the provisions of section 941b of the Code of Civil Procedure. It was duly taken within the time prescribed in said section, if no notice of the entry of said judgment had been served on appellants more than 60 days prior to such filing of the notice of appeal, the section providing substantially that such notice of appeal must be filed within 60 days after notice of entry of judgment has been served on the attorneys of record of the adverse party, and must, in any event, be filed not later than six months after such entry. If no notice of entry of judgment is so served, the party may file his notice of appeal at any time within six months from the date of such entry. The record here does not show that any notice of entry of judgment was served on appellants, and it must be assumed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that no such notice was served. See Foss v. Johnstone, 158 Cal. 119, 110 Pac. 294.

[3] Upon an appeal duly perfected pursuant to the provision of section 941b of the Code of Civil Procedure, any question may be reviewed which could be reviewed upon an appeal taken, pursuant to the provisions of section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure, within 60 days of the rendition of the judgment. Section 941c, Code Civ. Proc. The claim that the evidence is not such as to sustain the findings of the trial court must therefore be considered.

[4, 5] Looking at the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff, as we must do in view of the findings of the court, the material facts appear to be as follows: In the early part of the year 1907, two sisters, Mattie and Cherrie Bailey, were the owners of the personal property in question, and it was in charge of defendant Sheldon, their brother-in-law. It does not appear that any of the property was ever in the possession of plaintiff, and, as we understand the record, it was at all times prior to the organization of defendant corporation in the possession of Sheldon, as agent of the Bailey sisters. The boat originally named "Fruitvale" and now named "Skimmer" needed new engines and certain repairs, and plaintiff desired water transportation between Benicia, where he was engaged in business, and San Francisco. It was arranged between plaintiff and Sheldon, acting for the Baileys, that plaintiff should furnish the engine and other necessary things for the boat, and that a corporation to be known as the Rivers Transportation & Construction Company should be formed with a capital stock of 75,000 shares, of which plaintiff should have 25,000 shares for the money advanced, while the Baileys were to have the remaining 50,000 shares. An instrument in the form of a bill of sale of the personal property was executed and delivered by the Baileys to plaintiff. It does not appear that plaintiff was ever given possession of any of the property. There is no conflict in the evidence on the proposition that the bill of sale was given and received solely as "security." Plaintiff furnished the engines and expended money for other purposes, including $400 for certain lands, the deeds to which were taken in his name, the aggregate amount of his bill being practically $4,000. For some reason the original plan for the incorporation of a company was not carried out, but late in the year, namely, on November 26, 1907, the attempted organization of defendant corporation was had. This was capitalized at $50,000, and there were 10,000 shares. On September 16, 1907, a written agreement was entered into between plaintiff and Sheldon, whereby plaintiff agreed to convey to Sheldon the land purchased by him and all personal property here involved for $4,000, $10 of which was paid at once and $3,990 was to be paid one year thereafter, with interest. This amount Sheldon agreed to pay at the time specified. It was provided therein: "The said party of the second part (Sheldon) is to have immediate possession, use, and control of all the above-described property, and is to care for the same and pay all state, town, and county taxes or liens of whatsoever nature which may become due on the property above described. In the event of a failure to comply with the terms hereof by the said party of the second part, the said party of the first part may be released from all obligations in law or equity to convey said property, and the said party of the second part shall forfeit all right thereto, and all money theretofore paid thereon shall be considered as rent for the use of said property and for liquidated damages for the nonfulfillment hereof by the said party of the second part. And the said party of the first part, on receiving such payment, at the time and in the manner above mentioned, agrees to execute and deliver to the said party of the second part, or to his assigns, a good and sufficient deed and bill of sale conveying all of the above described property free and clear of all incumbrance made, done, or suffered by the said party of the first part."

The agreement was signed by plaintiff and Sheldon. There is absolutely no evidence to the effect that the Baileys ever had any knowledge of the provisions of this agreement, and there was nothing to indicate any authorization on their part to Sheldon to enter into any such agreement. When the agreement was signed, plaintiff receipted as paid his bill against Miss Cherrie Bailey for the money due him and gave it so receipted to Sheldon. In the early part of March, 1908, as we understand the record, he returned to Sheldon the bill of sale he had received from the Baileys, apparently surrendering all claim thereunder. Defendant Carquinez Transportation Company was in possession of the personal property at all times after its attempted incorporation November 26, 1907, operating the steamer from at least March, 1908, Sheldon being the general manager of said company. In the early part of 1908 it was orally agreed between plaintiff and those interested in defendant corporation that plaintiff would take one-third of the residue of the stock thereof after deducting 600 shares sold to one Needham for $1,000 (one-third of which amount was paid to and accepted by plaintiff) in full satisfaction of his claim. According to the plaintiff's testimony he "agreed that after that 600 shares that was issued to Needham that was to be deducted, and I was to have one-third of the balance." Stock was subsequently tendered him, but the claim was made that he was not being given the amount he was entitled to, and he refused to accept it, and declared the agreement at an end. The certificate for such stock is still being held for him. No part of the amount due under the agreement of sale was ever paid in money, and this action was brought after the expiration of the time prescribed therein for such payment. The boat was enrolled at the custom house in San Francisco on March 16, 1908, plaintiff then certifying that he had built it in 1908 for the Carquinez Transportation Company. Plaintiff testified that it was to be enrolled in his name, but could not be as he was not a citizen of the United States.

The difference between the parties as to the stock was due to the fact that 1,000 shares of the 10,000 were never issued, but were proposed to be retained as treasury stock. This left the total issue 9,000 shares, of which Needham was given 600 for $1,000 cash, in which plaintiff participated by receiving his one-third. This left 8,400 shares to be divided among plaintiff and the two Baileys; each being entitled to 2,800 shares. This was the amount the tendered certificate represented. The plaintiff claimed that under his agreement he was entitled to one-third of all the capital stock provided for in the articles of incorporation, after deducting Needham's 600 shares; in other words, that he should also have one-third of the 1,000 shares treasury stock, which, of course, would entitle the two Baileys to the remaining two-thirds thereof, for it is clear that all the arrangements contemplated that plaintiff and each Bailey should be equal owners, each owning one-third.

It is respondent's theory that the bill of sale from the Baileys to him was absolute, and not a mortgage; that although he had some negotiations with Sheldon and the Carquinez Transportation Company with a view to the acceptance of the stock for his interest in the property, and had even surrendered his bill of sale in contemplation of the completion of the transaction, nevertheless he had never become bound to take such stock; and that the contract between him and Sheldon had been accepted and recognized by the corporation which, through its president Frame, and its manager, Sheldon, had urged him to procure the enrollment of the "Skimmer" as his own, but, finding that impossible because he was an alien, had induced him to swear that he had built the vessel for the company. Respondent also insists that even assuming the bill of sale to be a mortgage, and assuming the transfer of their title by the Baileys to the corporation after the execution of that instrument, the superior court was justified in referring that the corporation accepted the benefits of the promoter's contract and consented to what is termed "a common method of private foreclosure—a sale by the mortgagee with the mortgagor's consent." And, finally, respondent submits that his refusal to take security which was a mortgage in form, together with the absence of any evidence that the Baileys intended the bill of sale as a mortgage, justified the conclusion that title to the property had unqualifiedly passed to him to be properly asserted by him after the breach of the contract of sale to Sheldon. The first contention is without merit, because the respondent testified that he took the bill of sale as security. We quote some of the questions and his answers thereto as indicating how unqualified was his statement upon this point: "Q. Isn't it a fact that this paper which you say was written was given to you simply as a guaranty for this $4,000? Is that right? It was given to you as security for this money which you paid for the machinery, and as security that it be carried out? A. Yes, sir. The Court: Q. It was given to you as security, that is what he asked you; do you understand it? A. Yes, sir. It was given to me as security. Q. For what? A. For that money that I advanced. Q. The four thousand dollars? A. Yes, sir." Further answering a question propounded by his own counsel, he said: "Mr. Sheldon offered to give me a mortgage also as security. He offered to give me a mortgage and I would not accept a mortgage; and then he gave me that bill of sale of the property, and then issued an agreement whereby I was to sell it back to him, when he paid me the full amount." Clearly such a contract, even though the plaintiff refused to take an agreement which was a mortgage in form, could not operate as a transfer of title to the property. Secs. 2888 and 2889, Civ. Code.

Plaintiff's position that he was not bound to accept stock cannot be maintained, because the agreement by which he was to take such stock in lieu of his claim against the boats was partially executed by his acceptance of some of the money received from Needham. At the very least he should have returned this money to the corporation before seeking to foreclose his lien, if he still had one. The same reasoning applies to respondent's other contentions. Even if the conduct of Sheldon and Frame amounted to a recognition by the corporation of the contract between Sheldon and himself, the subsequent acts of plaintiff in surrendering the bill of sale, the evidence of his lien, and in accepting the money received from the sale of stock, showed that he had abandoned all idea of enforcing that contract. So, too, any right of "private foreclosure" was cut off by the partially consummated exchange of all of plaintiff's interest for stock. And, finally, although there is no evidence that the Baileys executed the bill of sale as a mortgage, there is the plaintiff's own statement that he took it as security for the money he had advanced. This emphatically negatives his claim of unqualified title. We conclude, therefore, that the evidence was not sufficient to support the finding that the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the exclusive immediate possession of the property involved.

This conclusion makes it unnecessary to indulge in more than a brief reference to other alleged errors. One of these related to the admission of parol evidence of the contents of the bill of sale, which was not in the custody of either of the defendants, but was, according to the affirmation of their counsel, in the possession of the Misses Bailey. Of course, we need not review this matter at length, because in case of the necessity of procuring the document in the trial of this or any other action a new demand will become necessary and counsel will naturally take all proper means of producing the exhibit. Testimony given by plaintiff with reference to the value of one of the barges was also attacked as insufficient to justify the finding that it was worth $500. In any view of the matter this testimony was far from satisfactory, and, if it becomes necessary again to establish the value of the missing barge, doubtless testimony more ample will be adduced.

No other alleged errors require comment. The judgment is reversed.

An option to purchase mines for a fixed price payable in installments, which makes time of the essence, and declares that, on the failure to make any of the specified payments, the rights of the holders of the option shall terminate and all payments made shall be forfeited, is terminated for inexcusable failure to pay at maturity payments specified, unless the vendor waives nonpayment, and this is true, though the purchaser is in possession under the option, and notice is not essential to terminate the purchaser's rights on nonpayment at maturity of the sums called for.

Where a purchaser in an option contract obtained possession on the payment of an installment, but failed to make the payments called for in the contract, which made time of the essence, and the vendor on the default in the payments regained possession, the fact that the vendor's title was incumbered by a mortgage and by a lien for taxes was of no avail to the purchaser suing to recover possession, and to obtain an accounting of the proceeds obtained by the vendor while wrongfully in possession, and for damages caused the purchaser by the alleged unlawful withholding, since the purchaser could not remain in possession, though the title of the vendor was defective without complying with the conditions of the contract as to payment.

Shaw, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; George L. Jones, Judge.

Action by the Champion Gold Mining Company against the Champion Mines. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion of Shaw, J., in Department 1, hereinafter referred to:

"The plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of the defendant, and from an order denying a new trial.

"The action was to recover possession of mining property and damages for the detention thereof. A jury was impaneled to try the case. After the evidence was closed, the court, at the request of the defendant, directed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant. This was done, and thereupon judgment was given for the defendant. It is claimed that this ruling is contrary to the evidence.

"The plaintiff was in possession of the mining property under a contract of sale thereof executed by defendant as vendor to Phillips, Fitz Gerald, and Stewart as purchasers and by them assigned to the plaintiff. The contract provided that the purchasers should take possession upon the payment of the first installment of the price, and that upon the failure to make any payment, or other breach of the agreement, the vendor should have the right immediately to re-enter and take possession of the property. Among other things, it provided that the purchasers should have the right to operate the mines, and that they should pay 10 per cent. upon the gross amount of bullion obtained at clean-ups, which payments were to be applied upon the installments due upon the price. The first payment upon the contract was made by the plaintiff, and it took possession and began the operation of the mines. On April 26, 1910, the plaintiff was in possession and had been operating the mines for something over two months, and had extracted at clean-ups bullion of the value of about $20,000, upon which there was due to the defendant $2,000, none of which had been paid. On that day the defendant, claiming that this payment was past due and that the plaintiff also owed the sum of $1,600 for the taxes of 1909 on the property, demanded of the plaintiff the payment of said sums of money, or the immediate possession of said property in case the plaintiff failed to make payment. The plaintiff refused to pay the tax demanded, but offered to pay the full amount due as royalty upon the bullion extracted. This the defendant refused to accept without payment of the additional $1,600. No other demand was made, and in pursuance of the demand stated the defendant on April 26, 1910, without the consent of plaintiff, took possession of the property and held it thereafter until this suit was begun. This action was begun on July 8, 1910. The plaintiff was not then in default upon any subsequent installment of the price.

"It is the established rule in this state that where a vendee in an executory contract of sale of land is put in possession of the premises, and refuses to pay the installments of the price when due, the vendor has the right to retake possession. The vendee cannot retain possession, and at the same time refuse to pay the price when due. The offer of the plaintiff on April 20, 1910, to pay the amount due as percentage of the bullion extracted, was a sufficient tender, provided the plaintiff was not required by the contract to pay the tax demanded. The decision of the case, therefore, depends upon the question whether or not the contract required such payment by the purchasers.

"The contract was executed on December 18, 1909. The first clause provided that the Champion Mines, a corporation, granted to Phillips, Fitz Gerald, and Stewart the option to purchase the mines at the price of $347,000, to be paid in installments, the first, $9,500, to be paid on or before January 1, 1910, the second, $12,500, on or before July 1, 1910, the others in different amounts on or before the 1st day of January and July of each year thereafter, the last being $137,000, on or before January 1, 1913. It was further provided that, after the first payment, the purchasers should be entitled to 10 days additional time in which to make each of the other payments, but that otherwise time should be of the essence of the contract. Possession was to be delivered to the purchasers upon the making of the first payment of $9,500. Simultaneously therewith a deed was to be placed in escrow conveying to the purchasers 'a clear, unincumbered, marketable title' to the property. The fourth clause contains the provision upon which it is claimed the purchasers were required to pay the taxes. It is as follows: 'Phillips, Fitz Ger-aid, and Stewart agree to keep the water out of said mines to at least the present depth in each shaft and to keep all machinery and pumps in order and to keep all present openings in said mines in as good condition as they are now, and to pay all taxes on said properties, and to keep said properties free and clear from all liens and incumbrances arising or growing out of their possession of said mines or operation thereof; said, the Champion Mines is to at all times have the right of access to said mines and all said properties and examination thereof, and the right at all times to be present at all clean-ups, and the right to at all times have access to all records and books of said Phillips, Fitz Gerald and Stewart used in the operation of said mines.'

"The $1,600 in question consisted of the second installment of the taxes on the properties assessed for the year 1909, which became a lien thereon upon the first Monday of March, 1909. It was payable when the contract was executed, but did not become delinquent until the fourth Monday of April, 1910. The second clause of the contract, as we have stated, required the Champion Mines at the time of the payment of the first installment to execute and put in escrow a deed conveying to the buyers a clear and unincumbered title to the property. By the terms of the contract the buyers had the right to pay the whole price at any time, and thereupon demand delivery of this deed. From these circumstances, if not from the express language used, the implication is imperative that the title was to be free of all incumbrances at the time of the execution of this deed and delivery of the possession of the mines. In order to bring about this condition, the vendors must necessarily pay all taxes which then constituted a lien upon the property, including the second installment of the tax of 1909 which it demanded of the plaintiff. That this would be the effect of the contract cannot be gainsaid, unless it is qualified by the provisions of the fourth clause. This clause clearly shows by its terms that it was intended as a declaration of the respective duties and rights of the parties to accrue after the delivery of the possession. If, as the previous clause contemplated, the vendor had paid all tax liens against the property before executing the deed, the statement in the fourth clause that the buyers were 'to pay all taxes on said properties' could cover only the taxes subsequently assessed. The obligation imposed upon the vendors, independent of all express covenants, would be to convey a title free of all incumbrances existing upon the property at the time the contract was made. The express covenant in the second clause implies the same obligation. If the phrase quoted from the fourth clause has the effect contemplated for by the defendant, it would be repugnant to the other provisions of the contract. Every other provision of the fourth clause refers to the duties of the purchasers and rights of the vendors after the delivery of possession. In view of all these circumstances, we think this phrase in the fourth clause should be construed in harmony with the other provisions thereof, and that its effect is that the buyers were required to pay all taxes assessed during the time of their possession under the contract and up to the time of final payment, but not the taxes which had accrued at the time they took possession. If the vendors had delivered a deed conveying a clear title and the vendees thereafter paid all taxes accruing, the result would be that the deed, when finally delivered, would convey a title clear of all incumbrances, and the object of the contract in that regard would be carried out. The conclusion is that the defendant was not entitled to demand payment of these taxes and consequently, that the tender of the royalties alone was good, and the plaintiff was not in default at the time defendant took possession. Upon these facts the plaintiff, not being in default on succeeding installments, was entitled to recover possession, and upon the evidence adduced the instruction should not have been given.

"Some minor points made by the respondent remain to be noticed. It does not appear that any consideration was paid at the time the contract was executed. It therefore constituted a mere option until the making of the first payment. But upon the making of that payment it became an executory agreement for the sale of the property, binding upon both parties and revocable by neither except for good cause and in the manner required by the Code and the principles of equity. Smith v. Bangham, 156 Cal. 363, 104 Pac. 689, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 522, and cases there cited. It was not a lease, and the relation it created was not that of landlord and tenant, but that of vendor and purchaser. Willis v. Wozencraft, 22 Cal. 616. We cannot see any ground for the claim that the provision for ten days' grace did not apply to the 10 per cent. of the gross to be paid at clean-ups. By its terms this clause applied to 'any of the above payments' except the first. This would embrace the clean-up payments mentioned in the third clause, as well as the installments specified in the first clause. In stating the facts as aforesaid we are compelled by the rules of law applicable in such cases to give the evidence the effect most favorable to the plaintiff. All statements therein favorable to the plaintiff must be taken as true, and, if other statements conflict therewith, they are to be rejected. It was for the jury, and not for the court, to determine which of two conflicting statements it would accept, and, as it might have taken those favorable to the plaintiff, we must, upon a review of the instruction to return a verdict for the defendant, presume that the jury would have resolved all questions arising upon the evidence in favor of the plaintiff.

"The judgment and order are reversed."

J. M. Walling, of Nevada City, Cal., for appellant. Metson, Drew & Mackenzie, of San Francisco, and Fred Searls, of Nevada City, Cal. (Horatio Alling, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The action was one to recover possession of certain mining property and damages for the detention thereof. A jury was impaneled to try the case. After the evidence on the part of the plaintiff was closed, the trial court, on the motion of the defendant, directed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant. This was done, and thereupon judgment was given for the defendant. The action of the trial court in thus instructing the jury is alleged to have been erroneous; it being claimed that plaintiff made a sufficient case to support a verdict in its favor.

Considering the evidence in the light most favorable to plaintiff, the facts shown are substantially as follows:

Plaintiff is the assignee of all the rights of W. S. Phillips, George E. Fitz Gerald, and W. T. Stewart under a contract executed by them and defendant corporation on December 18, 1909. By this contract defendant corporation granted to said Phillips, Fitz Gerald, and Stewart "the option to purchase all of its mines and mining properties situated in the county of Nevada, state of California, at the total price of $347,000, upon the following terms and conditions, to wit:" The purchase price was to be paid in installments, $9,500 on or before January 1, 1910, $12,500 on or before July 1, 1910, and other installments on January 1st and July 1st of each year until the final installment of $137,000, which was to be paid on or before January 1, 1913. Possession of the property was to be delivered to Phillips and his associates upon the making of said first payment of $9,500, and a deed was then to be placed in escrow by defendant conveying to them a clear, unincumbered, and marketable title to said mining property. Phillips and his associates were to have the right to operate the mines, they agreeing to expend a sum not less than $100,000 in the development and operation of the mines during the first year, and to pay defendant 10 per cent. of the gross amount of bullion obtained at clean-ups, which amounts were to be applied upon the installments upon the purchase price. They were "to pay all taxes on said properties," and to keep the same free from all liens and incumbrances arising or growing out of their possession of said mines or the operation thereof. It was provided that "any of the above payments, other than the said first payment of $9,500, may be paid within ten days after the above specified dates, otherwise in all particulars, time is of the essence of this option." It was further provided as follows: "Upon the failure to make any of the payments above specified in accordance with the terms hereof, or upon the breach of any of the agreements herein provided, all payments theretofore made shall be forfeited and said corporation shall have the right to immediately re-enter and take possession of said properties and receive return of said deed placed in escrow."

The first payment ($9,500) having been made, plaintiff went into possession of said property on or about January 12, 1910, and proceeded with the development and operation of said mines, and continued in such possession and operation until April 26, 1910, when defendant took possession, claiming that all rights of plaintiff under said contract had terminated. It was to recover such possession that this action was brought by plaintiff on July 8, 1910, two days prior to the day on which it would be in default for a failure to make the second payment, one of $12,500, due July 1, 1910. At the time of the first payment defendant placed in escrow, in the Bank of California, a deed of said property subject to the terms and conditions of said agreement. The property was at that time, according to an undenied allegation of the complaint, incumbered by a mortgage placed thereon by defendant "in a sum of money in excess of" $30,000, and according to the complaint and the proof, by a lien for unpaid state and county taxes for the year 1909, amounting to $1,477.64, being the second installment of the taxes for said year, payable when the contract was executed, but not delinquent until the fourth Monday of April, 1910.

On April 19, 1910, plaintiff had been operating the mines for over two months, and had extracted at clean-ups bullion of the value of about $20,000, but had not paid any portion of the 10 per cent. thereof to defendant. It cannot successfully be disputed that plaintiff's evidence shows that on April 1, 1910, at least $658.69 was due defendant under the provision requiring the payment of 10 per cent. of the gross amount extracted at clean-ups. Indeed, according to Fitz Gerald's written acknowledgment on April 2, 1910, the amount due April 1st was $975.58.

Fitz Gerald was at all times the general manager of plaintiff in this state, and one Thomas A. Kelly was superintendent of the mine and in possession thereof for the plaintiff. On March 17, 1910, defendant sent a formal letter to Fitz Gerald, as such manager, signed by its president and secretary and attested with its corporate seal, notifying him that plaintiff was delinquent in the matter of paying to defendant 10 per cent. of the clean-ups as made. The letter contained the following statements, among others not material here: "On February 7, 1910, we wrote you in reference to this matter. You replied on February 9, 1910, promising to attend to this matter. You have now been in possession of the property for about two months. We know that you have had very many clean-ups, both of tributers and of company rock, amounting to several thousand dollars. According to our contract, we are entitled to a full statement and ten per cent. of the gross clean-ups. As you have not replied to our letter of February 7th, and have given us no statement and no payments, we hereby wish to inform you that we shall hold you strictly accountable to the letter and spirit of the contract. Kindly send us at once a statement of the total amount you have taken from the mines since they have been in your possession, and send us a check for ten per cent. of that amount. We do not desire in any way to hinder you in your operations, but we must insist, and do insist, upon a strict compliance with the contract; if said statement, accompanied by a check for ten per cent. of the amount taken out, is not received by us, we shall immediately take steps to take possession of the property, as provided in the contract. Kindly understand we do not wish to hamper you in any way, but we do insist that you must keep up to the letter and spirit of the contract. We hereby demand, as is our right, at the close of each and every month, you send us a verified statement of the total product for the month, and send us a check for ten per cent. of said amount." On April 2d Fitz Gerald sent by mail to defendant's president at San Francisco a draft on one Phillips in Chicago for $975.58, with a statement showing such amount to be the amount due on clean-ups. On April 4, 1910, defendant by letter acknowledged receipt of the statement and draft, and said it would forward the same for collection, trusting it would be honored when presented. It was duly presented to Phillips for payment but payment was refused by him. On April 13, 1910, the secretary wrote Fitz Gerald as such manager that he had been directed to inform him that the draft had not been accepted, and "is being returned unpaid, and also to ask him to state by return mail what he proposed to do in these matters, and what might be expected in the future." On April 14, 1910, Fitz Gerald replied to this letter, expressing great surprise that the draft should not have been honored, and promising that he would pay all amounts due in a short time. A telegram was produced on the trial showing that he had been expressly authorized by Phillips to draw on him for "five hundred" only. On April 18, 1910, he again wrote defendant's president inclosing on account of royalties his personal check for $500 on the Citizens' Bank of Nevada City. This check was never paid, being marked "No funds"; Fitz Gerald stating that he had funds in the bank when he drew the check, but that he withdrew the same before its presentation for the purpose of preventing payment.

On April 19, 1910, at a regular meeting of the board of directors, the following resolution was adopted, viz.: "Whereas, W. S. Phillips, George E. Fitz Gerald and W. T. Stewart, have broken that certain contract, made and entered into between the said parties and the Champion Mines, on the 18th day of December, 1909: Now, therefore, it is hereby resolved that said agreement be, and it is hereby, terminated and canceled, and B. W. Shoecraft, secretary of this corporation, be and he is hereby authorized and directed for and on behalf of this corporation, and as its act and deed, to immediately take possession of all the properties of this corporation covered by said contract." On April 20 or 21, 1910, defendant's president and secretary went to the mine, and the secretary there delivered to Mr. Kelly, the superintendent in charge, a duly certified copy of this resolution. According to Kelly's testimony, he told them they would have to see Fitz Gerald about it, and left the paper on the desk or handed it to the secretary. Fitz Gerald came into the office while they were talking. According to Fitz Gerald's testimony the subsequent proceedings were as follows: The president of defendant told him he had come to take possession of the mine, because among other reasons the royalties had not been paid, and he, Fitz Gerald, at once offered to pay all royalties due. The president retired for a consultation with the secretary, and on his return said: "I don't want to be too hard on you Fitz. If you will pay me $1,500 to $2,000 in royalties and $1,600 in taxes, I will let you off." The tax thus referred to was that we have spoken of, being the second installment for the year 1909. Fitz Gerald declined to pay anything on account of the taxes, but tendered the royalties demanded, which the president refused to accept. At the close of the interview either the president or secretary gave to Fitz Gerald the certified copy of the resolution we have referred to. According to Kelly, the president said he had not then received the $500 check sent April 18th, but that, if it had been forwarded, Fitz Gerald would be likely to receive it back by return mail. The officers of defendant left, and on April 26th they returned and took possession of the property without plaintiff's consent, and defendant has ever since been operating the mine.

Plaintiff was entitled, of course, to continue in the possession and operation of the mining property as long as it fully performed the conditions imposed upon it by the agreement between its assignors and defendant.

The claim that there was a default in the matter of the payment of taxes was discussed in the opinion heretofore filed in this case by department one of this court, and it was concluded that plaintiff was not required to pay the tax in question, and that therefore there was no default in that matter. We adhere to the conclusion then reached in this regard, but, as will appear from what follows, this conclusion is immaterial in the disposition of this appeal, and it will not be necessary to here set forth the reasons for that conclusion.

[1] It was assumed in the department opinion, we are satisfied correctly, that one of the conditions imposed on plaintiff in the matter of remaining in possession and operating the mining property was the payment to defendant of 10 per cent. of the gross amount of each clean-up, within 10 days of the making of the clean-up; the provision for 10 days' grace as to payment being held applicable to "clean-up payments." The provisions of the agreement in this behalf may be held to have been waived by defendant to the extent stated in its formal letter of March 17, 1910, which stated that "we hereby demand, as is our right, at the close of each and every month, you send us a verified statement of the total product for the month, and send us a check for ten per cent. of said amount." But there was nothing to indicate a waiver to any greater extent. Indeed, the letter was explicit to the effect that there must be a strict compliance with the contract, and that unless the amount already due was at once paid, and payments were made promptly at the close of each month on account of the clean-ups during such month, defendant would consider the contract at an end, and would take possession of the property. Nothing was ever said or done by defendant to indicate that it would not maintain this position or that it would excuse any further delay in the matter of payments. And up to April 26, 1910, when a certified copy of the resolution of defendant's board of directors declaring the agreement terminated was served upon plaintiff's superintendent, neither any payment nor tender of payment on account of such clean-ups had been made, unless the check for $500 dated April 18, 1910, which does not appear to have been accepted, and which was not, in fact, received by defendant until after April 19th, be considered a tender of the amount specified therein, an amount not sufficient to pay the percentage on clean-ups admittedly due not later than April 11, 1910.

[2] The relative rights of the respective parties under the contract before us are well established by the decisions in this state. The plaintiff, as successor of Phillips, Fitz Gerald and Stewart, held, upon certain specified conditions, the option to purchase the mining property for $347,000, with the right to possess such property and operate the mines thereon after the first payment on account of the purchase price had been made during the life of the option, and having made such first payment was in the possession of and operating the property. Among the conditions were some requiring the making of certain payments within ten days of certain specified dates, and one requiring the payment of 10 per cent. of the gross amount of any clean-up (to be applied on the purchase price) within 10 days of the making of the clean-up. Although it is held that, where mines or mining properties are the subject of contract, time is of the essence, independent of any express stipulation inserted in the instrument (see Skookum Oil Co. v. Thomas, 123 Pac. 363), it was expressly provided in regard to the payments that "time is of the essence of this option," and it was substantially provided that "upon the failure to make any payments above specified, or upon the breach of any agreements herein provided," all rights of the holders of the option shall terminate, and all payments theretofore made by them shall be forfeited. Such is the clear effect of the provisions contained in the agreement. Under such circumstances, it is well settled that an inexcusable failure on the part of the holder of the option to make a payment when the same should be paid according to the agreement terminates his rights under the option, and makes it impossible for him to enforce the same, in the absence of waiver on the part of the other party. See Oursler v. Thacher, 152 Cal. 739, 93 Pac. 1007; Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17. It can make no difference that the vendee is in possession under the option. His right to the possession is only such as the contract gives, and, if the contract substantially provides that the right of possession shall cease upon the failure to perform a specified condition, the failure to perform such condition entitles the owner to the immediate possession of the property. See Hegler v. Eddy, 53 Cal. 597. The evidence in the case at bar was not such as would sufficiently support a conclusion that the failure of plaintiff to make this payment on or before April 11th was in any way excusable, or that defendant prior to the adoption of its resolution of April 19, 1910, had in any way waived the making of such payment at the prescribed time, or waived any of its rights in consequence of such nonpayment. Plaintiff's rights under the contract were therefore on April 19, 1910, at an end, unless defendant elected to waive plaintiff's failure to comply with the terms thereof. Instead of doing anything of this kind, it by its board of directors adopted a formal resolution declaring the agreement to be terminated, and directing its secretary to immediately take possession of the property. We do not understand that any notice was essential to terminate plaintiff's rights under the contract. See Commercial Bank v. Welton, 148 Cal. 601, 608, 84 Pac. 171. Its default, unexcused and not waived, ipso facto terminated those rights and practically the only effect of the resolution was to express the determination of defendant corporation not to waive such default, and that the contract was, by reason of the default, terminated, and to authorize the designated officer for and in its name to retake possession. Unless defendant elected to recede from this determination, nothing remained for plaintiff to do but to surrender possession on demand therefor.

[3] A tender of all the amounts due made subsequent to such default could not avail it (Skookum Oil Co. v. Thomas, 123 Pac. 363), even if such tender was made prior to the actual service of demand for possession. Even if we assume that what was said by defendant's president to Fitz Gerald at the time of serving the notice on him could be taken as binding on the corporation, clearly nothing was said by him except to indicate certain terms and conditions upon which the corporation would waive the default. The right of defendant to possession being already fixed and established, it had the right to prescribe any terms it saw fit as the condition upon which it would waive and forego that right, and reinstate plaintiff under the contract. It is entirely immaterial that the payment demanded as such a condition was larger than the amount that would be due under the terms of the contract and included charges that plaintiff would not have been required to pay thereunder. Plaintiff did not see fit to accept the offer made by defendant's president, and that officer did not attempt to waive any of the rights of his corporation in the matter.

[4] From what we have said, it is clear that if the case had been allowed to go to the jury, and the jury had found in favor of plaintiff, the court would have been compelled, on motion to that effect, to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial on the ground of insufficiency of evidence to sustain the verdict. The trial court did not therefore err in directing a verdict for defendant.

In view of what we have said the other points made in the briefs of counsel for plaintiff require little discussion.

[5] The denials and affirmative allegations contained in the amended answer made sufficient issues as to the alleged performance by plaintiff of the condition entitling it to remain in possession of the property and sufficiently showed the determination of defendant to consider the contract at an end by reason of the default alleged, and a taking of possession in pursuance of that determination. The failure to deny the allegations of the complaint as to the manner in which defendant obtained possession of the property from plaintiff's employes was of no importance. This is not an action of forcible entry, but one brought long after the time within which such an action could be brought, and the only effect of the allegations of the complaint in this regard was to show that plaintiff did not consent to the taking of possession by defendant. The demurrer to the answer was properly overruled.

[6] Even if it be assumed, as claimed by plaintiff, that the pleadings are in such condition as to prevent defendant from asserting in this action that it is entitled to retain the $9,500 paid to it by plaintiff, a matter we by no means concede, nevertheless plaintiff was not entitled to recover such money in this action, which is brought by plaintiff solely to recover possession of the mining property, and to obtain an accounting as to the proceeds obtained by defendant while wrongfully in possession, and to recover damages caused plaintiff by the alleged unlawful withholding. No other relief was suggested in the complaint by either allegation or prayer, and the right of plaintiff to recover the money was not in issue.

[7] The fact that the title of defendant was incumbered by a mortgage for $30,000, and by the lien for the taxes already referred to is of no avail to plaintiff in this action, involving, as it does, only the question of the right to the possession and operation of the mining property. Even if the title of defendant was in any way defective or incumbered, nevertheless plaintiff was not entitled to remain in possession without complying with the conditions as to payment. The principle involved is discussed in the opinion in Garvey v. La Shells, 151 Cal. 526, 531, 91 Pac. 498, and the cases therein cited.

There is no other matter requiring notice.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: SLOSS, J.; BEATTY, C. J.; HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; MELVIN, J.

SHAW, J. I dissent. The opinion of the majority is based on the proposition that the plaintiff's right to pay the amount due for "clean-up" royalties and thereby to continue in possession of the mine had terminated before the offer of April 20th to pay said royalties was made. I think that the evidence shows a waiver of the forfeiture growing out of the failure to pay said royalties, and that in holding that it does not the majority opinion fails to consider the true rules of law applicable to such cases. The summary of Prof. Pomeroy in his work on Contracts has been accepted for many years as a correct statement of the law on this subject. It is as follows: "The one who is entitled to insist upon a punctual performance by the other or else that the agreement be ended may waive his right and the benefit of any objection he might raise to performance after the prescribed time, either expressly or by conduct; and his conduct will operate as a waiver when it is consistent only with a purpose on his part to regard the contract as still subsisting, and not ended by the other's default." Pom. on Cont. § 394. In section 395 he states the well-established rule that, when the right to a forfeiture is once waived, time is no longer essential as to the payments included in the waiver, that it cannot again be made essential as to them, except by a notice again fixing the time of the payment, and that the time so fixed must be reasonable under all the circumstances. In section 397 he proceeds to say that the time thus newly fixed by notice may again be waived by conduct, and that, "if the time is once allowed to pass and the parties still go on negotiating for the completion of the purchase, this conduct amounts to a waiver, and time is then no longer essential."

With these rules in view the evidence sufficiently establishes the waiver. As the trial was before a jury and the court directed a verdict for the defendant, the rule prevails that every fact in issue favorable to the plaintiff, of which there was substantial evidence, must be considered as proven and evidence inconsistent therewith must be disregarded. Forfeitures are not favored either in law or equity. In considering the effect of the evidence due weight must be given to both of these propositions.

While it must be conceded that the language used in the agreement clearly includes the clean-up payments among those as to which time is essential, it is at least doubtful from the whole case and from the nature of these payments whether the parties at the time really understood that it had that effect. The main object of the provision that time was essential and that a forfeiture would result from a failure to pay promptly obviously was to secure prompt payment of the installments of the price agreed upon. The clean-up payments were, in fact, advance payments on those installments, and the contract so declares. It must be admitted that where payments as to which time is made essential are for very small amounts, becoming due at irregular intervals, and both the amounts and dates of payment are determined by subsequent events brought to pass in part by the acts of third persons and are not fixed in advance by the contract itself, it would be much more than probable that prompt payment, or forfeiture for nonpayment, would be waived than it would be with regard to regular installments of the price to be paid at times fixed by the agreement. Consequently slighter evidence would suffice to establish such waiver.

The contract fixed no definite time for making clean-up payments. The amounts thereof depended on the amount of precious metal obtained. Both amount and date became known for the first time when the clean-up was made. At the time of the sale and until the supposed forfeiture, the operations at the mine were largely carried on by "tributers," persons taking out ore independently for a percentage of its value. Clean-ups were made for their benefit as the ore was mined. By the language of the contract payment of the royalty upon each of these clean-ups was to be made within 10 days thereafter, and a failure by the plaintiff as to any one of them would ipso facto forfeit all of the plaintiff's rights. According to the testimony of Fitz Gerald, the plaintiff had paid $12,500 on the price, and it had a very substantial interest at stake. Four or five "tributers" clean-ups were made between February 1 and March 4, 1910, but the respective dates and amounts were not proven. The following are the dates of other tributers clean-ups shown and the amounts are the royalties due thereon: March 4th, $43.02; March 7th, $91.22; March 11th, $26.42; March 14th (three clean-ups), $51.17; March 17th, $5.47; March 23d, $86.23; March 20th, $2.08; March 30th, $11.97; April 1st, $3.94; April 7th, $28.72; April 8th (2 clean-ups), $66.67. I mention these to show the irregular dates and the varying amounts of royalty payments. The plaintiff's manager testified that the nature of the business was such that it was a very difficult matter to ascertain at any time the royalties that were then due. None of the above amounts were paid, and, under the contract, at the expiration of 10 days from each clean-up a forfeiture of all of plaintiff's interest would have occurred if there had not been a waiver by the defendant. Obviously there was such waiver as to all clean-up royalties that became due on or before March 17th, the date of the letter of the defendant to plaintiff mentioned in the majority opinion. This letter was received by Fitz Gerald, the manager of the plaintiff, on March 18th. The statement therein demanded of him was not made until April 2d. He then rendered the statement accompanied by a draft to cover the royalties shown to be due thereby, although, in fact, the 10 days' grace had not expired as to all of them. The evidence shows that this draft was drawn in good faith and with the belief that it would be paid. It was not paid on presentation, and thereupon, under date of April 13th, defendant wrote to Fitz Gerald, informing him that the draft had not been accepted, and that the "board of directors desire you to state by return mail what you propose to do in these matters and what may be expected in the future." Fitz Gerald received this letter on April 14th. He immediately replied, saying that he would begin payments on the royalties on April 20th, by applying thereon all the proceeds of tributers' rock, and that he expected to pay it all up in four weeks, as the ore was becoming more valuable. On April 18th Fitz Gerald sent to defendant his personal check for $500 to apply on the amount due from plaintiff on royalties. On April 19th, before the last check was received, the defendant's board of directors made and adopted a resolution declaring the agreement ended, and authorizing its secretary to immediately take possession of the mine. No officer or agent of the plaintiff was present, and it had no knowledge of this action at the time. It is obvious that the resolution could not of itself affect the plaintiff's rights. A copy of it was served on the plaintiff on April 20th, and immediate possession of the mine was then demanded. Plaintiff's manager thereupon offered to pay all royalties then due which defendant refused to accept, unless plaintiff also paid $1,600 in taxes which it was not bound to pay. Plaintiff was allowed to continue in the possession and operation of the mine until April 26th. No previous notice had been given that this demand for possession would be made on April 20th, or at any other time.

The defendant's letter of March 17th clearly shows a waiver of the forfeiture for all the defaults which had then occurred. It even went further and proposed a distinct alteration in the terms of the contract, namely, that thereafter, instead of paying the royalty on each clean-up as it became due, the plaintiff should render an account at the close of each month and pay the royalties monthly according to such account. This alteration was accepted and acted upon by the plaintiff, and this conduct must be accepted as a waiver of the strict terms of the contract with respect to royalties on clean-ups. In the letter of April 13th, after the default in the payment of the draft, the defendant did not insist upon the right of forfeiture which, technically, had accrued to it by reason of the dishonor of the draft and the failure to pay the amount due for the March royalties. On the contrary, it desired plaintiff to say what it proposed to do in the matter and to state what it could expect in the future. Defendant evidently then regarded the contract as still subsisting, and not as having terminated with the default, and the language of the letter plainly shows a desire to negotiate for its future performance. This, under the doctrine above stated, was a clear waiver of the previous defaults. If this case had been submitted to a jury and a verdict for the plaintiff rendered, this waiver would have been supported by the evidence, and should be regarded here as an established fact. Under the change in the terms made by the letter of March 17th, no additional payment would become due until May 1st. In the meantime none would become due so as to cause a forfeiture, unless by some notice or demand the defendant informed the plaintiff that after a reasonable time it would no longer stand by the proposition of March 17th.

The result is that the time, having been once allowed to pass for the March payment, became no longer essential as to that payment, and it could not again be made essential, except by notice fixing a new date upon which such payment would be demanded or a forfeiture declared. Payment was not wholly waived, but payment at the exact time was waived, when the defendant, in effect, asked plaintiff to negotiate for a future date. Plaintiff having replied by a promise of payment at an indefinite time, it was necessary for the defendant, if it still intended to insist upon a forfeiture on account of such payment, to fix a new date and give the plaintiff notice thereof a reasonable time in advance. It could not work a forfeiture by demanding immediate possession on account of a prior default which it had waived in this manner.

The offer of the plaintiff to pay the amount due, being made at the time of the unannounced demand for possession, was in time. It should have been accepted by the defendant. The demand of the defendant for more than was due was, in effect, a rejection of the offer. The defendant had no right to take possession, and in doing so it committed a wrongful act. There is nothing in the evidence to show that its possession became rightful before this suit was begun. It follows that the court erred in directing the jury to return a verdict for the defendant.

For these reasons I think the judgment should be reversed.

PEOPLE v. METROPOLITAN SURETY CO. et al. (S. F. 5,553.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 16, 1912.)

1. JURY (§ 28*)—WAIVER OF JURY TRIAL—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The right to a jury trial, guaranteed by Const. art. 1, § 7, declaring the inviolability of the right of jury trial, and providing for a waiver thereof by consent of the parties, signified in the manner prescribed by law, may only be waived in the manner prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 631, providing that a jury trial may be waived in specified modes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 176-196; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

2. JURY (§ 25*)—WAIVER OF JURY TRIAL—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 631, prescribing the mode in which trial by jury may be waived, the court may make reasonable rules regulating the right of a party to claim a jury trial; but a rule of court that on the calling of the trial calendar in all cases answered "Ready" the parties shall demand a jury, or a jury shall be deemed waived, is not authorized.

3. JURY (§ 25*)—WAIVER OF JURY TRIAL—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The facts in the record, reciting that both parties were present by counsel when the case was called, and that defendant moved for a continuance, which was granted, do not show that the case was announced as "ready" by both parties, within a rule of court declaring that on the call of the calendar in all cases answered "Ready" the parties shall demand a jury, or a jury will be deemed waived, since the right to a jury trial will not be held waived by implication.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 154-173; Dec. Dig. § 25.*]

4. JURY (§ 28*)—WAIVER OF JURY TRIAL—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Code Civ. Proc. § 631, authorizing waiver of jury trial by consent, in open court, entered in the minutes, and a rule of court also providing for such entry, a mere failure to demand a jury, not entered in the minutes, is not a waiver.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 176-196; Dec. Dig. § 28.*]

5. COUNTIES (§ 98*)—LIABILITIES ON OFFICIAL BONDS—EXTENT OF LIABILITY.

The rule that a surety on the official bond of a county treasurer is liable only for any default of the treasurer during his term, in the absence of express stipulation to the effect that he shall be liable for defaults occurring before the execution of the bond, is not altered by the fact that the officer has been the incumbent of the office for a preceding term.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 141-143, 147; Dec. Dig. § 98.*]

6. COUNTIES (§ 101*)—LIABILITIES ON OFFICIAL BONDS—EXTENT OF LIABILITY.

The mere fact of the discovery of a shortage in the office of a county treasurer, who has held the office for successive terms, raises no presumption as to the time when it occurred; and in an action on the bond for the last term the jury must determine from all the facts, without reference to any presumption, whether the defalcation occurred, in full or in part, during such term—the burden of proof on the issue being on plaintiff.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; W. S. Wells, Judge.

Action by the People of the State of California against the Metropolitan Surety Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Edward C. Harrison, of San Francisco, for appellants. H. V. Alvarado, Dist. Atty., of Richmond, for the People.

SLOSS, J. The defendants appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and against the corporation defendant for $18,732.85, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The above-mentioned sum was the amount of an alleged shortage in the accounts of George A. Wiley, as treasurer of Contra Costa county, and the action was brought to recover this sum from the corporation defendant as surety on Wiley's official bond.

Wiley was elected county treasurer in November, 1902, to serve for a term beginning January 5, 1903, and ending on January 7, 1907. He duly qualified, giving a bond in the penal sum of $80,000, executed by United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company as surety. In November, 1906, he was elected for a second term, and in the same month he executed a bond, with the defendant, the Metropolitan Surety Company, as surety, in the penal sum of $100,000, to secure the faithful performance of his duties during the succeeding term. He continued to occupy the office of treasurer of the county until the 4th day of February, 1907, when he committed suicide. A count of the money remaining in the treasurer's vault disclosed a shortage as above stated, and this action followed.

When the cause came on for trial, the defendant demanded that a jury be impaneled, and that the trial be had before a jury. The action was unquestionably one in which either party was entitled to a jury trial, unless the right had been waived. The court, however, declined to comply with the demand, and proceeded to try the cause without a jury, taking the position that the following circumstances, disclosed by the record, constituted a waiver by defendant of its privilege of a jury trial.

A rule of the superior court of Contra Costa county, in force at the time of the proceeding under review, read as follows: "Upon the calling of the trial calendar, in all cases answered 'Ready' the parties shall announce whether a jury is required, and shall at such time demand a jury, if desired, and if no jury is demanded at such calling it shall be deemed to be waived and a waiver of a jury will thereupon be entered on the minutes by the clerk." The case had originally appeared on the trial calendar of the said court on June 8, 1908, to be set for trial. On that day the cause was set for trial for July 16, 1908; the clerk's minute entry showing that the setting had been so ordered on motion of plaintiff's attorney.

On July 16, 1908, the cause was regularly called for trial; counsel for both parties being present. Counsel for defendants urged a continuance for two weeks, filing an affidavit in support of his motion. The motion was granted, and the cause was peremptorily set for trial on the 30th day of July, 1908. The clerk made an entry in the minutes, stating merely that the cause came regularly before the court, counsel for the respective parties appearing; that defendant, by its counsel, filed an affidavit and made a motion for a continuance; and that the court ordered that "this cause be and the same is hereby continued to and peremptorily set for Thursday, July 30, 1908, at 10 o'clock a. m." No jury was in attendance upon the court on July 30th, and no demand for a trial by jury had theretofore been made.

[1] We think the court erred in holding that the facts above recited constituted a waiver of defendant's right to a jury trial. The Constitution (article 1, § 7), after declaring the inviolability of the right of trial by jury, provides that such trial may be waived in civil cases "by the consent of the parties, signified in such manner as may be prescribed by law." The Legislature is thus given the sole power of declaring what shall constitute a waiver of trial by jury (Exline v. Smith, 5 Cal. 112), and has exercised its power by the enactment of section 631 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section provides that trial by jury may be waived " * * * in actions arising on contract * * * in manner following: 1. By failing to appear at the trial. 2. By written consent, in person or by attorney, filed with the clerk. 3. By oral consent, in open court, entered in the minutes." This court has repeatedly held that a jury may be waived only in one of the three modes prescribed by this section. Swasey v. Adair, 88 Cal. 179, 25 Pac. 1119; Farwell v. Murray, 104 Cal. 464, 38 Pac. 199; Platt v. Havens, 119 Cal. 244, 51 Pac. 342. The record here shows no waiver by any of these modes.

[2] The respondent relies, however, upon the rule of court, providing that a failure to demand a jury when the cause is answered "Ready," upon the calling of the trial calendar, shall be deemed a waiver. It has been held, notwithstanding the provisions of section 631, that the court may make reasonable rules regulating the right of a party to claim a jury trial, and that such trial may properly be refused when there has been a failure to comply with such rules. But the cases so holding go no further than to uphold a rule requiring the deposit of jury fees as a condition to the insistence upon the right. Adams v. Crawford, 116 Cal. 495, 48 Pac. 488; Naphtaly v. Rovegno, 130 Cal. 639, 63 Pac. 66, 621. And this conclusion may be readily supported in view of the fact that, in the absence of such deposit, the payment of the fees which must be incurred by reason of the demand could not be adequately secured. The ruling has been otherwise, however, with regard to a rule like the one here involved. In Biggs v. Lloyd, 70 Cal. 447, 11 Pac. 831, a judgment was reversed on account of the refusal of a jury trial, notwithstanding the failure of the appellant to comply with a rule of court requiring that, "if a jury is desired, it shall be demanded on the law day when the case is set for trial." It follows that the rule involved in this case did not authorize the refusal of a jury trial.

[3] But, even if the rule be regarded as valid and effective, the respondent's position is open to the further objection that the facts necessary to constitute a waiver under the terms of the rule were not shown. The requirement is that a jury be demanded upon the calling of the trial calendar in all cases answered "Ready." It does not appear that the case at bar was answered "Ready" by either party. All that is stated in the bill of exceptions is that both parties were present by counsel, and that the defendant moved for a continuance, which was granted. The record is entirely consistent with the view that the plaintiff's counsel was not ready to go to trial. The right to a jury trial should not be held waived by implication. Platt v. Havens, supra.

[4] Furthermore, there was no entry in the minutes of a waiver of jury trial, as required by the rule. This might not be very important, if a similar requirement were not also contained in subdivision 3 of section 631. But that subdivision makes such entry necessary in the case of an oral waiver. The purpose doubtless was to furnish record evidence of a consent which would otherwise rest merely on parol proof, and the rule was apparently framed with the intent of following the Code section. The entry was therefore a necessary part of a waiver under the rule, as under the Code; and the mere failure to demand a jury, not entered in the minutes, did not constitute the waiver contemplated.

These views will necessitate the reversal of the judgment. As an aid to the conduct of another trial, some of the other questions presented may be briefly noticed.

[5] The appellant had, by the provisions of the bond which it executed, made itself liable only for any default of which Wiley might be guilty during his second term, beginning in January, 1907. It could not, in the absence of express stipulation to that effect, be held for defaults or delinquencies of the principal occurring before the execution of the bond sued upon. Mechem, Pub. Off. § 285. This rule is not altered by the fact that the principal has been the incumbent of the office for a preceding term. U. S. v. Boyd, 15 Pet. (U. S.) 187, 10 L. Ed. 706; Bissell v. Saxton, 66 N. Y. 60; Detroit v. Weber, 29 Mich. 24; McPhillips v. McGrath, 117 Ala. 549, 23 South. 721. The plaintiff, recognizing the force of this consideration, alleged in its complaint the misappropriation and conversion by Wiley of the sum sued for "during his last term of office." This allegation the defendant denied, and the plaintiff was accordingly bound to prove it, in order to be entitled to a judgment. The finding of the court was in favor of the plaintiff on this issue. We shall not stop to detail the evidence, or to consider at any length the appellant's contention that the finding in question is not supported. Since there must be a new trial for reasons already indicated, it will suffice to say that we think the proof offered was such as to have justified a jury (or the court, in the absence of a jury) in finding either way on the question whether the defalcation had occurred during the first or the second term. The case was one in which the time of the defalcation was to be determined by inference from the various facts and circumstances shown.

[6] The respondent contends that, in a suit to recover the amount of a shortage discovered in the accounts of an officer who has filled several successive terms, the presumption is that the misappropriation took place during the last term. There are authorities declaring this to be the rule; the theory underlying it being that the presumption of the performance of official duty authorizes the conclusion that the officer, at the end of one term, has duly accounted to himself as his own successor. Bruce v. U. S., 17 How. (U. S.) 437, 15 L. Ed. 129; U. S. v. Earhart, 4 Sawy. 245, Fed. Cas. No. 15,018; Kelly v. State, 25 Ohio St. 567. A similar declaration was made by this court in Heppe v. Johnson, 73 Cal. 265, 14 Pac. 833, but the ruling was not, apparently, necessary to the decision.

On the other hand, various well-considered cases deny the existence of any such presumption, or confine its applicability to cases where there is no evidence at all tending to show that the misappropriation was during the earlier term. Williams v. Harrison, 19 Ala. 277; McPhillips v. McGrath, 117 Ala. 549, 23 Pac. 721; Trustee v. Smith, 88 Ill. 181; Myers v. U. S., 1 McLean, 493, Fed. Cas. No. 9,996; Williams v. State, 89 Ind. 570; Freeholders v. Wilson, 16 N. J. Law, 110. We think the sound view is that from the mere fact of a defalcation, without more, no presumption as to the time when it occurred arises. The presumption that an officer has performed his official duty is, at best, "weak and inconclusive" (Williams v. Harrison, supra), and whatever force it possesses would seem to vanish upon proof that the particular duty in question (i. e., that of safe-keeping and accounting for the public funds) had in fact been violated. In Anaheim U. W. Co. v. Parker, 101 Cal. 483, 487, 35 Pac. 1048, 1049, this language was used: "Where a second bond is executed, the sureties are not liable for money converted by the officer prior to its execution, and the plaintiffs are bound to show a conversion after the execution of the bond sued upon." The decision, in effect, overrules the dictum in Heppe v. Johnson, above referred to.

The case should therefore be submitted to the jury without any instruction that there is a presumption that a defalcation (if one be shown) occurred at one time rather than another. The jury is to be permitted to find, from all the facts in evidence, whether such defalcation occurred, in whole or in part, during Wiley's second term; the burden of proof, on this issue, being on the plaintiff.

There was no error in permitting the plaintiff to prove the receipt by Wiley, as treasurer, of sums not shown in the auditor's books, such as moneys belonging to the estates of deceased persons. The allegations of the complaint, fairly construed, are sufficiently broad to cover these items.

The foregoing, we think, covers all the material matters that are likely to arise upon another trial.

The judgment and the order appealed from are reversed.

MILLER v. PILLSBURY et al. (S. F. 6,205.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 20, 1912.)

1. STATES (§ 112*)—STATE AS EMPLOYER—INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ.

The Employers' Liability Act (St. 1911, p. 797) § 4, providing that the state and its subdivisions, public corporations, and every person, firm, and private corporation employing labor who shall have elected to become subject to the provisions of such act shall be subject thereto, does not commit the state to an election of compensation as the method of satisfying claims for injuries to its employés, where it has not made such an election; and an injured employé was not entitled to a mandate requiring the industrial accident board to hear his application concerning compensation for his injuries.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 111; Dec. Dig. § 112.*]

2. STATES (§ 112*)—STATE AS EMPLOYER—INJURY TO EMPLOYÉ.

The state is not bound to compensate an individual employé for injuries sustained while in its service, and no right of recovery in favor of such employé exists by inference or legal construction, or otherwise than by statute.

3. STATES (§ 191*)—RIGHT TO BE SUED—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES.

In Bank. Petition by Fred Miller against A. J. Pillsbury and others for a writ of mandamus. Demurrer to petition sustained, and writ discharged.

Aaron L. Sapiro, of San Francisco, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Fred Miller, petitioner herein, applied to the respondents, constituting the industrial accident board of the state of California, to hear his application concerning compensation for injuries received by said Miller in the course of his duties as an employé of the state. The board refused to hear said application upon the ground that the state is not an employer bound by the provisions of the "Employers' Liability Act." Stats. 1911, p. 796. An alternative writ of mandate was issued in which the board was required to hear Miller's application, or to show cause why such action should not be had. Respondents appeared and demurred to the petition for a writ of mandamus. The questions raised being purely those which arise out of the interpretation of the "Employer's Liability Act," the controversy may be determined by our decision upon this demurrer.

[1] By the terms of the statute its application is, generally speaking, made to depend upon the election of both parties to the contract of employment. In the absence of such mutual agreement, the injured employé must have recourse to his claim for damages, or, in other words, must proceed to enforce the employer's "liability" as distinguished from the "compensation" which might be due under the act. By section 3 of the act the general responsibility of employers under the theory of compensation is fixed as follows: "Liability for the compensation hereinafter provided for, in lieu of any other liability whatsoever, shall, * * * exist against an employer for any personal injury accidentally sustained by his employés, * * * where the following conditions of compensation concur: (1) Where * * * both the employer and employé are subject to the provisions of this act. * * * (2) Where * * * the employé is performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment. * * * (3) Where the injury is approximately caused by accident. * * * And where such conditions of compensation exist * * * the right to the recovery of such compensation * * * shall be the exclusive remedy against the employer for such injury or death. * * *"

The principal point of difference between petitioner and respondents arises over the interpretation of section 4, which is as follows: "The following shall constitute employers subject to the provisions of this act within the meaning of the preceding section: (1) The state, and each county, city and county, city, town, village and school districts and all public corporations, every person, firm, and private corporation (including any public service corporation), who has any person in service under any contract of hire, express or implied, oral or written, and who, at or prior to the time of the accident to the employé for which compensation under this act may be claimed, shall, in the manner provided in the next section, have elected to become subject to the provisions of this act, and who shall not, at the time of such accident, have withdrawn such election, in the manner provided in the next section." Petitioner insists that it was the intention of the Legislature by this section not only to divide employers into two classes, but to commit the state to an election of "compensation" as the method of satisfying claims for injuries to its employés. He believes that the section should be read as if a semicolon were placed after the words "all public corporations," and that, so punctuated, the section would designate two classes of employers: (1) The state and the specified public corporations; and (2) persons, firms, and corporations having people in their service and further that all employers in the first group would come under the compensation provisions, while those in the second class would come within the terms of the act only by election.

As a preliminary reason for a reading of the act in such manner as to sustain his views, petitioner's counsel is at some pains to assure us that "the best modern judgment favors the theory of compensation" and "the state of California expects employers to elect compensation as preferable to liability." Even if we concede his first proposition, we cannot be swayed to any great extent by it, unless the legislative branch of our government has expressed similar views because legislation is not one of the functions of this court.

[2] If, however, the state has indicated a policy in favor of such election by employers, we should, of course, be bound to consider that fact in our efforts to interpret statutes having reference to employers other than the state itself, but the state's preference in that regard, even if for the purposes of argument we admit its existence, would be of small value to us in construing the intention of the state, as expressed by the Legislature, where the subject involved is the attitude of the state when it is itself an employer, because the sovereign is not bound at all to compensate an individual employé for injuries sustained while in its service, and no right of recovery in favor of such employé exists except by statute. Bourn v. Hart, 93 Cal. 321, 28 Pac. 951, 15 L. R. A. 431, 27 Am. St. Rep. 203; Chapman v. State, 104 Cal. 690, 38 Pac. 457, 43 Am. St. Rep. 158; Melvin v. State, 121 Cal. 16, 53 Pac. 416; Denning v. State, 123 Cal. 316, 55 Pac. 1000.

[3] "Public rights will not be treated as relinquished or conveyed away by inference or legal construction. Statutes permitting the state to be sued are in derogation of its sovereignty and will be strictly construed." Lewis' Sutherland, Stat. Constr. § 558. The statute before us must, therefore, be strictly construed and in such manner, if possible, to preserve to the state its nonliability for injuries to those in its service.

But petitioner calls our attention to two other sections of the act which, as he believes, when read in connection with section 4, compel the interpretation of that section which he favors. Section 6 defines the term "employé" as "(1) Every person in the service of the state, or any county, city and county, city, town, village or school district therein, and all public corporations, under any appointment or contract of hire, express or implied, oral or written, except any official of the state, or of any county, city and county, city, town, village or school district therein or any public corporation, who shall have been elected or appointed for a regular term of one or more years, or to complete the unexpired portion of any such regular term. (2) Every person in the service of another under any contract of hire, express or implied, oral or written, * * * but not including any person whose employment is but casual and not in the usual course of the trade, business, profession or occupation of his employer." The above classification, he says, is based not upon any difference or distinction in the employés themselves, but solely upon the classification of employers. Section 7 provides that "any employé as defined in subsection (1) of the preceding section shall be subject to the provisions of this act and of any act amendatory thereof. Any employé as defined in subsection (2) of the preceding section shall be deemed to have accepted and shall * * * be subject to the provisions of this act * * * if * * * (1) The employer * * * is subject to the provisions of this act, whether the employé has actual notice thereof or not; and (2) at the time of entering into his contract of hire, express or implied, with such employer, such employé shall not have given to his employer notice in writing that he elects not to be subject to the provisions of this act, or, in the event that such contract of hire was made in advance of such employer becoming subject to the provisions of the act, such employé shall, without giving such notice, remain in the service of such employer for thirty days after the employer has filed with said board an election to be subject to the terms of this act."

Petitioner's position then is this: Employés are classified by section 6 simply as those hired by the two kinds of employers—public and private. By section 7 the public employé is given no election, and therefore, petitioner reasons, section 7 was based upon the conclusion that by section 4 the Legislature had already elected for the state the system of compensation. That is, according to petitioner, the statute was intended to classify employers and employés, and to impose the provisions for compensation automatically upon public employers and those in their service, and to permit the privilege of election to private employés and employers. "The Legislature," says counsel for petitioner, "could never have intended to mix this privilege of election—to allow election to both classes of employers and to only one class of employés." But we see no incongruity in a situation denying to public employés the right of election. The state by virtue of its sovereignty may refuse all redress to its injured servants. When it elects to adopt the compensatory system, that becomes the only recourse of the employé. His election is not between such recourse and a suit for damages, but between the privilege extended to him and resignation from public service. All who seek employment under the state must be willing to accept it, if at all, under such terms as are offered. Returning to a consideration of section 4: If we so separate the section that the modifying clauses each beginning with the word "who" are made to modify only the nouns following the words "public corporations," we take away from the act its elective features so far as the state and the employés thereof are concerned, and make it compulsory as to them. Such purpose on the part of the Legislature is negated by several circumstances. For example, we find the expression "who has any person in service under any contract of hire" in section 4. If petitioner is correct in his views, these words apply only to the nouns "person," "firm" and private "corporation"; but we find essentially the same formula used twice in section 6—once in the definition of an employé of the state and again with respect to one who has been hired by a private person. Such use of the expression in the latter section would indicate that, when it appeared in section 4, it was meant (as the punctuation would imply) to modify all of the preceding nouns. Another argument against petitioner's position is that the act contains no provisions for the payment of awards which might be in favor of an employé and against the state. Again, it is noticeable that no machinery is supplied by the act whereby the services of the industrial accident board may be invoked by the state. No officer is named as the proper functionary to receive service of notices mentioned in the act. None is authorized to represent the state in requesting examinations of employes or the hearing of any controversies. These omissions are significant. They indicate that the Legislature did not regard the state as being bound by the act in its present form, and therefore omitted to provide for those contingencies which would arise if, at some time in the future, the state should elect to place itself within the terms of the act, and which could then be met by appropriate legislation. We are convinced that the Legislature did not intend the reading of section 4 which petitioner would have us give to it.

Let the demurrer be sustained and the writ discharged.

I concur: LORIGAN, J.

HENSHAW, J. I concur. It is apparent that this statute raises a doubt whether or not it was contemplated by its framers that the state should be subject to its provisions. Under fundamental and familiar principles of construction of statutes such as this, the existence of the doubt is the solution of the inquiry. Wherever such a doubt does exist the construction favors the sovereign. The sovereign is not brought within the scope of its own laws, unless the intent that this should be done is made plainly to appear. This general rule of construction favoring the sovereign in case of doubt is applied to grants by the state to statutes of limitation to rights of action, and, indeed, to all laws and contracts concerning which it may be thought that the state is included or is a party. If, in truth, the state desires to subject itself to the law here in question, it could and should do so in language of clear and unmistakable import.

CLASSEN et ux. v. THOMAS et al.
(S. F. 6,240.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 19, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 533*)—RECORD—
OPINION OF TRIAL COURT.

The opinion filed by the trial judge in determining a motion for a new trial is no part of the appellate record, and cannot limit the effect of the order actually made, which must be limited, if at all, by its own provisions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2339, 2400; Dec. Dig. § 533.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 533*)—RECORD—
OPINION OF TRIAL COURT.

The paper sought to be filed as the copy of the order granting a new trial stated at length the trial judge's reasons for granting a new trial, and concluded, "The motion for a new trial will be granted;" but the appellate record contained a copy of the general order granting a new trial, without reasons. Held, that the paper sought to be filed was merely the written opinion of the trial judge, and not the order granting a new trial, and hence was not a part of the appellate record.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2339, 2400; Dec. Dig. § 533.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphy, Judge.

Action by John A. Classen and wife against H. G. Thomas and others. On motion by defendant appellants for an order allowing them to file, as a part of the appellate record, an alleged copy of the order granting a new trial, from which they appealed. Motion denied.

Coogan & O'Connor, of San Francisco, Snook & Church, of Oakland, and J. A. Elston, of Berkeley, for appellants. Mastick & Partridge, of San Francisco, and Dudley Kin-sell, of Oakland, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion by appellants for an order allowing them to file, as a part of the record on appeal, what they claim is a certified copy of the order from which their appeal is taken, which is the order granting a new trial in the above-entitled action.

The record on appeal does contain a copy of an order made March 25, 1912, granting a new trial, as the same was entered on the minutes of the court, and the order as so entered was simply a general order granting a new trial, without the statement of any reason therefor, or the specification of the grounds upon which the same was based. The paper sought to be filed here as a copy of the order granting a new trial is obviously merely a copy of the signed opinion filed in the lower court by the trial judge in determining the motion for a new trial. It states at considerable length the reasons of the learned judge for his conclusion that a new trial should be granted, and ends with the words, "The motion for a new trial will be granted." It is admitted that, subsequent to the making of the minute entry of the order granting a new trial, a motion was made in the lower court for the correction of the same, so that it would show that the new trial was not granted on the ground of insufficiency of evidence, and that this motion was denied.

[1] It is conceded, as it must be under the decisions, that a written opinion of the trial judge, filed in determining a motion for a new trial, constitutes no part of the record on appeal, and cannot operate to limit the effect of the order as actually made. Any limitation of the grounds upon which the order is made must, to be effectual, be specified in the order itself.

[2] We are satisfied that it must be held, under the decisions, that the paper signed and filed by the trial judge was simply a written opinion, and in no sense an order granting a new trial. In both Newman v. Overland Pac. Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 73, 64 Pac. 110, and Ben Lomond Wine Co. v. Sladky, 141 Cal. 619, 75 Pac. 332, the paper signed and filed by the judge purported to order a new trial; the language in the former of these cases being, "The motion for a new trial is granted." In such case it was held that, where there is an order granting a new trial entered upon the minutes of the court, and also an opinion filed showing the reasons for the granting of the motion, and concluding with the words, "The motion for a new trial is granted," the order entered in the minutes is the only record of the court's action, and is to be measured by its terms, and not by the reasons which the court may give for it. See, also, Weisser v. Southern Pacific Ry. Co., 148 Cal. 426, 83 Pac. 439, 7 Ann. Cas. 636.

The motion is denied.

BEATTY, C. J., does not participate in the foregoing decision.

1. DEATH (§ 49*)—ACTIONS FOR CAUSING—COMPLAINT—REQUISITES.

A complaint, in an action for wrongful death, which fails to allege that deceased left any heir, is insufficient, although it alleges that by reason of his death his heirs and personal representatives have suffered damage in a specified sum.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by A. M. Ruiz, as special administrator of Friedrich Joseph Litterst, against the Santa Barbara Gas & Electric Company. From a judgment for defendant on demurrer, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Richards & Carrier, of Santa Barbara, for appellant. H. H. Trowbridge, of Los Angeles, and Hamilton A. Bauer and Henley C. Booth, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment that he take nothing by his action and that defendant recover its costs, given upon sustaining a demurrer to plaintiff's complaint after failure on plaintiff's part to amend.

The action is one instituted October 19, 1910, by plaintiff as special administrator of the estate of decedent to recover damages for the death of deceased, an employé of defendant, on October 23, 1909, alleged to have been caused by the wrongful neglect of defendant in furnishing defective and insufficient appliances with which to perform his work. It appeared from the allegations of the complaint that an application on plaintiff's part for general letters of administration of said estate was pending at the time of the institution of the action, that he had already been appointed special administrator by an order expressly empowering him to institute this action, and that letters of special administration had been issued to him in conformity with the order. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint on various grounds, among others being the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

[1] The complaint did fail to state a cause of action, in that it failed to allege that the deceased left any heir, an allegation absolutely essential in an action of this character. Webster v. Norwegian Mining Co., 137 Cal. 399, 70 Pac. 276, 92 Am. St. Rep. 181.

It did allege that, by reason of the death, "his heirs and personal representatives have suffered damage in the sum of $10,000"; but there was no other allegation referring to any heir. The trial court sustained the demurrer, with leave to plaintiff to amend. Within the time given by the court and by stipulation for such amendment, plaintiff was duly appointed general administrator of the estate of deceased, general letters of administration were issued to him, and as such general administrator he regularly applied, on notice, to be substituted as plaintiff in place of the special administrator, and to be allowed to file an amended complaint, a copy of which proposed amended complaint was presented with his application. In the meantime, the time within which, under our statute of limitations, an action of this character may be instituted, viz., one year (subdivision 3, § 340, Code Civ. Proc.), had expired. Such time expired prior to the appointment of plaintiff as general administrator. Objection was made to the proposed substitution and the filing of the amended complaint on two grounds, which were substantially: (1) That plaintiff as special administrator was not authorized under the statutes to commence or maintain an action of this character, that the order of the court authorizing him to do so was beyond its jurisdiction and void, and that, no proper action having been instituted within a year from the date of death of deceased, the alleged cause of action was barred by subdivision 3 of section 340, Code of Civil Procedure; and (2) that the proposed amended complaint set up a new and different cause of action from the one attempted to be declared by the original complaint, and therefore attempted to state a cause of action barred by the provisions of our statute just cited. The objection was sustained, and the application of plaintiff denied. Thereupon judgment was given for defendant, as already stated.

[2] 1. As to the first objection made to the granting of plaintiff's application: If the special administrator was authorized to commence the action, the general administrator was entitled to be substituted as plaintiff. Section 1416, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that the powers of the special administrator cease upon the granting of letters testamentary or of administration, and that "the executor or administrator may prosecute to final judgment any suit commenced by the special administrator."

The objection is based upon the character of this action, as defined by our decisions, and the language of our statute relative to the powers and duties of special administrators.

[3] Section 377, Code of Civil Procedure, gives a right of action for damages for the death of a person not a minor, caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, to the "heirs or personal representatives" of the deceased. Section 1970, Civil Code, as amended in 1907 (St. 1907, p. 119), purports to give a right of action, for and on behalf of "the widow, children, dependent parents, and dependent brothers and sisters," against an employer, for damages resulting from the death of an employé in certain cases, to "the personal representative of such employé." It is settled by the decisions that an action of the character authorized by section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure is one solely for the benefit of the heirs, by which they may be compensated for the pecuniary injury suffered by them by reason of the loss of their relative, that the money recovered in such an action does not belong to the estate but to the heirs only, and that an administrator has the right to bring the action only because the statute authorizes him to do so, and that he is simply made a statutory trustee to recover damages for the benefit of the heirs. See Webster v. Norwegian Min. Co., 137 Cal. 399, 70 Pac. 276, 92 Am. St. Rep. 181; Munro v. Pacific Const., etc., Co., 84 Cal. 515, 528, 24 Pac. 303, 18 Am. St. Rep. 248; Jones v. Leonardt, 10 Cal. App. 284, 286, 101 Pac. 811. The same is manifestly made to appear as to the persons mentioned therein by the language used in the provision of section 1970 of the Civil Code, hereinbefore referred to.

[4] Section 1411 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that in the event of delay in granting letters testamentary or of administration from any cause, and in other specific cases, "the superior court, or a judge thereof, must appoint a special administrator to collect and take charge of the estate of the decedent in whatever county or counties the same may be found, and to exercise such other powers as may be necessary for the preservation of the estate." Section 1412 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the appointment must be made "by entry upon the minutes of the court, specifying the powers to be exercised by the administrator." Section 1415 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the special administrator "must collect and preserve for the executor or administrator, all the personal property of the decedent and demands of the estate, and must take charge of the real estate, and for any such and all necessary purposes may commence and maintain or defend suits and other legal proceedings as an administrator." As already noted, section 1416 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the executor or administrator may prosecute to final judgment any suit commenced by the special administrator.

The theory of learned counsel for respondent is that the powers conferred by statute on a special administrator have to do solely with the collection and preservation of the property of the estate, that the superior court has no jurisdiction to confer a power not authorized by the statute, and that as the money recovered in such an action has been held not to belong to the estate, but solely to the heirs, the commencement and maintenance of such an action is a matter not embraced within the powers conferred upon the special administrator.

We are of the opinion that the commencement and maintenance of such an action should be held to be within the scope of the powers and duties of a special administrator, as such powers and duties are defined by our statute. Although the moneys recovered in such an action do not constitute assets of the estate, they do constitute property which it is the right and duty of the personal representative of the deceased to collect for the benefit of the heirs, and the right to maintain an action for the recovery of the same is expressly conferred upon such personal representative.

[5] Section 1415 of the Code of Civil Procedure appears to us under any fair and reasonable construction to authorize the commencement and maintenance by the special administrator, when authorized by the order of court appointing him, of any suit or legal proceeding that might be commenced or maintained by the general administrator or executor. He for any of certain enumerated purposes "and all necessary purposes may commence and maintain or defend suits and other legal proceedings as an administrator" may do. Any action thus commenced by him may be prosecuted to final judgment by the general administrator or executor when appointed. No reason is apparent why the special administrator should be held to be excluded from the exercise of this power conferred upon general administrators, and in many cases it may be exceedingly necessary for the protection of the rights of the heirs interested that he should have such power, in view of the fact that such an action must be instituted within one year from the date of death of the deceased. It has been held that such an administrator may maintain the action given to the "executor or administrator" by section 1589 of the Code of Civil Procedure to recover, when there is a deficiency of assets "for the benefit of the creditors" of the decedent, real estate conveyed by him during his lifetime with intent to defraud his creditors. See Forde, Special Adm'r, v. Exempt Fire Co. et al., 50 Cal. 299. It has also been held that such an administrator may maintain an action to quiet title to real property of the deceased, and that special as well as general administrators are included within the term "administrators" as used in section 1582 of the Code of Civil Procedure. McNeil v. Morgan, 157 Cal. 373, 380, 108 Pac. 69. We can see no good reason why the same should not be held as to the term "personal representative" in section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure and section 1970 of the Civil Code, and believe, as already stated, that by the language used in section 1415 of the Code of Civil Procedure it was intended to make it possible for a special administrator to commence and maintain any action that an executor or general administrator is authorized to commence and maintain.

[6] 2. We cannot see that any new or different cause of action from that attempted to be set up in the original complaint was attempted to be stated in the proposed amended complaint. By each it was attempted to state the cause of action given by the statute to the personal representative of the deceased for the benefit of heirs of the deceased, where his death is caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another. It would appear to be immaterial in this connection whether the personal representative in this case has the right of action by virtue of section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure or by virtue of section 1970 of the Civil Code, as amended in 1907. In either event he has such a cause of action, under one section it being, in view of our decisions, for the benefit of heirs generally who are damaged, and under the other it being for the benefit of certain designated persons only, including "dependent parents and dependent brothers and sisters."

[7] If the amended complaint did not attempt to set up a new and different cause of action from that attempted to be set up in the original complaint, there is nothing in the contention made by respondent based upon the statute of limitations. Where there is no attempt to state a new cause of action in an amended complaint, but merely the addition of matters essential to make the original cause of action complete, the amendment, though made after the expiration of the period of limitation, relates back to the time of the commencement of the action. This was expressly held by the District Court of Appeal for the First District in Rauer's Law, etc., Co. v. Leffingwell, 11 Cal. App. 494, 105 Pac. 427, in which a rehearing was denied by this court, where the original complaint on a promissory note did not contain an allegation of nonpayment, an allegation absolutely essential to the statement of a cause of action. The amended complaint was filed after the statute would have run, if it had not been for the original complaint. It was held that it could not properly be said that no action was brought on the obligation until the amended complaint was filed, that the filing of the first complaint was the bringing of the action on the particular obligation, and the filing of the amended complaint was simply a continuance of the same action upon the same obligation. It was recognized that there was some conflict of authority in other states, but the rule adopted was declared to be supported by the better reasoning. In Frost v. Witter, 132 Cal.

421, 427, 64 Pac. 705, 708 (84 Am. St. Rep. 53), it was said, citing several authorities, that, "where the cause of action is not changed, the time to which the statute of limitations runs is the filing of the original complaint." In Tiffany's Death by Wrongful Act, § 187, it is said: "The complaint or declaration may be amended as in other actions where the amended pleading does not state a new cause of action; and such amendment, although made after the expiration of the period of limitation, will relate back to the commencement of the suit. Thus, an amendment may be made * * * which adds an allegation that the deceased left a wife and children." This statement is supported by the decisions cited, viz.: South Carolina R. R. Co. v. Nix, 68 Ga. 572, and Haynie, Adm'r, v. Chicago, etc., R. R. Co., 9 Ill. App. 105. In the latter of these cases the original complaint did not contain the necessary averment that the deceased left a widow or next of kin. The amended complaint, presented after the statute would have run had it not been for the original complaint, contained the necessary allegation in this behalf. It was held that no new cause of action was stated, that the effect of the amendment was simply to state truly the cause of action as it existed at the time of the commencement of the suit and was defectively stated in the original complaint, and that the objections of the defendant based on the statute of limitations should have been overruled. The case of Lilly v. Railroad Co., 32 S. C. 142, 10 S. E. 932, may support respondent's claim in this behalf to some extent; but this case does not appear to us to be in accord with the doctrine of Rauer's, etc., Co. v. Leffingwell, supra, which we think states the better rule. We find no other case cited by respondent in this matter that requires notice.

[8] 3. Basing its contention upon the claim that this action must be held to be subject to the limitation in section 1970 of the Civil Code to the effect that it can be maintained only for the benefit of "dependent parents and dependent brothers and sisters," where there is no widow or child, it is urged here that the proposed amended complaint is fatally defective in not alleging that the parents of deceased, who are alleged to be his only heirs at law, were "dependent parents." This objection does not appear to have been made in the trial court. We are of the opinion that such an objection should not be considered on such an application as the one made to the trial court, and probably the same is true as to the objection based on the statute of limitations, which we have already considered on its merits. The usual and orderly way to test the sufficiency of an amended complaint is, in the first instance, by demurrer, after the same has been filed, when the questions presented in regard thereto may be considered and determined, and leave given to the pleader to amend if the pleading be held insufficient and the court deem it proper that the party should have such leave.

In view of what we have said, we are of the opinion that the trial court erred in not granting the application for substitution and leave to file an amended complaint.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with the views herein expressed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Petitions by Philipp Seiler and George R. Andrews, public administrator, for letters of administration on the estate of Catarina Seiler. From an order granting letters to the public administrator, Seiler appeals. Reversed.

Frank Kauke, of Fresno, for appellant. M. F. McCormick and Barnard & Watters, all of Fresno, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Catarina Seiler died intestate on the 3d day of October, 1911. She was a resident of the county of Fresno, and left estate therein. Petitions for letters of administration were filed by Philipp Seiler, claiming to be the surviving husband of the decedent, and by the public administrator. The court made its order denying the application of Seiler and granting that of the public administrator. Seiler appeals from the order.

[1, 2] The appellant was concededly entitled to administer if he was the surviving husband of the decedent. That he had been her husband was not disputed. The public administrator was permitted, over Seiler's objection, to prove that in April, 1911, some six months before Mrs. Seiler's death, and about seven months before the hearing on the applications for letters, an interlocutory decree in favor of plaintiff had been given and entered in a divorce action instituted by Catarina Seiler against Philipp Seiler. The trial court apparently took the view that the entry of this decree terminated the relation of husband and wife between the parties to the action, and deprived the former husband of the right of inheritance from his wife. This was error. Any doubt that may have existed on this point at the time of the hearing has been resolved by the decision of this court in Estate of Dargie, 121 Pac. Rep. 320, filed in January of the present year. It was there held, in a case presenting a similar question to the one now before us, that the entry of the interlocutory decree does not dissolve the marriage. "By the terms of the statute," says the opinion, "it is the final judgment alone that grants the divorce, dissolves the marriage, restores the parties to the status of single persons, and permits each to marry again." Until the court has by final judgment declared the marriage dissolved, "the parties remain in the legal relation of husband and wife." At the time of the hearing for letters of administration in this case no final decree of divorce had been rendered. In fact, none could have been rendered; the interlocutory decree being then less than one year old. It follows that, under the rule declared in the Dargie Case, the appellant was the surviving husband of the decedent, and as such entitled to letters.

[3] It is suggested by respondent in his brief that pending the present appeal a final decree of divorce has been entered. While this does not appear in the record, the appellant concedes the fact, and states his willingness to have it considered here. Section 132 of the Civil Code contains a provision to the effect that the death of either party to a divorce action after the entry of the interlocutory judgment does not impair the power of the court to enter final judgment. The purpose of this provision is not entirely clear. Possibly it was designed to enable the court to establish, by final decree rendered after the death of a party, property rights which had been passed upon, provisionally or otherwise (Pereira v. Pereira, 156 Cal. 1, 103 Pac. 488, 23 L. R. A. [N. S.]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

880, 134 Am. St. Rep. 107), in the interlocutory decree. But certainly such final decree could not have been intended to effect the dissolution of the marriage. This result is already accomplished by the death of one of the parties. Nor can we believe that the Legislature intended to authorize the court, possibly of its own motion and against the will of the only remaining party in interest (Civ. Code, § 132), to enter a decree which should operate retroactively to take away rights of inheritance which had, by the death, become vested in the surviving spouse. So that if we may act upon the appellant's concession to the extent of considering a fact occurring since the taking of the appeal, and not shown by the record, it must still be held that the husband's right of succession with respect to his wife's estate was not affected by the divorce proceedings.

The order is reversed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by K. Lundeen against George M. Ottis. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Avery & French, of Los Angeles, for appellant. E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

The action is upon a written contract whereby Ottis agreed to pay Lundeen $2,933 as commission for his services in procuring one W. H. Graham to accept a written offer of Ottis to exchange certain parcels of land belonging to Ottis for certain other parcels belonging to Graham. The offer of Ottis described the respective lands, stated the terms of the proposed exchange, authorized Lundeen to negotiate the exchange as agent of Ottis, and concluded with the following provision: "And it is further agreed with said Lundeen that when he has secured an acceptance of the within proposition I will then pay the sum of two thousand nine hundred and thirty-three and no 100 dollars as commission for said services." It was signed by both Ottis and Lundeen. On the following day Lundeen induced Graham to accept the offer and to sign a written statement, indorsed on said offer, accepting the proposal, and agreeing to furnish an abstract of title within 30 days, and thereupon to make and deliver a deed conveying to Ottis the title to his property.

The answer admitted the execution of the contract with Lundeen, contained in the written offer, and the acceptance of the offer by Graham. It further alleged that the offer was prepared by Lundeen, partly in print and partly in typewriting; that the "major portion" of the agreement to pay the commission was in print; that prior to signing the same Ottis had agreed to pay Lundeen a commission if the exchange were consummated; that at the time of signing the said document Lundeen handed to Ottis the written offer so prepared, and stated to Ottis that he, Lundeen, would expect him, Ottis, to pay a commission only in the event that the exchange was consummated; and that, relying on this statement, Ottis signed the written offer containing said agreement for commissions. It was also alleged that Ottis, in pursuance of the accepted offer, put deeds conveying his property to Graham in escrow, to be delivered on performance by Graham of his part in the exchange, that Ottis was at all times ready and able to carry out his proposal, but that Graham neglected to perform, and that, after waiting five months, Ottis demanded performance, which Graham refused, whereupon Ottis withdrew his deeds from escrow, and the exchange was never made. The prayer of the answer was that the agreement with Lundeen for commissions be reformed by striking out the words "when he has secured an acceptance of the within proposition," and inserting instead thereof the words, "upon the consummation of said exchange," and that plaintiff take nothing by his action.

[1] These facts constitute no defense to the action. The clause quoted from the writing constituted a valid contract binding Ottis to pay Lundeen the commissions sued for upon the acceptance of the offer by Graham. Its execution by Lundeen and Ottis is admitted. It could be impeached or set aside only by showing that its execution was obtained by duress, menace, fraud, undue influence or mistake (Civ. Code, § 1567), or that it was without consideration. The allegations do not suggest menace, duress, or undue influence. They are not sufficient to show fraud or mistake. It is not alleged that Ottis did not read the contract before he signed it, or that he was then ignorant of its contents. There is an allegation that when Lundeen handed Ottis the written offer, before signing, he, Ottis, "thought it was an agreement for an exchange of properties." The contract when signed by Graham, as was contemplated, would be, in fact, an agreement for such exchange. This statement, therefore, shows no misunderstanding, as to the agreement. Hence there was no mistake. It is not stated that any artifice was practiced to induce him to refrain from reading it or that he was unable to read, or that the contents of this clause were in any way misrepresented.

[2] The statement by Lundeen that he would expect the commission only in the event that the exchange was completed was not a representation that the agreement so provided, nor a representation of any kind in regard to the contents of the instrument. It was, at most, a voluntary promise by Lundeen that he would, to that extent, disregard or waive the agreement. Being without consideration, it was not binding, and, being a part of the contemporary oral negotiations, it cannot be allowed to vary the terms of the writing. Civ. Code, § 1625; Code Civ. Proc. § 1856. It is not alleged that it was made without any intent to perform it, and therefore it is no basis for a charge of fraud. There are no facts alleged sufficient to constitute such charge. What has been said sufficiently disposes of the claim that the contract should be reformed in the particulars prayed for.

[3] There was no want of consideration. According to the terms of the offer, all that Lundeen was to do to earn the commission was to act as the agent of Ottis in "negotiating an exchange" of the properties. The answer states on this point that Ottis desired to obtain an agreement that would bind Graham to make the exchange. It does not appear that he desired anything more, or that further action was necessary. Lundeen accomplished this task. The offer and the acceptance of Graham constitute a valid contract between Ottis and Graham binding on both. No further negotiations remained to be made. The only thing remaining undone was performance, which Ottis could have enforced by suit against Graham. Lundeen did not undertake to compel such performance. He was entitled to the commission, even according to defendant's own statement, when he procured Graham to execute the acceptance. Ottis could not defeat Lundeen's right to commission by abandoning, as it seems he has, his own right to enforce performance by Graham.

On the trial, when Ottis offered to introduce evidence in support of his answer, the court ruled that the facts alleged constituted no defense to the action, excluded all the evidence offered and directed the jury to render a verdict for the plaintiff, which was accordingly done. For the reasons above stated, we conclude that there was no error in this.

[4] Defendant at that time asked leave to amend his answer by adding thereto an allegation that at the time he signed the written proposal Lundeen, who had prepared it, represented it to be an agreement for an exchange of property, and the further allegation that Lundeen was then "the trusted agent of defendant and stood in relation of special trust and confidence to defendant and was relied upon by defendant as such confidential agent." Leave to do so was refused. The amendment would not have made the answer good. The executed offer did constitute an agreement for exchange. The representation as alleged was therefore not false, but true, and nothing is alleged to show that it was misleading. It is not alleged that Lundeen stated that the offer contained nothing else except an agreement to exchange properties or represented that it did not contain the agreement to pay commissions. Consequently, whether at the time the alleged statement was made Lundeen was a trusted agent or was acting at arms' length, the representation was true, and did not constitute fraud.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Laws, p. 193) § 13, providing that the board of supervisors at any election may submit any question or proposition on which they may desire the opinion of the voters of the county, authorized the board to pass an ordinance for the submission of local option questions for the issuance of liquor and billiard room licenses outside incorporated cities and towns in a county, at every general election, notwithstanding a preceding part of the section had been declared unconstitutional.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

Application by Ralph H. Brown for writ of mandate against H. J. Lelande, County Clerk of Los Angeles County. Writ denied.

Waterman & Green and Alfred H. McAdoo, all of Los Angeles, and W. S. Wright, of Pasadena, for petitioner. J. D. Fredericks, Dist. Atty., B. C. Hanna, Chief Deputy Dist. Atty., and A. J. Hill, Deputy Dist. Atty., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Original application by a taxpayer of Los Angeles county for a peremptory writ of mandate.

It appears from the petition, to which a general demurrer is interposed: That on August 30, 1910, the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county adopted an ordinance, No. 245 (New Series), entitled "An ordinance regulating and licensing certain kinds of business in the county of Los Angeles." That section 25 of this ordinance provides: "At every general election hereafter held, the following four propositions shall be severally submitted to the electors of each voting precinct in the county of Los Angeles, outside of incorporated cities and towns, to wit: (1) Shall wholesale and retail dealers' licenses be granted in this precinct? (2) Shall winery keepers' licenses be granted in this precinct? (3) Shall hotel and restaurant liquor dealers' licenses be granted in this precinct? (4) Shall licenses for public billiard rooms be granted in this precinct? The county clerk is hereby authorized and directed to put each of said propositions upon the ballots for each of said precincts at every general election, in the manner prescribed by law, without any further order to that effect. The number of votes in each of said precincts for and against each of said propositions shall be entered in the minutes of the board of supervisors." That respondent as county clerk of Los Angeles county in preparing and having printed the ballots to be used at the general election to be held on November 5, 1912, intends to and will include and have printed thereon the four propositions specified in section 25 of said ordinance so required by the provisions thereof to be submitted to the electors of the county outside of incorporated cities. The prayer is for a writ of mandate to be issued to respondent as county clerk commanding him in the preparation and printing of the sample ballots required to be mailed to the electors in precincts of said county outside of incorporated cities therein, as well as the ballots to be used at the general election to be held in said precincts on November 5, 1912, to omit therefrom, and from each and all of them, the four propositions specified in section 25 of said ordinance.

Petitioner contends that the ordinance directing the proposed action of the clerk is void in that there is no provision of the statute authorizing the board of supervisors to submit such questions to the electors. In thus contending petitioner has apparently overlooked section 13 of the County Government Act, enacted in 1897 (Stats. 1897, p. 454; Henning's Gen. Laws of Cal., p. 193), which in express terms provides: "The board of supervisors may also, at any election, submit any question or proposition upon which they may desire the opinion of the voters of the county." The power so to do is in no wise affected by the fact that the preceding part of the section of which it forms an independent part has been held to be unconstitutional. Ex parte Anderson, 134 Cal. 69, 66 Pac. 194, 86 Am. St. Rep. 236; Ex parte Young, 154 Cal. 317, 97 Pac. 822, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 330. So far as we are advised, this provision has never in express terms been repealed, and we are unable to find any subsequent act with which it in any manner conflicts upon which to base a claim of an implied repeal. The board is not bound by the result of the election, and hence the expression of opinion by the electors is ineffectual for any purpose; but the validity of the provision is not affected by such fact. As said by Chief Justice Beatty in Ex parte Anderson, supra: "It might well be argued that such a law would be inexpedient, or even foolish, but laws cannot be invalidated upon that ground." Our attention is not directed to any provision of the Constitution to which the statute quoted is obnoxious, and we know of none. This provision of the law, through which the electors are permitted to express their views upon the question of the desirability of the enactment of police measures, is in harmony with the general trend of modern legislation conferring upon the people the right to determine such questions for themselves.

Writ denied.

On Application for Rehearing.

The application for rehearing is not without merit. The propositions advanced are, however, argued for the first time upon such application. The limited time afforded the respondent to cause the ballots to be printed and the probable effect upon the general election, were the alternative writ revived, appeal to us as sufficient reason for denying a rehearing. In addition to this, it is not probable that a different judgment would meet with the unanimous concurrence of the justices of this court.

California. Oct. 15, 1912.)

1. PROCESS (§ 137*)—SERVICE—AFFIDAVIT.

Where the only evidence that a summons was served is the affidavit of the person making the service, the affidavit, to give the court jurisdiction, must show the facts required by statute and must be sworn to before used by the court as evidence of service.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 17*)—SERVICE — DEFECTS—OBJECTIONS—WAIVER.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Jeanie Hamilton against Samuel Hamilton. From an order refusing to vacate a default judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry N. Beatty, of San Francisco, for appellant. Knight & Webster, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an appeal from an order made in the minutes of the court on March 10, 1911, "denying defendant's motion to set aside and vacate the default judgment made and entered against defendant herein on the 13th day of September, 1910, and permitting defendant to appear and answer, and from the whole thereof." The only judgment found in the transcript appears to have been entered and filed on September 8, 1910.

It appears that plaintiff brought her action against defendant for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. The complaint was filed August 27, 1910, and duly served on the same day, and on September 8, 1910, the interlocutory decree of divorce was duly made and entered, reciting, among other things, that on said last-mentioned day the cause came on regularly for trial, "upon plaintiff's complaint herein taken as confessed by the defendant, whose default for not answering had been duly entered, and upon proof taken herein from which it appears that all the allegations of the complaint are true, * * * and that said defendant was duly and regularly served, at San Francisco, Cal., with the summons issued in the action," etc. The grounds of the motion as therein stated were: "That said default and said judgment were entered herein against defendant by mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect of defendant." The points urged are: (1) That the court erred, under the showing made, in not making an order vacating the default judgment. (2) That the court had no jurisdiction to enter default and judgment. Upon the first point appellant relies on the facts alleged in his affidavit, used in support of the motion, to the effect that at the time he was served with summons he was led to believe, from what was then told him by the persons present, including his wife and her attorney, that he had 30 days in which to answer or appear; that he was called away to a neighboring state and returned on September 10th, within the 30 days, and then for the first time learned that the case had been tried and an interlocutory decree entered against him; that he was unable to communicate with the attorney he had intended employing until October 4th, and when he met him the advice given by his attorney was "not satisfactory," and later he employed his present attorney, who, on December 16, 1910, made the motion. Suffice it to say that counter affidavits of the persons said to have been present when the summons was served contradicted defendant in the material statements made by him.

As to the second proposition, appellant's contention is "that at the time of entering default judgment, to wit, September 8, 1910, there was no proof of service of summons on appellant and the court had no jurisdiction. The only proof of service before the court, on September 8, 1910, was an affidavit of service subscribed and sworn to September 27, 1910, 19 days after the entry of default and judgment. There must be an affidavit of service of summons"—citing section 410, C. C. P.; Lyons v. Cunningham, 66 Cal. 43, 4 Pac. 938; Barney v. Vigoreaux, 75 Cal. 377, 17 Pac. 433.

[1] The jurat to the affidavit of service is dated September 27, 1910, and the document is marked "filed Sept. 8, 1910." The decree recites that "default for not answering had been duly entered." The certificate of the clerk, attached to the complaint, shows that default was "duly entered herein according to law. In open court. Attest this 8th day of September, 1910." So far as can be seen from the record before us, the evidence of service of summons, the certificate of the clerk to the default, and all the papers were before the court on September 8, 1910, when it entered the decree. No suggestion is made that any change has been made in any of the dates, or that any of the documents have been tampered with. The service of summons was made on August 27th, and it is altogether probable that the affidavit of service was made on that day, and not on September 27th, as shown by the jurat, and that the mistake was made by the notary. The court had this affidavit before it, and defendant states, in his testimony given on the motion, that he was served with summons on August 27th. Appellant says: "This mistake in the affidavit of service may be considered trivial; but it is submitted that where one party secures a legal advantage over another, and in that proceeding makes a mistake, the law ought not to protect the party making the mistake." It is true that, where the only evidence before the court that summons was served is the affidavit of the person making the service, the affidavit must show the facts required by the statute and, of course, must have been sworn to before being used by the court as evidence of service. Lyons v. Cunningham, supra. The affidavit being the only evidence of service, the court acquires no jurisdiction unless it is made as required by law.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[2] If, however, the summons was in fact duly and regularly served, and defendant admits the fact in his application to vacate the default, it seems to us that he is in no position to object to defects in the affidavit. By his own admission the summons has served its purpose. He has failed to support his alleged grounds for the motion, which were "mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect."

The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LOUIE DENE. (Cr. 405.)
(District Court of Appeal, First District,
California. Oct. 16, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1153*)—REVIEW—DISCRETIONARY RULINGS.

Whether sufficient foundation has been laid for the admission of the testimony of an absent witness given on a preliminary examination is one of fact, and its determination rests largely in discretion of the trial court; and hence, if there is substantial evidence to support the trial court's conclusion, its ruling will not be interfered with on appeal.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 543*)—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE GIVEN AT PRELIMINARY HEARING.

Where an officer, having a subpoena for a witness who testified at accused's preliminary examination, went to the address given by such witness on the examination several times, but was unable to find him, and was told that he had gone to another place, and an officer was sent to such other place with a subpoena, but was unable to find him, or find any one who knew him, the court did not abuse its discretion in permitting such witness' testimony given at the preliminary examination to be introduced in evidence.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

On a trial for homicide, the only dispute was as to the identity of the man who did the killing. An absent witness testified on the preliminary examination that he saw a man leaving the scene of the crime, that he was unable to identify defendant as the man, but testified that such man wore "American pants." It appeared that accused was so dressed when arrested, shortly after the homicide. Held that, in view of the well-known fact that it is the common custom of the Chinese in this state to so dress, the admission of this testimony given on preliminary examination, if erroneous, was not prejudicial to accused.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Louie Dene was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

R. Porter Ashe, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

HALL, J. Defendant, a Chinaman, was convicted of the crime of manslaughter, for the killing of one Wong Che, also a Chinaman, and in due time appealed to this court from the judgment and the order of the court denying his motion for a new trial.

The only matter urged for a reversal is that the court erred in allowing the testimony, given at the preliminary examination of defendant by one Cornelius Loneragan, to be read in evidence over the objection of defendant, in that due diligence had not been shown by the people in an effort to procure the attendance at the trial of the witness.

[1] The determination of the question as to whether or not sufficient foundation has been laid for the reading of the testimony of a witness taken at the preliminary examination is a matter lying largely in the discretion of the trial court. It presents a question of fact, to be determined in the first instance by the trial judge; and if there is substantial evidence in the record to support the conclusion of the trial court, this court will not interfere with the ruling allowing the testimony to be read. People v. Lederer, 17 Cal. App. 369, 119 Pac. 949; People v. Lewandowski, 143 Cal. 574, 77 Pac. 467; People v. Nelson, 85 Cal. 421, 24 Pac. 1006.

[2] The showing contained in the record before us is sufficient to justify the ruling of the trial court. At the preliminary examination the witness Lonergan gave his residence as at 272 Natoma street. The information was filed on the 6th day of January, 1912. The trial of defendant commenced on the 8th day of May, 1912. Upon this day a subpoena was placed in the hands of a police officer for service upon the absent witness. This officer went to 272 Natoma street, and found it to be a lodging house. Upon inquiry of the bookkeeper of the place, he was informed that the witness, Cornelius Lonergan, had formerly lived at the house, but had left upon May 3d, and had stated that he was going to Point Richmond. This officer made three other attempts before the offer of the deposition to find the witness at 272 Natoma street, but without success. Another officer was, however, sent to Point Richmond with a subpoena for service upon the absent witness. This officer's testimony was to the effect that in an effort to serve the subpoena upon the absent witness he went to Point Richmond and to the city of Richmond, and, upon inquiry at all the factories, restaurants, hotels, and saloons at those places, neither found the witness nor anybody that knew him. This was all done before the deposition was offered in evidence, which was upon May 15th. Upon this showing the court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the deposition to be read.

[3] Furthermore, the testimony of Lonergan was of but trifling importance. There was no dispute or real controversy about the shooting to death of the decedent, except as to the identity of the man who did the killing. Though Lonergan testified as to seeing a Chinaman hurrying away from the place of the shooting immediately upon the shots being fired, he was unable to identify defendant as that man, though he did testify that the man whom he had seen wore "American pants," and it appeared that the defendant, when arrested shortly afterward and a few blocks away from the place of the homicide, was so dressed. But it is a matter of common knowledge that in California such is the common custom of the Chinese. It is impossible to believe that the exclusion of the deposition of Lonergan would in any way have affected the result of the trial.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Action by M. R. Madary against the City of Fresno and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Kauke, of Fresno, for appellant. M. K. Harris and Milton M. Dearing, both of Fresno, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. Upon the merits of the case we are in accord with the views of the Hon. George E. Church, the trial judge, as expressed in the following opinion, which we adopt:

"This action was brought by plaintiff to recover a certain sum or sums of money alleged to have been paid under protest by him and a large number of his assignors, taxpayers in the city of Fresno, illegally levied and collected as part of the taxes of 1909.

"The action is grounded upon the following facts, fully and particularly averred: That on January 18, 1909, the board of trustees of the city of Fresno passed an ordinance, approved the same day, whereby the city elected to avail itself of the services of the necessary county officers in the matter of the collection of its taxes, as provided by act of the Legislature approved March 27, 1895 [Laws 1895, p. 219]; that on August 16, 1909, the board estimated and determined by ordinance the necessary amount of money to be raised by taxation for the needs of the city for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1910, fixing the same at $126,382.50; that on or before August 2, 1909, the county auditor certified to the trustees of the city the value of the taxable property within the city, as equalized and corrected by the board of supervisors of the county, acting as a board of equalization, to be $11,055,314.00; that on August 16, 1909, said board of trustees calculated and by ordinance established the rate of city taxes and levied the same, such rate being, of course, such per cent. of said taxable property as is necessary to raise the said estimated amount of tax; that thereafter, and after the necessary amount of taxes for the needs of the city had been determined, the rate fixed and levied upon said valuation of the city's taxable property as so finally determined by said board of supervisors sitting as a board of equalization, on, viz., the 8th of September, 1909, the state board of equalization by order increased the assessment roll or value of taxable property of the county of Fresno by 'adding 20 per centum' thereto, and, upon notification thereof, the county auditor added 20 per centum to the value of all the property assessed to each taxpayer, and entered upon the assessment books, as being due from the taxpayers of the city for city taxes, an aggregated sum one-fifth greater than the said amount fixed by the board of trustees as necessary for the city's needs for the said fiscal year. It is this so-called 20 per cent. excess, or so much thereof as was paid under protest by the plaintiff and his assignors, that this suit is brought to recover. It is alleged that it was illegally assessed and collected, and that it is now held by the defendant J. R. Hickman as ex officio treasurer of the city of Fresno, and illegally withheld by him from plaintiff after due demand.

[1] "By the act of the Legislature approved March 27, 1895, entitled 'An act to provide for the levy and collection of taxes,' etc., it is declared to be the duty of the board of trustees * * * of any city in this state, except municipal corporations of the first class, on the first Monday of August in each year, to determine and fix by ordinance the amount of money necessary to be raised by taxation for the governmental needs of such city for the current fiscal year, provided that on or before the first Monday of February preceding the city had elected to have the duties of the city treasurer performed by the county treasurer. By this act also the county auditor must, on or before the second Monday of August, transmit to the city trustees a statement of the assessed valuation of all property in the city as equalized by the board of supervisors, and then, on the first Monday of September, the trustees, using this valuation as the basis, must compute the rate of taxation sufficient to raise the aforesaid sum estimated and required for city purposes, which rate must be immediately transmitted to the county auditor, and these acts are declared to constitute a valid assessment of such property and a valid levy of the rate so fixed.

"It is plain that it is not the intent and purpose of this act to merge and confound city and county business. It is plain that in discharging the duties of city assessor, city tax collector, and city treasurer, the respective county officers become or are ex officio officers of the city.

"In the matter of the assessment and levy of state and county taxes, the proceeding is somewhat different. At the same time that the auditor of the county transmits to the city trustees the statement of the taxable property of the city as prepared by the assessor and equalized and corrected by the board of supervisors, acting as a board of equalization, and which statement serves as the basis of city taxation, he sends a duplicate thereof to the state board of equalization. When the statement, as changed and corrected by the state board, is returned to the auditor (which must be on or before the second Monday in September), the board of supervisors must, on the third Monday in September, fix the rate of county taxes, using this finally corrected assessment valuation as the basis of its computation. Having previously determined the amount of money necessary to be raised by taxation for county purposes, the fixing of the rate is merely a mathematical computation.

[2] "In the case before us, it is the contention of defendants that notwithstanding the fact that the rate of city taxes is and must be fixed before the action of the state board of equalization, and the further fact that in determining that rate the assessed valuation of city property, as equalized by the board of supervisors, must be taken as the basis of calculation, still, in determining the amount of taxes to be paid by the several taxpayers of the city for city purposes, that amount must be computed, not upon the assessed valuation upon which the city rate was determined, but upon the valuation as finally corrected and equalized by the state board of equalization. There would appear to be no good warrant for such contention. To say nothing of the inconsistencies and absurdities to which it would lead, we have already seen that, by the express declaration of the legislative act of March 27, 1895, the acts, first of the city trustees, in determining the needed amount of taxes for the fiscal year; second, of the assessor and board of supervisors in ascertaining and determining the assessed valuation of the city property; and, finally, of the city trustees in fixing the rate—constitute 'a valid assessment of such property and a valid levy of such rate so fixed.' It is difficult to see how there can be two valid assessments for the same purpose.

"It is conceded that, had the city not elected to make use of the county officers, but had its own assessor and tax collector assess and collect its taxes, their action would not be affected by the state board of equalization. Why, then, should it be affected when the work is done by its ex officio officers? The city has never elected (as under section 3671, Pol. Code, it might have elected) to take as the basis of its taxation the assessment as equalized by the state board, and surely its ex officio officers have no power to make such election for it. It is the duty of the state board of equalization 'to equalize the valuation of the several counties of the state,' 'lowering or raising entire assessment rolls so as to make the assessments conform to the true value in money of the property assessed,' and 'to fix the rate of state taxation.' It is manifest that the primary object is to equalize throughout the several counties of the state the burden of state taxation. So far as county taxation is concerned, it is a matter of comparative indifference whether the assessed valuation of its taxable property as determined by the county assessor and board of supervisors, be raised or lowered by the state board of equalization, because the rate of taxation is not fixed by the supervisors until after the action of the state board. The amount of money to be taken from the pockets of the taxpayers of the county for county purposes is not thereby affected. But as to the city, in such case, any change in the assessed valuation by the state board must have one of two effects, equally intolerable; either to deprive the city government of necessary funds, or give it what it neither asks nor needs, thereby unjustly adding to the burdens of its citizens. A conclusion so obnoxious and damaging to the taxpayer could be justified only by the plainest provisions of the statute. And not only are there no such plain provisions, but the entire spirit of the law negatives such conclusion. There is nothing in the case of Baldwin v. Ellis, 68 Cal. 495, 9 Pac. 652, opposed to the view here taken. Indeed, the reasoning of the court in that case clearly sustains it.

[3] "The court holds that the power of the state board in lowering or raising the assessment roll applies both to state and county. Its declared object is to equalize county assessments. It is not concerned with municipal taxation and is nowhere given power or supervision over it.

"Considerations of a general character would seem to support strongly the view here taken.

[4] "It is a familiar rule of statutory construction that it be reasonable, especially that it do not tend to palpable injustice, contradiction, or absurdity. It is a cardinal rule that the language of a statute should be so interpreted as to make it compatible with common sense and the dictates of justice. If any other reasonable construction be possible, a statute should never be construed to work injustice. Justice is the aim of all legislation. The power of government to exact from the citizen a part of his property in way of taxation is indeed vast, but it is not unlimited. It may be exercised only for the public good and for a public purpose.

[5] "Cooley's definition of taxes as 'enforced contributions levied for public needs' states concisely both the nature and limitation of taxes. Taxes are the property of the citizens demanded and taken by the government to enable it to discharge its functions. In his work on Tax Titles, Blackwell defines taxes as 'burdens imposed by the legislative power upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes.' The needs of the government constitute then both the occasion and limitation of the taxing power. To take from the citizen a dollar beyond the needs of government is not taxation; it is extortion."

[6] Appellant's counsel in his brief exhibits his usual aptitude and forcefulness, but he makes the mistake of assuming that the situation is governed by the following provisions of section 3671 of the Political Code: "The assessment made by the county assessor and that of the state board of equalization, as apportioned by the boards of supervisors to each city, town, township, school, road, or other district in their respective counties, or cities and counties, shall be the only basis of taxation for the county, or any subdivision thereof, except in incorporated cities and towns, and may also be taken as such basis in incorporated cities and towns when the proper authorities may so elect." From a consideration of the preceding section it is perfectly apparent that the reference in said section 3671 to the assessment made by the state board of equalization does not contemplate the equalization of the value of the taxable property of the state, but it signifies and points to the assessment, by said board, of railroads operated in more than one county. If we should construe it as contended for by appellant, we would be confronted with the embarrassing situation that the board of trustees of the city of Fresno is compelled to fix the rate of taxation upon a basis to be determined in the future. But it is clear from the record that the city authorities elected to take advantage of said act of 1895, and that act provides in unmistakable terms that the assessment made by the assessor and approved by the board of supervisors shall be the basis for taxation for city purposes. If it be conceded that said section 3671 provides a different basis, it is sufficient to say that the city authorities have not elected to be bound by it, and it is entirely immaterial that it has been amended since the passage of said act of 1895.

[7] It seems eminently just that this money, collected by the city in excess of its needs as determined by the constituted authorities, should be returned to those upon whom the unnecessary burden was imposed, and no merely technical objection should stand in the way of this consummation. Of this character we consider the other points made by appellant, and it is believed that they are devoid of substantial merit.

To read the complaint is to be convinced that it states a cause of action against the city of Fresno. It sets forth the facts recited in the opinion of the trial judge, and, if we concede that some of them are imperfectly averred, it is entirely manifest that appellant suffered no prejudice.

[8] The cause of action is admittedly against appellant, and hence the treasurer was not a necessary party defendant. By virtue of his office he was and is the custodian of the funds, but they were collected for the benefit and credited to the account of appellant. The claim was against the city, and, like any other ordinary action for a debt due from the municipality, there is no apparent reason why any one except the debtor should have been sued.

[9] But it is hard to understand how the city has suffered any detriment or is in a position to complain by reason of the fact that the treasurer was joined as a party defendant. The rule is, undoubtedly, as stated in Gardner v. Samuel, 116 Cal. 84, 47 Pac. 935, 58 Am. St. Rep. 135, that "a defendant against whom there was a sufficient complaint cannot object that others who had no interest in the subject-matter of the suit were made defendants, unless it also appeared that his interests were affected thereby." If defendant Hickman had appealed and were urging the point, a different situation might be presented.

[10] In the beginning, no doubt, counsel for respondent were somewhat uncertain as to the form of proceeding that should be instituted, and a petition was filed against the treasurer for a writ of mandate to compel him to pay the claim of plaintiff. That action was numbered 14,156 and was based, probably, upon the theory that, the claim having been allowed by the board of supervisors, it was the ministerial duty of the treasurer to pay it on demand. Thereafter—we naturally infer—counsel concluded that it was not a case for mandate, but that plaintiff in an ordinary action must establish his unliquidated demand against the city, and hence this suit, No. 14,157, was brought. The foregoing circumstances have given rise to appellant's contention that another action was pending for the same cause. If the theory of plaintiff's case has been correctly stated—and it seems to be so conceded by appellant—then it is perfectly manifest that the former action was no bar to this.

[11] It is not the duty of the treasurer to pay a claim against the city, which has not been reduced to judgment and which has been rejected by the city trustees. He is a mere ministerial officer, and he exercises no judicial functions. It must be plain that his election to pay or refuse payment of such claim is no legal determination of its validity, nor would it be binding upon the city or the claimant. Under such circumstances, of course, no court would issue the writ of mandate, but would hold that the claimant must proceed against the city in the proper form to establish his right to the payment. The logic of appellant's position would compel the treasurer to pass upon every ordinary claim of indebtedness against the city, and thereby exercise a power far in excess of what has been conferred by the statute. No case involving the identical question has been cited, but we think none should be required. As pointed out by respondent, it has been held, in certain cases, that the pending of a civil action is not a bar to mandamus on the same general facts. County of Calaveras v. Brockway, 30 Cal. 325; Oroville & V. R. Co. v. Supervisors, 37 Cal. 354; Barber v. Mulford, 117 Cal. 360, 49 Pac. 206. And the converse would seem to be equally true. At least, the pendency of an action against one person upon a complaint failing to state a cause of action against said person cannot affect another suit based upon a cause of action stated against another person. The principles of law involved are familiar, and we deem the further citation of authority to the point unnecessary.

[12] The trial court's findings were against both defendants, but no judgment was rendered either for or against Hickman, and of this appellant complains. As before indicated, we view the treasurer as an unnecessary party and the complaint as not stating a cause of action against him. It would seem to follow that he was entitled to judgment for his costs. But the appellant has not been injured by the omission of the court in that regard. If there were a question of joint liability and the right of contribution, the situation, of course, would be different. But, as we view the case, appellant alone is liable, and it has no right to insist that a judgment be rendered against Hickman; and a judgment in his favor could not be invoked to mitigate the burden that the law imposes upon appellant. Hickman might complain, but it seems clear that the error, as far as appellant is concerned, is harmless and should be disregarded. Section 475, Code Civ. Proc.

It is not disputed that in an action against more than one defendant the court may render judgment against only one when a several judgment is proper. It is expressly so provided in the statute. Section 579, Code Civ. Proc.; Kelly v. Bandini, 50 Cal. 530; Kelley v. Plover, 103 Cal. 35, 36 Pac. 1020.

But, admitting in this case that Hickman was entitled to an adjudication on the issues raised by his answer, this is a matter of which his codefendant has no right to complain. Golden Gate Mill & Mining Co. v. Hendy Machine Works, 82 Cal. 184, 23 Pac. 45.

[13] The charter of the city of Fresno provides that: "Every demand against the city treasurer * * * must be itemized, specifying the goods furnished, the service performed, or other basis of the claim, giving the date and amount of each item, and by whom ordered, and the amount of the claim, and must be verified by the oath of the claimant or some one for him having knowledge thereof to the effect that such claim is justly and wholly due and unpaid, and that each item thereof has accrued within one year next before its presentation for payment." We are satisfied that there was a substantial compliance with this requirement. There seems to be no reason why the various claims could not be presented together, so long as the various facts demanded by the law were recited for the intelligent guidance of the trustees. The instrument in question here contained a very full statement of the "basis of the claim" and concluded as follows:

"The names of the respective claimants and the sums in which they respectively claim that they are entitled to reimbursement are as follows:

City of Fresno, Dr.				Am't Due for Which Reimbursement is Claimed.
For 20% excess paid upon city taxes as follows:
To:	Names.	1st Inst.	Date.	2nd Inst.	Date.
	James Porteous..	$137.79	Nov. 6/09	$132.88	Apr. 20/10
	M. R. Madary...	14.29	Nov. 29/09	12.06	Apr. 25/10

Then followed the other names with amounts and dates similarly arranged, and at the bottom of the list was signed, "M. K. Harris and Milton M. Dearing, Attorneys for Each of Said Claimants," and a verification in proper form by said attorneys was attached. We think this should satisfy the most captious.

The judgment, in our opinion, should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

CRIFE v. UNANGST, Judge. (Civ. 1,215.)
(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California, Oct. 14, 1912.)

1. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 12*)—PREPARATION—REPORTER'S NOTES.

It is not necessary, in preparing a statement or bill of exceptions for use on appeal, to give the evidence in full, where the question presented is solely as to the sufficiency of conflicting evidence to sustain a particular finding; it being necessary only to set out a sufficient amount of the evidence bearing on the question to show a substantial conflict.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exceptions, Bill of, Cent. Dig. § 13; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

2. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 47*)—PREPARATION—OMISSIONS—AMENDMENTS.

Where material evidence on which findings have been based is omitted from the proposed statement or bill of exceptions, all that is necessary in submitting the amendments is to give so much of the evidence of each of the witnesses, naming them, as is sufficient to show in substance all the evidence bearing on the questions presented by the findings.

3. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 47*)—SKELETON BILL—AMENDMENTS.

Where an appellant presents a mere skeleton bill of exceptions, he cannot complain if the amendments presented are in general terms.

4. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 51*)—CONTENTS —REDUNDANT MATTER.

Under the Code provision directing the incorporation in the statement or bill of exceptions only of such evidence or other matter as is necessary to explain the statement, and that the exceptions may be presented as briefly as possible, it was an abuse of the trial court's discretion to refuse to settle any statement or bill of exceptions, other than a full transcript of the reporter's notes merely because it appeared that the proposed statement contained many omissions, and that because of the lapse of time the judge had forgotten many important matters that should be incorporated in the bill.

Petition by Samuel Cripe for writ of mandate against E. P. Unangst, Judge of the Superior Court for San Luis Obispo County, to compel the settlement of a proposed bill of exceptions, not including a full transcript of the reporter's notes of the trial. Granted.

Hester, Merrill & Craig, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Lamy & Putnam, of San Luis Obispo, for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. Petition for mandate.

The affidavit in support of the application discloses that an action was tried before the respondent judge wherein a judgment was rendered against the defendant for the sum of $1,500; the action being one for damages alleged to have been occasioned by defendant's alienating the affections of plaintiff's husband. A copy of the findings are attached to the petition, from which it appears that the only issues presented, heard, or determined were as to the marriage of plaintiff and the enticing away of plaintiff's husband through malicious statements and by arts and persuasions, by reason of which the damage resulted; that defendant in due time served his notice of intention to move for a new trial upon the ground that the evidence did not justify the said decision in favor of plaintiff, and because of errors of law occurring at the trial and duly excepted to, which motion, it was stated therein, would be made upon a statement of the case thereafter to be prepared by the petitioner. Petitioner alleged that he duly prepared a statement on such motion which contained specifications of the particulars in which it was alleged the evidence was insufficient to justify the findings of the court, and also the particular errors in law occurring at the trial; that this proposed statement was served upon plaintiff's counsel, who within due time proposed amendments thereto, which amendments consisted simply of a motion to strike out all of the testimony contained in the proposed statement, and asking for an order that the evidence taken down by the court reporter, either by questions and answers or in narrative form, be substituted. Upon the date set for settling the statement petitioner's counsel objected to a consideration of the proposed amendments for the reason that the same were not such amendments as were authorized by our statute. The court, however, overruled such objection and made its order that said amendments as proposed by plaintiff should be allowed, and refused to settle any other bill. It is averred that the said transcription of the testimony and proceeding ordered by the court would cost in excess of $375 and would embrace more than 700 pages of typewritten matter; that plaintiff is insolvent and cannot be compelled to pay any portion of such transcription fees. Respondent by his verified return alleges that the proposed statement contained only 27 pages of the evidence, and the same was incomplete, incorrect, and misleading; that it would be a practical impossibility to propose concrete and definite amendments to said alleged statement of defendant for the reason that the same was meager, confusing, misleading, and intermingled; that much of the testimony omitted from said proposed statement is material; that the contradictory testimony was entirely omitted; that the only way in which a statement intelligible in form can be presented is through a narrative report of the proceedings; that such time has elapsed since the trial that respondent cannot from memory and recollection, without the aid of a transcript of the record, state the exact wording and form of such amendments as are necessary to fully and fairly present the record of said cause, and for that reason he has refused to settle any statement other than such as ordered.

[1] It has been determined by our Supreme Court in People v. Getty, 49 Cal. 581, that it was never intended that the reporter's notes should constitute a bill of exceptions, and that a judge would be justified in refusing to settle a bill presented in that form. People v. Sprague, 53 Cal. 422. In Cohen v. Wallace, 107 Cal. 140, 40 Pac. 101, it is determined that a party presenting an objectionable bill could be required by the judge to put it in proper shape, giving a reasonable time for such purpose. And in the later case of Vatcher v. Wilbur, 144 Cal. 538, 78 Pac. 14, it has been determined that amendments such as proposed in the case under consideration were not proper, and the order of the court requiring such amendments was not warranted; that "it is not necessary in preparing a statement or bill of exceptions for use in this court to give the evidence in full, where the question to be presented is solely as to the sufficiency of conflicting evidence to sustain a particular finding. All that is required is that a sufficient amount of the evidence be inserted bearing upon each side of the question to show a substantial conflict."

[2, 3] And further that where evidence is omitted, which is material and upon which findings are based, all that is necessary is to give so much of the evidence as to each of the witnesses, naming them, as would be sufficient to show in substance all of the evidence bearing upon the questions presented by the findings; that where an appellant presents a mere skeleton bill he cannot complain if the amendments are in general terms. It is not disputed in this case that the expense devolving upon the only solvent litigant in the preparation of the statement amounts to more than one-quarter of the entire judgment. It is obvious from the character of the issues presented upon the trial that the material evidence, or such of the evidence as is necessary to present the case, could be presented in less than 700 pages of typewritten matter.

[4] Aside from the question of expense to the litigants, our Code of Civil Procedure directs the striking out of all redundant matter, that only such of the evidence or other matter necessary to explain the statement, and no more, shall be incorporated, and that the exceptions may be presented as briefly as possible, all of which indicates that it was intended as well that a reviewing court should not be required to go through a mass of unimportant, redundant, and unnecessary matter upon a review of the case. We are of the opinion that our Supreme Court, in Vatcher v. Wilbur, supra, has laid down a rule and guide to trial courts in proceedings of this nature which can be observed and should be observed. If, as alleged by respondent in his affidavit, he has forgotten by reason of the lapse of time many important matters, that difficulty can be obviated by having the reporter read to him the notes taken at the trial, from which the judge may intelligently and properly direct appellant as to the manner and character of the statement which should be prepared and which only he is willing to settle.

For the reasons assigned in Vatcher v. Wilbur, supra, and upon the authority of that case, "we think, therefore, under the circumstances of this case, it was not a proper exercise of the discretion vested in the respondent judge to require a transcription of the full reporter's notes as a condition for settling said statement, and, for that reason, a peremptory writ should issue requiring him to settle the same," and it is so ordered.

THOMPSON v. SAN FRANCISCO GAS & ELECTRIC CO. (Civ. 1,072.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Oct. 17, 1912. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 16, 1912.)

1. ELECTRICITY (§ 11*)—PENALTIES FOR FAILURE TO INSTALL—ACTIONS—ALLEGATIONS OF COMPLAINT.

Civ. Code, § 629, provides that upon application of the occupant of a building distant not more than 100 feet from any direct wire of an electric corporation, and "payment by the applicant of all money due by him," the corporation must supply gas or electricity for such building, and, if it refuses to do so for 10 days after the application, must pay applicant $50 as liquidated damages and $5 a day as such damages for every day the refusal continues thereafter. Held, that a complaint in an action for the statutory penalty is bad on demurrer for not alleging payment by plaintiff of all money due by him to the corporation.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Henry Thompson against the San Francisco Gas & Electric Company.

From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 121 Pac. 937.

Henry Thompson, of San Francisco, for appellant. Wm. B. Bosley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ALL, J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered against plaintiff upon refusal of plaintiff to amend his complaint after an order sustaining defendant's general demurrer to plaintiff's complaint. The action was brought to recover a penalty, in the sum of $1,055, under the provisions of section 629 of the Civil Code, which at the time of the demand set forth in the complaint read as follows: "Upon the application in writing of the owner or occupant of any building or premises distant not more than one hundred feet from any main, or direct or primary wire, of the corporation, and payment by the applicant of all money due from him, the corporation must supply gas or electricity as required for such building or premises.

* * * If, for the space of ten days after such application, the corporation refuses or neglects to supply the gas or electricity required, it must pay to the applicant the sum of fifty dollars as liquidated damages, and five dollars per day as liquidated damages for every day such refusal or neglect continues thereafter." The complaint, among other things, sets forth the making of a demand in writing by plaintiff upon defendant to be supplied with electricity for domestic lighting purposes at apartments occupied by plaintiff (a copy of which demand is set forth in the complaint), and the refusal and neglect of defendant to supply the electricity demanded.

There is no allegation in the complaint concerning the payment of any money due from plaintiff to defendant, nor is there any allegation that no money was due. There is no allegation whatever in the complaint to meet the requirements of the law as to the condition precedent of "payment by the applicant of all money due from him."

[1] This omission is fatal to the complaint. This is true without regard to the question whether or not the Electric Company under the statutes is obliged, upon the demand, to make its service connection, install a meter, and commence the supply of electricity without prepayment for the expense of making the connection or the charge for the electricity to be supplied.

[2] The statute under which the action is brought is penal in its nature. Baker v. San Francisco Gas & Electric Co., 141 Cal. 710, 75 Pac. 342; Smith v. Capital Gas Co., 132 Cal. 209, 64 Pac. 258, 54 L. R. A. 769. The complaint in the present case, unlike the complaint in the case between the same parties, heretofore decided by this court (opinion filed January 12, 1912, 121 Pac. 937), contains no allegation of actual damage, but seeks a recovery simply of the penalty prescribed by the statute. The cause of action in the present case can only be sustained, if at all, as one arising under the statute.

The statute requires as a condition precedent, to entitle the demandant to recover of the corporation, not only that he make the written demand, but that he pay all money due from him. For aught that appears plaintiff may have been indebted to defendant for gas previously supplied at the same premises, or for electricity supplied elsewhere. There is no allegation to the contrary, as was the case in Fair v. Home Gas & Electric Co., 13 Cal. App. 589, 110 Pac. 347.

[3] Penalties are never favored either by courts of law or equity, "Every intendment and presumption is against the person seeking to enforce the penalty or forfeiture provided by such a statute." Savings & Loan Society v. McKoon, 120 Cal. 177, 52 Pac. 305; Irvine v. McKeon, 23 Cal. 472. So strictly must the plaintiff comply with the provisions of a penal statute that it was held, in Baker v. San Francisco Gas, etc., Co., 141 Cal. 711, 75 Pac. 342, in an action under this same statute, that an offer to pay money due was not sufficient, but that if the offer was not accepted, the plaintiff, in order to comply with the requirement for payment, must make a deposit of the amount due in some bank as provided in section 1500 of the Civil Code. "No rule of pleading is better established than that the plaintiff must set forth all that is necessary to enable him to recover. It is therefore well established that, in declaring upon a penal statute, where there is an exception in the enacting clause, the plaintiff must show that the defendant is not within the exception." Mills v. Kennedy, 1 Bailey (S. C.) 17. "There can be no doubt that the plaintiff must in his declaration allege all the facts upon which the statute gives him a right of action." Berry v. Stinson, 23 Me. 140; Ferrett v. Atwill, 1 Blatchf. 151, Fed. Cas. No. 4,747. "And no intendment is allowed in favor of the party for whose benefit the suit is brought." People v. Mutual Life Ins. Co., 72 Ill. App. 569; People v. Fessler, 145 Ill. 150, 34 N. E. 146; Wright v. Wheeler, 30 N. C. 184; Greer v. Bumpass, Mart. & Y. (8 Tenn.) 94.

We think it perfectly clear that, in omitting any allegation in reference to the payment of all money due from him, the plaintiff failed to state facts sufficient to entitle him to recover under the statute, and for this reason the court correctly sustained the demurrer to the complaint.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. H. Hughes, Judge.

Frank Silva was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Inman, of Sacramento, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, of Sacramento, for the People.

BURNETT, J. Appellant bases his claim for a reversal upon four grounds, but there is not sufficient merit in any of them to justify an interference with the verdict of the jury or the judgment of the lower court.

[1] 1. The court refused the following instruction, requested by appellant: "You are instructed that if the defendant be proved of good character as to truth, veracity, honesty, morality, and integrity such good character may be sufficient to create and generate a reasonable doubt of his guilt, although no such doubt would have existed but for such good character." The principle was fully covered by the following instruction, given at defendant's request: "You are further instructed that good character is of importance to a person charged with crime, and you have a right to consider whether the person of good character would be less liable to be guilty of the crime than a person of bad habits and character. The good character of the defendant, when proven, is itself a fact in the case. It is a circumstance tending in a greater or lesser degree to establish his innocence; and it is not to be put aside by a jury in order to ascertain if the other facts and circumstances, considered by themselves, do not establish his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt."

[2] 2. While the trial was in progress, an unusual incident occurred, which appears in the transcript as follows: "Before the jurors left the jury box, a man standing at the left of the defendant addressed the court as follows: 'They have got the wrong girl. It is not Elsie Lopez at all.' The Court: 'Take your seat, sir.' The man standing at the left of the defendant: 'Well, I want to say they have got the wrong girl. I am the father of the girl, and it is not Elsie Lopez. The Court: 'Take this man from the courtroom, Mr. Sheriff.' The bailiff escorted the man from the courtroom." The man's conduct, of course, was reprehensible and explainable only upon the theory that he was drunk or insane. Such declarations in the presence of the jury might, under some circumstances, prejudice the substantial rights of a defendant; but we must presume that the jurors were men of probity and fair intelligence, and that they heeded the earnest admonition of the court: "The case must be decided upon lawful evidence adduced upon the witness stand, and nothing else, and statements which you have just heard from this man are no more evidence than nothing in the world. Discard them from your mind. Act as though you had never heard them." People v. Prather, 134 Cal. 439, 66 Pac. 589, 863; People v. Ruef, 14 Cal. App. 606, 114 Pac. 48, 54.

[3, 4] 3. A certain witness testified as to the good reputation of defendant, and, upon cross-examination, was asked certain questions, over the objection of appellant, tending to reflect upon the latter's moral character. The form of the questions was somewhat objectionable, but that was not called to the attention of the court. The purpose of the questions was to show acts of appellant inconsistent with the character attributed to him by the witness, and they were permissible under the rule laid down in People v. Ah Lee Doon, 97 Cal. 179, 31 Pac. 933; People v. Mayes, 113 Cal. 624, 45 Pac. 860; People v. Moran, 144 Cal. 62, 77 Pac. 1113; People v. Perry, 144 Cal. 750, 78 Pac. 284; People v. Weber, 149 Cal. 342, 86 Pac. 671. Besides, the answers were favorable to appellant; and hence he is in no position to complain.

4. The proposed and refused instruction as to the presumption of innocence involved no principle of law that was not clearly and fully expressed in the following, given at the request of appellant: "The jury is instructed that the defendant at the outset of the trial is presumed to be innocent. He is not required to prove himself innocent, or to put in any evidence at all upon the subject. In considering the testimony in the case, you must look at all the testimony and view it in the light of that presumption; and it is a presumption that abides with him throughout the trial of the case until the evidence convinces you to the contrary beyond all reasonable doubt. It is your duty, if possible, to reconcile the evidence with this presumption."

We find no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

MILLS v. STUMP et al. (Civ. 986.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 15, 1912.)

1. HOMESTEAD (§ 1*)—DEFINITION—NATURE.

The homestead is the creation of statute created for the benevolent purpose of furnishing a home for the persons for whom the law awards it, and in its enjoyment is made a sanctuary against execution creditors and should be against any other form of hostile attack.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

2. PARTITION (§ 12*)—HOMESTEAD—TENANCY IN COMMON.

Where a widow was given a homestead for life in 25 acres of a tract of 320 acres and also an undivided one-third of the whole, she held the homestead separate and distinct from her interest as a cotenant, and not as a "cotenant, joint tenant or tenant in common" within Code Civ. Proc. § 752, relating to partition, and the homestead cannot be partitioned without her consent, because possession cannot be taken from her, but she can compel a partition of the remaining 295 acres.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 38-51; Dec. Dig. § 12.*]

3. PARTITION (§ 14*) — NATURE — OBJECT — POSSESSION.

The object of partition is to enable cotenants to enjoy possession in severalty, but is not intended to try title to land, and hence where possession in severalty cannot be given as a result of a partition, there is no necessity for making it.

4. PARTITION (§ 12*) — HOMESTEAD — STATUTES.

Code Civ. Proc. § 752, was not intended to authorize the partition of the homestead interest during its enjoyment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Action by Aurelia C. Mills against Winnie Mills Stump and another. Decree for plaintiff and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

T. J. Geary, of Santa Rosa, for appellants. W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. John Mills in his lifetime was the owner as his separate property of two parcels of adjoining land of 160 acres each. In the administration of his estate the court set apart to plaintiff, his surviving widow, 25 acres on the northerly end of the entire tract, including thereon the dwelling house and other improvements which had been used and occupied by the family in farming the land. By a decree of distribution the entire tract of 320 acres was distributed, in undivided shares of one-third each, to plaintiff and defendants, as tenants in common, subject to said homestead. Plaintiff entered into occupancy of the homestead, and ever since has been in the enjoyment thereof.

The complaint is for a partition of 295 acres, leaving the 25-acre homestead undisposed of. Defendants resisted, claiming that the entire tract should be partitioned in the action, and, if the homestead stood in the way as an impediment, the entire estate should either be sold and the proceeds divided, or, if partition of the whole cannot be made, the complaint should be dismissed or the consideration of the action postponed until such time as just and suitable partition can be made. The court entered its interlocutory decree as prayed for in the complaint.

The question in the case is thus stated by appellants: "Can one cotenant compel partition of a portion of a common holding against the wishes of his cotenant? If he can, then the judgment should be affirmed; otherwise, the decree herein should be reversed." Section 752 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides as follows: "When several cotenants hold and are in possession of real property as parceners, joint tenants, or tenants in common, in which one or more of them have an estate of inheritance, or for life or lives, or for years, an action may be brought by one or more of such persons for a partition thereof according to the respective rights of the persons interested therein, and for a sale of such property, or a part thereof, if it appears that a partition cannot be made without great prejudice to the owners." Section 759 provides that: "The rights of the several parties, plaintiff as well as defendant, may be put in issue, tried and determined in such action," etc. Section 764 provides that: "In making partition, the referees must divide the property, and allot the several portions thereof to the respective parties, quality and quantity relatively considered, according to the respective rights of the parties as determined by the court, pursuant to the provisions of this chapter," etc.

[1] The homestead interest in land is the offspring of statute, created for the humane and benevolent purpose of furnishing what its designation indicates—a home for the persons for whom the law awards it, and in its enjoyment it is by law made a sanctuary against execution creditors and should be against every other form of hostile attack.

[2] In the present case the homestead having been carved out of the husband's separate estate was decreed to plaintiff for her sole use during her natural life. But plaintiff does not hold this interest as parcenary, joint tenant, or tenant in common. While it partakes of some of the attributes of a joint tenancy, it is not such an interest in strict legal sense nor in the sense the term is used in the statute. It is not by virtue of her homestead interest that plaintiff brings the action, but as a tenant in common of the land with defendants. Her homestead interest is of such character as of itself to be incapable of partition. "The purpose of a homestead is to secure a home to each and all those clothed with a homestead right—to each and all of them; and the power of a stranger to enter into possession of the land, and, as a tenant in common to interfere with its occupancy and control by the homestead claimants and have it partitioned, or sold, if division be impracticable, would be inconsistent with the very nature of a homestead and violative of the very purpose for which a homestead is created." Moore v. Hoffman, 125 Cal. 90, 57 Pac. 769, 73 Am. St. Rep. 27. The tenants in common of the land in question hold subject to the homestead right and have no right of possession and the court can give them no right of possession of the portion impressed with the homestead by virtue of their tenancy in common. It is held by plaintiff by title distinct from that held by her and her cotenants as tenants in common of the fee. "It is the prevailing rule that the widow is entitled to a homestead as well against the heirs as against the creditors of her deceased husband, and that during the continuance of her right of occupancy there can be no partition of the homestead at the suit of the heirs, and this though there are no creditors." Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 699; 29 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 1162. "Lands occupied as a homestead may well be regarded as subject to a trust imposed by law which would necessarily be defeated by partition. It must therefore be denied, although the title is vested in two or more persons, as long as they or any of them remain entitled to occupy the property as a homestead." 30 Cyc. 187. Mr. Freeman states the rule as follows: "The homestead cannot be partitioned against the objection of the surviving wife, on the application of the other heirs, and after the decease of the husband. She has the right, at least as long as she resides on the premises with her family, or with any minor children of the family, to occupy and enjoy the whole homestead. The heirs cannot curtail this right by compelling her to submit to a partition of the premises, and to confine her subsequent enjoyment to the portion assigned to her." Freeman on Cotenancy and Partition, § 60.

[3] The Supreme Court said in Gates v. Solomon, 35 Cal. 593 (95 Am. Dec. 139): "The whole scope and tenor of the provisions of the act relating to partition show that the intention was to make the one judgment of partition final and conclusive on all persons interested in the property or any part of it of whom the court could acquire jurisdiction and not permit the matter to be taken up in piecemeal, and accordingly provision is made for bringing in not only joint tenants and tenants in common in the whole or any part of the property, but those having future rights or estates for life or years and those holding liens by mortgage, judgment or otherwise, and power is given to the court to try and determine the rights of all the parties to the action." See, also, Sutter v. San Francisco, 36 Cal. 112, 116. While this is the general rule, and must be applied in all cases where compulsory partition may properly be ordered, it is not an inflexible rule governing all cases, nor do we think it should be applied in a case such as is here presented. The object of partition is to enable the cotenants to enjoy the possession in severalty, and not to be compelled to submit to joint possession. Partition does not try, nor is it intended to try, title to land. Hence, where possession cannot be effected as a result of the partition, there is no necessity for making it. Indeed, it might result in injustice and wrong to compel it, where the land is subject as here to a homestead. The value of the land thus held might greatly change before the termination of the life estate. Suppose the entire 320 acres in the present case were so divided that the 25-acre tract should form a part of one of the three allotted shares on some basis of the present worth of the homestead estate. There are valuable improvements on this land now which might in the ensuing years be destroyed by fire or other calamity. Or, if the homestead continued for a considerable time, improvements might greatly depreciate in value. The life tenant would not be under any obligation to make good any loss by fire or by deterioration. It would inevitably fall upon the cotenant to whom this particular portion had fallen. Suppose, in a division now made, it should be determined that this 25-acre tract with its improvements has a value equal to an undivided one-half of the remaining 295 acres; that a fair and just partition at this time would be to allot this 25-acre tract as equivalent to one-third of the whole and the remaining 295 acres to be equally divided between the other two cotenants. It can readily be seen that the cotenant to whom the 25-acre tract should happen to be allotted would stand to suffer by any loss or depreciation in the improvements. We can see no way by which the court could in its decree provide against such a possible contingency, for the widow has an absolute right to the possession and unobstructed and unlimited use of the homestead property during her life, independent of her right as a cotenant. Allotting the portion of the entire tract of which this 25-acre tract might be found to be only a part would not meet the objection since in the matter of partition she has the same rights as the other cotenants, and her right by virtue of the homestead is as separate and distinct as if held by another person.

The power to sell, given by the statute and under the general rule, cannot be invoked to solve the difficulties, for the homestead is of such a nature and was instituted for such a purpose as to forbid its compulsory sale. Once a homestead, always a homestead until it is destroyed in a way authorized by statute, or by its voluntary surrender by the person entitled to it, such person being competent so to do.

It is a general rule prevailing in England without exception, and also throughout the majority of the United States, says Mr. Freeman, that no person has the right to demand any court to enforce a compulsory partition unless he has an estate in possession—one by virtue of which he is entitled to enjoy the present rents or the possession of the property as one of the cotenants thereof. Freeman on Cotenancy and Partition, § 446. Hence, the grantee of a deed in which the grantor reserves the right to remain in possession during his natural life cannot maintain a suit for a compulsory partition. Nichols v. Nichols, 28 Vt. 230, 67 Am. Dec. 699. In that case Dewey Nichols conveyed to the petitioner an undivided half of the farm of which the premises in question were a parcel, and that the other undivided half was, by a separate conveyance, conveyed to the petitionees, reserving, however, in Dewey Nichols the use and occupancy of that portion of the farm during his own life, and that of his wife and daughters; and it appeared that Dewey Nichols and his daughters were still living. The court said: "The effect of these several conveyances was to vest in the petitionees a title in fee as tenants in common to one half of the farm, with the right of its present and immediate possession, and to give to Dewey Nichols a life estate in the other half, with the right of possession during the lives of the persons for whose benefit that reservation was made. * * * The petitioners, under the deed, have no right to the possession, use, or occupancy of the moiety conveyed to them until the determination of the particular estate which the grantor reserves in himself. They have neither the possession nor the right of possession to any portion of the premises during the life of either of the persons for whose benefit the reservation was made. * * * During the life of Dewey Nichols the petitioners cannot be regarded as having a present estate as tenants in common with the petitionees. There is no unity of possession between them, nor can there be, so long as the petitioners have no right of possession. That relation may exist on the decease of Dewey Nichols, and those for whom that reservation was made, but not until then." Numerous cases are cited in support of the principle on which the decision rested. An application of this doctrine is found in the case of remaindermen and reversioners by which they are prevented from enforcing partition. Speaking of the remaindermen, in Sullivan v. Sullivan, 66 N. Y. 37, the court said: "Any partition which might be made at his instance, although equal when made, might be very unequal when his estate should vest in possession. So, too, if actual partition could not be made, and a sale became necessary, the tenant having a less estate than a fee might be deprived of the substantial benefit of his terms." In Culver v. Culver, 2 Root (Conn.) 278, where a widow was seised of a life estate, with a remainder to those persons who were parties to the proceeding in partition, the court said: "It will be time enough for them to have partition of the lands when they shall have the possession and the title."

[4] Section 752 of the Code of Civil Procedure was not intended to authorize the partition of the homestead interest during its enjoyment.

It is not contended that the 295 acres may not be equitably partitioned at this time, so far as any physical difficulties stand in the way. The evidence was, and the court found, that it is capable of being equally divided among the cotenants. Defendants introduced no evidence, and nothing appears in the case to show that the exclusion of the 25-acre tract would work any injury to the parties. There was no evidence addressed to this question. All the evidence was addressed to the single question bearing upon the practicability of dividing the 295 acres. If the situation was such that the partition of the 295 acres could not be made separately from the remaining portion of the tract without great injustice and wrong to the parties or one of them, a different question might have arisen, but the fact should have been made to so appear by the opposing cotenants. No such showing was made or attempted to be made, defendants relying entirely on the general rule that, where partition is sought, it must be of the entire tract of land held in common.

If anything further be needed to confirm the views already expressed, it may be found in an analogy drawn from the right of the wife to dower. Says Mr. Freeman: "When a widow is entitled to dower by virtue of her late husband having had a sole seisin in the premises, her right, as we have before stated, is generally regarded as paramount to the right of the heirs to compel a partition. This is equally true whether a division or a sale be sought. Courts have no authority, unless it is expressly conferred by statute, to compel a widow to accept a certain sum of money in lieu of her dower. She cannot be divested of her dower except by her own act." Freeman on Cotenancy and Partition, §§ 472 and 476. When the character and object of the homestead are considered, the rule is wise, humane, and just, and should have full application.

The decree is affirmed.

An indictment for false pretenses, alleging that complainant was induced to purchase a mortgage from defendant by reason of the defendant's false representations that the mortgage was a first lien on the real estate described, was not defective because based on a statement regarding a public record with which complainant had as good an opportunity to be familiar as defendant; complainant being under no obligation to examine the record.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John Ellsworth, Judge.

J. G. Henninger was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Welles Whitmore and G. G. Kennedy, both of Oakland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was found guilty of obtaining money by false representations and pretenses. He was sentenced to imprisonment for the term of three years in the state prison. The appeal is from the judgment and from orders denying defendant's motions in arrest of judgment and for a new trial.

The indictment charges the defendant with having obtained $1,000 in money from Domenico Lavagetto on the 2d day of March, 1910, by falsely representing that he was the owner and holder of a certain mortgage on real property, which mortgage he unlawfully and feloniously "pretended and represented to said Domenico Lavagetto * * * constituted then and there a first lien and a first incumbrance on the real property * * * described, and was then and there the only lien and the only incumbrance on said property." The indictment then proceeds to set forth three respects in which those representations as to the condition of the property in respect of incumbrances were false. There were several prior liens on the property, but Domenico Lavagetto, says the indictment, believed the representations, and, depending upon them, purchased the mortgage from the defendant and paid him therefor the sum of $1,000.

The defendant moved to dismiss the indictment on the following grounds: "First, that the indictment was not found or indorsed as provided by the Penal Code; second, that the names of the witnesses examined by the grand jury are not inserted at the foot of the indictment; third, a person and persons were permitted to be present during the session of the grand jury when the charge embraced in the indictment was under consideration, other than persons permitted by section 925 of the Penal Code,"—and assigns as error the court's refusal to do so.

[1] Taking up these grounds of the motion to dismiss in their order, there is no merit in the first one. The indictment was indorsed: "A true bill. Henry N. McDonald, Foreman of the Grand Jury." This indorsement was in accord with section 940 of the Penal Code, which provides the manner in which an indictment must be found and indorsed. People v. Lawrence, 21 Cal. 368, 370.

The second and third grounds under the assignment are equally without merit. The names of the witnesses examined before the grand jury were in fact inserted at the foot of the indictment, and the record fails to show that any persons other than those permitted by law were present while the charge was under consideration by the grand jury.

Defendant next asserts that the indictment fails to state a public offense, for the reason that, while it charges him with having sold a certain mortgage, it nowhere refers or speaks of the note or indebtedness secured by the mortgage. Defendant argues that the mortgage without the obligation it secures is of no value, and that therefore any representation with regard to the mortgage or its value was immaterial.

[2] But it is not essential to the commission of the crime defined by section 532 of the Penal Code that the false pretense should be made concerning some property or thing of value. Doubtless the offense is often committed by making false representations concerning matters having no relation to the value of property. In the case at bar the four ingredients necessary to constitute the crime are present. It is alleged that the defendant made false representations concerning the mortgage with intent to defraud the complaining witness, who, as a result of those representations, paid to the defendant $1,000. There was thus a concurrence of all the elements necessary to constitute the crime charged. People v. Wasservogle, 77 Cal. 173, 175, 19 Pac. 270.

In the case of People v. Martin, 102 Cal. 558, 36 Pac. 952, the complaining witness having been led to believe by the false representations of the defendant that a judgment for a large sum had been obtained against her in the state of New York, she, at his suggestion, transferred to him a certain piece of property. No such judgment had in fact been rendered. The representation then concerned nothing of value; still the indictment was held to have stated a public offense.

In the case of People v. Howard, 135 Cal. 266, 67 Pac. 148, it was contended by the defendant that the order under which he had attempted to collect a bounty for squirrels killed was void, and that, therefore, he could not be guilty of attempting to obtain money by false pretenses, because the board of supervisors had no authority to allow the claim. The court in that case held that every element of the crime charged was present, and sustained the judgment of conviction. The court said: "The essence of the crime lies in obtaining the money or property by false pretenses, with intent to defraud, and hence it is that the fact of the illegality of the ordinance is immaterial, since it was the false pretenses used with intent to defraud the county, and not the imperfection of the ordinance, that constituted the crime." See, also, State v. Bourne, 86 Minn. 432, 90 N. W. 1108.

[3] The defendant represented that the mortgage which he sold the prosecuting witness was a first mortgage on the property designated therein, and that it was the only lien thereon, both of which representations were false, and constitute the crime denounced by section 532 of the Penal Code.

[4] Defendant also asserts that the indictment is based on a statement regarding a public record with which the complaining witness had as good an opportunity of being familiar as he; and the argument is made that the indictment therefore fails to state a public offense. There is no merit in this point. The complaining witness' right to maintain even a civil action based upon defendant's fraud would not be prejudiced by a failure to examine the records. "Where the fact represented is one which is peculiarly within the vendor's knowledge and of which the purchaser is ignorant, it is generally held that, although the real fact appears on the public records, the purchaser is under no obligation to examine the records, and his failure to do so does not affect his right of action." 20 Cyc. p. 57.

[5] The indictment need not show that the complaining witness acted as a prudent business man, or, as was stated in the case of People v. Cummings, 123 Cal. 269, 272, 55 Pac. 898, 899: "It is not essential to a conviction that the pretenses must have been such as would probably deceive a person of ordinary understanding. The guilt of the accused does not depend upon the degree of folly or credulity of the party defrauded." The indictment alleges facts sufficiently traversing the representation by the defendant that the mortgage sold to the complaining witness was a first mortgage on the property.

The evidence sustains the verdict, and there were no errors in the admission or rejection of evidence.

The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 870*)—SCOPE—APPEAL FROM FINAL JUDGMENT.

On appeal from a final judgment, the action of the trial court upon motions for non-alleged contract between one B. Maes and defendant for Maes' oranges; and (3) similar alleged contracts between plaintiff's father, J. M. Leavens, and defendant, with respect to oranges, lemons, and grape fruit, the claims of Maes and J. M. Leavens having been assigned to plaintiff. Defendant denied that it ever entered into any of the alleged contracts, claiming that it received all fruit asserted to have been delivered under the same, on consignment to be packed, shipped, marketed, and sold for the benefit of the consignors, and the net proceeds thereof only to be paid to plaintiff and his assignors. These net proceeds did not exceed $775, for which sum defendant offered to allow plaintiff to take judgment. The case was tried with a jury, which, in addition to answering certain special issues submitted, found a general verdict in favor of plaintiff for $1,072.22 on plaintiff's own contract, for $1,039.36 on the Maes contract, and for $16.26 on the J. M. Leavens contract, an aggregate of $2,127.84. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff on such verdict. This is an appeal by defendant from such judgment.

[1, 2] There are also attempted appeals from an order denying defendant's motion for a nonsuit, and two rulings made in the course of the trial refusing to strike out certain testimony, but none of these orders or rulings was an appealable order.

[3] If the trial court erred in any of these matters, its action may be reviewed on the appeal from the judgment, if properly presented by the record.

The only point made by the briefs on this appeal is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict of the jury, and it is only in one respect, a matter essential to any recovery on the theory of a sale, that this claim is made. It is not questioned that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the conclusion that one H. G. Hand, an agent of defendant for certain purposes at least, entered into the alleged contracts with plaintiff and his assignors, purporting to do so on behalf of defendant corporation, that he received the oranges, lemons, and grape fruit, for which compensation is here sought, under said contracts, and that the amount awarded plaintiff by the verdict is correct if such contracts are legally binding on defendant. It may be conceded, too, that the evidence shows without conflict that Hand did not have actual authority from defendant to purchase any of the oranges or lemons, and that his authority to purchase grape fruit limited him to a price not exceeding $3 per 100 pounds, while by his contract with J. M. Leavens he agreed to pay $3.50 per 100 pounds. Plaintiff's theory is that Hand had the ostensible authority to make these contracts of purchase on behalf of defendant, the authority defined by section 2317, Civil Code, as being "such as a principal, intentionally or by want of ordinary care, causes or allows a third person to believe the agent to possess," and that defendant is therefore bound by such contracts. Section 2334, Civil Code, provides that "a principal is bound by acts of his agent, under a merely ostensible authority, to those persons only who have in good faith, and without want of ordinary care, incurred a liability or parted with value, upon the faith thereof," and it is claimed that the evidence was such as to sustain a conclusion that plaintiff and each of his assignors entered into said contracts with Hand, as the agent of defendant, and delivered their property to him as such agent thereunder, in good faith and without want of ordinary care. The answers of the jury to special issues submitted to them on this branch of the case were all in favor of plaintiff's theory, being substantially that either intentionally or by want of ordinary care an appearance was allowed by defendant to exist and be known to plaintiff and each of his assignors that Hand was authorized to enter into and execute such contracts, and that each of them in dealing with Hand as defendant's agent acted in good faith and without want of ordinary care.

[4] It would serve no useful purpose to discuss in this opinion at great length the evidence given on the trial. Bearing in mind the well-settled rules that all conflicts in the evidence were for the jury to determine, and that the verdict must be sustained by an appellate court if there is sufficient evidence, considered in connection with such inferences as may reasonably be drawn therefrom, to sustain it, regardless of the evidence tending to a contrary conclusion, we shall briefly state such of the evidence as, in our judgment, sufficiently supports the verdict.

Defendant corporation, with its principal place of business in Southern California at Los Angeles, has for several years operated packing houses in various portions of the state, at which it received citrus fruits for packing and shipping to market. The evidence warrants the conclusion that while very frequently it did this as agent of the persons from whom it received the fruit, accounting to them only for the net proceeds, it also very frequently bought the fruit outright from the growers. One of its packing houses was at Patton, near the city of San Bernardino, in and about which plaintiff and his assignors resided. In the spring of 1908 Hand was installed as manager of this packing house, and continued in that capacity throughout the transactions involved in this action. He was the sole representative of defendant in that locality, and although Mr. Pinkham, the president of defendant corporation, at times visited Patton and in company with him inspected growing crops in that vicinity, he personally transacted all the business done by defendant at that place. He had an automobile, on which was printed in large letters, "H. G. Hand, Manager for Pinkham & McKevitt," and the evidence was sufficient to warrant the conclusion that Mr. Pinkham, who rode with Hand therein, had full knowledge of this. He had in his possession printed forms of contract for the purchase by defendant of citrus fruits, defendant's name being printed thereon, which forms were furnished him by defendant, and which he used in making his contracts of purchase. During the spring of the year 1908 Hand purchased oranges for and in the name of defendant from plaintiff and from each of his two assignors, Maes and J. M. Leavens, and his contracts in this behalf were recognized as binding by defendant, and the vendors were subsequently paid therefor with checks signed by defendant. During the same time, he purchased in the same way for defendant the oranges of numerous other growers in that vicinity. In fact, the great bulk of the very considerable business done by him for defendant in that locality consisted of the absolute purchase of the fruit, as distinguished from the taking of it on consignment for sale. No question was ever raised by defendant as to his authority to buy as he did during that season. In fact, it is admitted that he did not exceed the authority given him in a single case during the season, and that he had been expressly directed to buy oranges to the extent which he did purchase and authorized to pay the prices he had agreed to pay. By such directions he was expressly authorized to purchase from such persons as he saw fit to purchase from, being limited only as to the amount and price. Two or three of the persons with whom he contracted communicated with defendant at its office in Los Angeles as to his authority to make the contracts proposed, and the testimony as to the response given was such as to warrant a conclusion on the part of the inquirer that whatever Hand assumed to do was all right. Everybody who sold to him received without question from defendant the full amount of the agreed price, and there is no pretense that any one was ever expressly advised by any act or word of defendant that there was any limitation on the power of Hand to bind defendant by such contracts of purchase as he saw fit to make. During the spring of 1909 he made many similar purchases as agent for and in the name of defendant, including those here involved. According to the brief of counsel for defendant, upwards of $20,000 of these were unauthorized, and Hand did not report the same to defendant, but designated the fruit so obtained in his "manifests or car reports" as "consigned fruit"; that is, fruit which was being handled for the account of the grower. Included among these unauthorized purchases were those here involved, with the single exception of the grape fruit purchased from J. M. Leavens. Hand was authorized to purchase that, but his secret instructions limited him to 3 cents a pound, while he agreed to pay 3½ cents a pound. When the market weakened and prices dropped during that season, defendant found itself confronted with the claims of those who had entered into such contracts of sale with Hand, and after investigation paid most of them in full, paid some with a slight discount, and rejected only the claims in controversy in this action.

We are of the opinion that there can be no question that the situation disclosed by the evidence we have stated was such as to reasonably support a conclusion that defendant by want of ordinary care allowed Hand to appear to the growers in and about Patton as having the authority to enter into, on its behalf, such contracts of purchase of fruits as he made. Defendant was engaged in the business in and about Patton not only of taking citrus fruits on consignment for the growers, but also in the business of buying outright such fruit. Hand was admittedly its agent and was apparently in charge of its business in that locality, acting as its sole representative in all that it did—its general manager at that place. He was apparently acting within the scope of a general employment to represent defendant in its business at that place, and such business included not only the taking of fruit on consignment, but also the purchase of fruit. Absolutely nothing was done by defendant to indicate to those with whom he was known to be transacting business that there was any limitation whatever imposed on him. During the whole of the previous season his contracts of the character of those involved in this action were accepted without question by defendant as binding upon it. When inquiry was made as to his authority in two or three cases, the responses were such, construing the evidence in the light most favorable to defendant, as to indicate that whatever he did in such matters was acceptable to defendant.

[5] It will not be questioned, we assume, that, where an agent is by his principal put in charge of a business in a certain locality as the manager thereof, he is clothed with apparent authority to do all things that are essential to the ordinary conduct of the business at that place. If the business consists in large part of the buying of fruit, as we must assume under the evidence it did in this case, he is apparently clothed with authority to buy for his principal. Such acts are within the apparent scope of his employment, and third persons acting in good faith and without notice of or reasons to suspect any limitation on his authority are entitled to rely on such appearances. See Clark & Skyles on Agency, §§ 200, 208, 261.

[6] That the evidence was such as to warrant the jury in concluding that this was the situation in so far as plaintiff and his assignor J. M. Leavens were concerned, we have no doubt. Each of them had sold fruit to Hand as the agent of the defendant during the previous season, and had received the purchase price from defendant. They also had knowledge of the other facts warranting a conclusion that he was invested with full authority in the matter of such purchases. Certain testimony of plaintiff himself given on cross-examination, which is relied on by appellant, is not of such a nature as to compel a conclusion that he had any intimation or suspicion that Hand was limited to such purchases as he was specially directed to make. Nor was there anything in the testimony given in regard to a conversation with Mr. Pinkham relative to Hand not having been authorized to purchase certain lemons, when such testimony is viewed in the light most favorable to respondent, which compels such a conclusion. We have considered all the points made by learned counsel for appellant in support of the claim that neither of the Leavens can be held to have acted in good faith and with ordinary care in their dealing with Hand, and are satisfied that it must be held that the verdict of the jury on these matters has sufficient legal support in the evidence.

[7] As to the grape fruit sold by J. M. Leavens to Hand for defendant, it will be remembered that Hand was authorized to buy, and that the only excess of authority was in agreeing to pay  $3\frac{1}{2}$  cents per pound, when he was limited by secret instructions to 3 cents per pound. It is well settled that such a limitation is not binding on a third person who has acted in good faith, relying upon an apparent general authority of the agent, provided he has exercised reasonable prudence, and the terms and price fixed were not so unusual or unreasonable as to fairly put a prudent man on his guard. See Clark & Skyles on Agency, § 206, c; Mechem on Agency, § 362.

As to plaintiff's assignor Maes, the evidence in the record is not as clear and explicit as in regard to the Leavens on the question of knowledge of the matters held sufficient to show ostensible authority, and the exercise of ordinary care by the vendor in dealing with Hand as the fully authorized agent of defendant. There is undoubtedly enough in the evidence to show his good faith in so dealing. Maes had lived in the neighborhood for 18 years. He had sold his sweet oranges to Hand for defendant in 1908, and received his money therefor from defendant without question. He delivered the oranges so sold at defendant's packing house at Patton, where Hand was in charge as manager. He, of course, knew that Hand continued so in charge of defendant's business up to and including his sale to him in 1909, which transaction was entered into at the packing house. There was nothing to require a conclusion that he had notice of anything tending to indicate any limitation on his authority to act generally in such business as defendant was conducting in that locality, and it is fairly inferable from the evidence as to the extent to which that business included the absolute purchase of fruit that Maes had knowledge thereof. On the whole, we do not feel that we would be warranted in holding that the findings in regard to Maes are not sufficiently sustained by the evidence.

[8] There is nothing in the point that the contract with Maes is unenforceable because not in writing. If as to him Hand was authorized to enter into a contract binding on defendant for the purchase of the fruit, his acceptance of such fruit was a sufficient acceptance by defendant to obviate any objection based on the statute of frauds. Civ. Code, subd. 4, sec. 1624. What we have said also sufficiently disposes of all the points made in regard to the denial of the motion for a nonsuit and the motions to strike out certain testimony.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

v. QUIMBY. (L. A. 2,999.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 900*)—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where, on the trial of an action to quiet title, the original claim of defendant was abandoned, and the cause presented and determined without objection, upon a claim set up in a supplementary complaint, which was filed without objection, and which stated the cause of action actually adjudicated, it will be presumed on review that the cause was commenced on the date of the filing of the supplementary complaint.

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 84*)—SUFFICIENCY TO ESTABLISH TITLE—KNOWLEDGE OF DEFECT IN PAPER TITLE.

The mere fact that a person seeking to establish a title by adverse possession had knowledge of a defect in the conveyance of the property to him would not destroy the adverse character of the possession and render it ineffectual as a basis for title by prescription.

4. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 46*)—CONTINUITY—CHANGE OF USE.

for the purpose of husbandry, pasturage, or for the ordinary use of the occupant, will constitute adverse possession, and subdivision 4, which provides that, where a known farm or single lot has been partly improved, the portion of such farm or lot that may have been left not cleared, or not inclosed according to the usual course and custom of the adjoining country, shall be deemed to have been occupied for the same length of time as the part improved and cultivated, where a person in possession of land and using it for a lumber yard ceased to use it as a lumber yard and removed therefrom a fence and the lumber, but not a building and shed built thereon, and afterwards rented it to a tenant without any disturbance of its possession, and with no intention to abandon possession and claim of title, the vacancy would not be effective to destroy the continuity of the possession so as to render it insufficient to support a title by prescription.

5. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 52*)—CONTINUITY—ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF ANOTHER'S TITLE.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Montgomery & Mullen Lumber Company against Ella E. Quimby. From a judgment for plaintiff, and on order denying a motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Waldo M. York and Denis Evarts Bowman, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Sheldon Borden and George H. Moore, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. This action was begun on June 12, 1906. The complaint states, in the usual form, a cause of action to quiet title to a town lot. The defendant answered on March 1, 1910. Thereupon leave was granted by the court to the plaintiff to file a supplemental complaint, and on March 11, 1910, such supplemental complaint was filed. It alleged that ever since the 19th day of November, 1903, it had been in the open, exclusive, and uninterrupted adverse possession of the lot, claiming title and right of possession against defendant and all others, and had paid all taxes assessed thereon; its claim being founded on a deed from C. R. Davis and wife executed on November 18, 1903, purporting to convey said lot to the plaintiff. Issue was joined on these allegations. The court found that the plaintiff was, and had been ever since November 20, 1908, which was five years after its alleged adverse possession began, the owner in fee of the lot, that defendant had no right or title thereto, and had had none since the last-mentioned date, and that the facts alleged in the supplemental complaint were true. The only point urged is that the finding that plaintiff had gained title by adverse possession is not sustained by sufficient evidence. The original claim of plaintiff that it was the owner of the lot on June 12, 1906, as alleged in its original complaint, appears to have been abandoned by it at the trial, and it relied wholly on the title by adverse possession as alleged in the supplemental complaint.

[1] No objection appears to have been made to the filing of this supplemental complaint or to the presentation and determination of plaintiff's cause of action as therein stated. The appeal must therefore be considered as if the action had been begun on March 11, 1910, and the supplemental complaint states the cause of action adjudicated.

[2] It was admitted at the trial that the defendant in 1888 owned the property subject to a mortgage, the amount of which is not shown; that said mortgage was afterwards foreclosed and the lot sold on foreclosure sale; that the defendant was not served with summons in said foreclosure suit and did not appear therein; that on November 18, 1903, Davis, the successor of the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, executed a grant deed to the plaintiff, purporting to convey to it the said lot; and that plaintiff immediately took possession thereof and has paid all taxes thereon regularly ever since. Mullen, the vice president of the plaintiff, appears to have had charge of the business on behalf of plaintiff. He testified that immediately after taking possession in 1903 plaintiff inclosed the lot with a fence and erected an office building and a small shed on it, and used the lot as a lumber yard for four years; that ever since 1903 it had held possession of the lot either by itself or its tenants; and that he always believed that plaintiff owned the lot and never recognized any other ownership in it. The defendant had not seen the property or paid any taxes thereon since about the year 1900. This evidence is sufficient to establish adverse possession for the period from November 19, 1903, until March 11, 1910, the date of the filing of the supplemental complaint. The plaintiff's title therefore became complete on November 19, 1908.

[3] Mullen testified that at the time of the conveyance from Davis he knew there was a flaw in the title but did not know what it was. It appeared that in January, 1906, plaintiff was informed of the fact that the title of Davis, its grantor, was founded on a sheriff's deed on the foreclosure sale aforesaid, and that the judgment therein was rendered without service of summons on Mrs. Quimby, the original owner. It is claimed that knowledge of this defect in the title renders the adverse possession subordinate to the title of the real owner and ineffectual to gain title by prescription. The testimony of Mullen that he always believed that plaintiff owned the lot and recognized no other title is sufficient to establish the good faith necessary to gain title where the adverse possession is under color of title. The mere knowledge of a defect in the title is not sufficient to destroy the adverse character of the possession. Wilson v. Atkinson, 77 Cal. 492, 20 Pac. 66, 11 Am. St. Rep. 299; Silvarer v. Hansen, 77 Cal. 582, 20 Pac. 136; Kockemann v. Bickel, 92 Cal. 667, 28 Pac. 686; Millett v. Lagomarsino, 107 Cal. 106, 40 Pac. 25.

[4] Another objection is that the possession was not continuous. In December, 1907, more than four years after taking the possession, the plaintiff ceased to use the lot as a lumber yard and removed therefrom the fence and the lumber, but not the building and shed. Mullen testified: "I don't recall how long it remained vacant after that time until our tenant took possession. I don't know. Immediately afterward we rented it." He also said that it remained vacant "quite a long time." During this time there was no intrusion by any other person, or any re-entry by Mrs. Quimby, or any disturbance whatever of the plaintiff's possession of the lot. There was no intention by plaintiff to abandon possession and claim of title, or to discontinue possession. These facts do not destroy the continuity of the possession. It is not essential to such continuity, in every case, that there shall be a continuous personal presence on the lot of some person holding for the adverse claimant. It is enough, under the Code, that it is devoted to "the ordinary use of the occupant" where the possession is under color of title as it is here. Code Civ. Proc. § 323, subds. 3, 4. "A man does not discontinue his possession by locking his house in town or suspending his cultivation in the country, provided he do not suffer the building in the one case, or the fields in the other, to be thrown open; but he is bound to continue a positive appearance of ownership by treating the property as his own and holding it within his exclusive control." Stephens v. Leach, 19 Pa. 265. The ordinary use of a lot of this character with buildings which the plaintiff does not use for his personal use is to let it to others. The plaintiff had erected the buildings, and, when its own use ceased, it let the lot to a tenant who permitted it to remain unoccupied for some time. The buildings were there as a visible sign of its claim and evidence of its continued possession, and there is no evidence that it was ever without the control of the plaintiff. Constant occupancy and use is not always required. It depends on the character of the property and the use to which it is adapted. One who owns a house for rental does not abandon or lose his possession every time it remains vacant during intervals between tenancies. It has been held that one may be in adverse possession of lands suitable only for grazing, although his only occupancy is by pasturing the lands during the grazing season, which included only a part of each year; the land being vacant for several months. Webber v. Clarke, 74 Cal. 17, 15 Pac. 431. See, also, Marshall v. Beysser, 75 Cal. 547, 17 Pac. 644; Hesperia, etc., Co. v. Rogers, 83 Cal. 11, 23 Pac. 196, 17 Am. St. Rep. 209; Jones v. Hodges, 146 Cal. 164, 79 Pac. 869; Webb v. Richardson, 42 Vt. 473; Ewing v. Burnet, 11 Pet. (36 U. S.) 53, 9 L. Ed. 624. Under these decisions, the continuity of the possession was sufficiently established.

[5, 6] Appellant also claims that the continuity was broken by an acknowledgment of her title. It is sufficient to say in answer to this contention that, viewing the evidence most favorably to the plaintiff as we must in support of the finding, the plaintiff merely offered to buy in the defendant's claim in order to clear its title, and that this was after its possession had continued for more than five years. This does not bring the case within the rule invoked. Furlong v. Cooney, 72 Cal. 328, 14 Pac. 12; Frick v. Sinon, 75 Cal. 341, 17 Pac. 439, 7 Am. St. Rep. 177; Cannon v. Stockmon, 36 Cal. 535, 95 Am. Dec. 205.

These comprise the points urged by the appellants. None of them appear sufficient to justify a reversal of the judgment or order.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

An instrument, while in form a proposal by plaintiff to lease to defendant, being signed by both, will be considered as intended as a lease, the right to possession and entry, as well as the time from which rent was to be paid, commencing on the day the instrument was dated and executed; it being described as "this lease," defendant being referred to as "said lessee," it providing for re-entry by the "lessor" if "said lessee shall fail to comply with any of the covenants herein, or shall not make said payments as herein provided," the premises being occupied by defendant as contemplated, and he having paid several months' rent, and this though the parties contemplated substitution for it of a more formal lease.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Improvement Company against Roy Jones. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying motion for new trial, defendant appealed to the Court of Appeals, which transferred the cause to the Supreme Court. Affirmed.

Ben S. Hunter, of Santa Monica, and C. C. Towner, of Los Angeles, for appellant. O'Melveny, Stevens & Milliken, of Los Angeles, and Platt & Bayne, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The justices of the district court of appeal of the Second district, in which this cause was pending on appeal, were unable to concur in a judgment, and, they having given their several opinions in writing therein and forwarded to this court copies thereof, the cause was transferred to this court for determination. The opinion of Mr. Justice Shaw of said district court of appeal, concurred in by Mr. Justice James, in our opinion sufficiently and correctly disposes of all points made by counsel for appellant in their briefs, and we adopt the same as the opinion of this court. The following is a copy of such opinion:

"Action to recover a balance of $1,250 rent claimed to be due from defendant to plaintiff under an alleged lease of property for the term of one year. Judgment went for plaintiff, a corporation, from which, and an order of court denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

"The verified complaint, after alleging that on January 21, 1907, plaintiff leased to defendant the property therein described for the term of one year from said date, at the term rental of $3,000, payable in monthly installments of $250 each, further alleged: 'That said defendant has paid upon said rental the sum of $1,750, and no more, and there is now due and unpaid on said rental the sum of $1,250.' The answer denied the making of the lease, or that there was due and unpaid from defendant to plaintiff the sum of $1,250 thereon, but did not deny the payment by defendant to plaintiff of the sum of $1,750 rental reserved therein. In support of its contention that it had leased the property to defendant, as alleged in the complaint, plaintiff offered in evidence a document as follows: 'Santa Monica, Cal., January 21, 1907. Mr. Roy Jones, Santa Monica, Cal.—Dear Sir: The Pacific Improvement Company will lease to you for school purposes the property known as the Hotel Arcadia, located at Santa Monica, California, for the term of one year, beginning January 21st, 1907, consisting of the hotel building, the grounds adjoining and belonging to the hotel, dressing rooms for surf bathers, barracks or servants' quarters, at an annual rental of three thousand ($3,000) dollars, payable on the first day of each and every month in monthly payments of two hundred and fifty ($250) dollars each. You agreeing to lease said property at said rental, and make payments as above mentioned. We will agree to include all furniture, linen, crockery and tableware, now in and belonging to said hotel necessary to accommodate fifty people, an inventory of said property being taken and made a part of this lease. You to pay for all repairs, renewals and improvements of every character in connection with said leased property, and shall maintain said property, including the grounds, plant and other property in good condition, reasonable wear and tear excepted, and at the termination of said lease as herein provided restore all of said property to said lessor in the same condition as when received, reasonable wear and tear excepted, and you will not make any alterations or additions to said property except after first obtaining the written consent of the undersigned, and if any said personal property shall be destroyed or broken, the same shall be restored of the same quality as the property so destroyed or broken, and the undersigned, or its agents, shall be authorized to enter upon said premises at any time for the purpose of examining the same or of ascertaining whether the terms of this lease are complied with by said lessee, and if said lessee shall fail to comply with any of the covenants herein, or shall not make said payments as herein provided, the lessor may re-enter and take possession of said premises upon demand, and said lease shall at the option of said lessor thereupon terminate; said lessee shall not assign this lease or let or sublet said premises or any portion thereof without first obtaining the written consent of said lessor, and a violation of this provision shall entitle said lessor to re-enter and take possession of said premises and terminate this lease. Should the building at any time be damaged by fire or earthquake or elements to render it untenable, then the lease shall terminate. Yours truly, [Signed] A. D. Shepard. [Signed] Roy Jones.'

"To the introduction of this instrument in evidence, defendant objected upon the grounds: First, that it did not appear to have been signed by said plaintiff, or by any person representing the plaintiff having authority to sign the same, as shown upon the face of the instrument itself; and, second, that the same did not constitute nor purport to be a lease between plaintiff and defendant. Defendant's objection was overruled and this objection, based upon these two grounds, constitute the chief reason upon which he bases his claim to a reversal of the case.

[1] "The instrument on its face purports to be the act of the Pacific Improvement Company, but is signed, not by the corporation, but by A. D. Shepard, a stranger to the contract. Under these circumstances, the question as to whether the contract was that of the Pacific Improvement Company depended upon a fact not disclosed by the instrument, namely, that the signing by Shepard was for and on behalf of the corporation pursuant to authority so to do. It was competent, since the distinction between sealed and unsealed instruments is abolished in this state, to establish the fact, as to which the contract was silent, by parol testimony. See S. P. Co. v. Von Schmidt Dredge Co., 118 Cal. 371, 50 Pac. 650, and authorities there reviewed. An examination of the cases cited by appellant, contra, discloses that the question of agency of the party signing for the lessor was not involved therein, and no evidence offered thereon. Galewski v. Appelbaum, 32 Misc. Rep. 203, 65 N. Y. Supp. 694; Whitford v. Laidler, 25 Hun, 136; Roff v. Duane, 27 Cal. 565. The uncontradicted evidence shows that defendant conducted negotiations with Horace G. Platt and A. D. Shepard for the lease of the property; that the former was attorney and acting president of the corporation, and Shepard the general manager thereof, which fact was at said times known to defendant; that as a result of these negotiations Platt, at the office of defendant, dictated the document to a stenographer who transcribed the same; that Shepard, under Platt's instruction and for and on behalf of the Pacific Improvement Company, signed it; and that defendant paid to plaintiff the rent reserved therein covering seven months of said period of one year. The circumstances and evidence thus conclusively show that Shepard, in attaching his signature to the paper, did so for and on behalf of the corporation, whose general manager he was, and that defendant was fully cognizant that he so acted. The document was shown to be that of the corporation.

[2] "The next point made by appellant is that the instrument is not a lease, but a mere executory agreement to make a lease. The question is one of intent of the parties, and this must be determined by a construction of the instrument taken as a whole. Tiffany on Real Property, vol. 1, § 37; Taylor's Landlord and Tenant, § 38. Thus considered, we find no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that both parties intended the document to constitute a present demise of the premises for a definite term, commencing on January 21, 1907, the date of the execution of the instrument. While in form the document appears to be a proposal addressed to defendant, nevertheless the fair import of the language is that, when signed by the respective parties thereto, it should constitute a lease. The right to possession and entry, as well as the commencement of the time from which rent was to be paid, was contemporaneous with the date of the instrument. There is much in the document that shows that it was regarded as a present demise of the premises. For instance, it is described as 'this lease,' and defendant referred to as 'said lessee,' and it is provided therein that, 'if said lessee shall fail to comply with any of the covenants herein, or shall not make said payments as herein provided, the lessor may re-enter and take possession of said premises upon demand,' and further that 'said lessee shall not assign this lease.' Moreover, while the testimony tends to prove that the parties contemplated substituting for this instrument a more formal lease, nevertheless the execution of the document, as shown by the uncontradicted testimony of Platt, was intended to conclude the lease between the parties, so that Mr. Jones could take immediate possession of the property; the contemplated execution of the formal lease being deemed a matter of mere convenience. The property was leased for school purposes, and the evidence shows that it was occupied by the military school as contemplated by the parties. No other lease was ever executed. Furthermore, defendant by answer admits that he paid seven months' rent upon the lease—a fact wholly inconsistent with the theory that such sum was paid by him and received by plaintiff merely upon an executory contract that at some future time plaintiff would lease to him the property for one year from January 21, 1907. The occupation and use of the premises was for the purposes specified in the contract, viz., 'the military school Mr. Jones was speaking of,' and, as said in Cheney v. Newberry, 67 Cal. 125, 7 Pac. 444, 'payment and receipt of the rent was only consistent with a recognition by lessor as well as lessee that the lease was in force.' Actual entry by defendant under the contract would be a circumstance merely tending to establish the fact that the instrument was a lease, but conceding, as claimed by appellant, that the evidence fails to show entry, nevertheless he had the right to enter, which right was recognized by plaintiff in accepting the rental."

For the reasons stated, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

SEWELL v. PRICE et al. (L. A. 2,995.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 30, 1912.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 241*)—ACTIONS TO SET ASIDE—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT.

Although, under Civ. Code, § 3439, providing that transfers with intent to defraud creditors are void against creditors, and section 3441, providing that a creditor can avoid the act or obligation of his debtor for fraud only where the fraud obstructs the enforcement by legal process of his right to take the property transferred, a creditor not having a specific lien on the property cannot attack a fraudulent transfer until the recovery of judgment, it is not necessary that such judgment should have become final by affirmance on appeal, or by the lapse of the time within which to appeal; and the actual taking of an appeal does not prevent the bringing of the action, unless an undertaking to stay execution is given.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 910*)—ADMISSIBILITY IN EVIDENCE.

As a general rule, until a judgment becomes final by affirmance, or by the lapse of the time within which to appeal, it is not admissible in evidence, and cannot be relied on as the foundation of rights declared in it.

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 237*)—ACTIONS TO SET ASIDE—NATURE OF REMEDY.

A judgment creditor's bill to subject to the payment of his judgment property fraudulently transferred by the judgment debtor is not an action on the judgment, but is one for equitable relief against an obstruction preventing him from satisfying his claim by execution.

The trial court's failure to find on an issue was not reversible error, unless a finding in appellant's favor would have entitled him to a more favorable judgment.

8. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§§ 263, 308, 310*)—ACTIONS TO SET ASIDE—FRAUDULENT INTENT.

9. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 310*)—ACTIONS TO SET ASIDE—FINDINGS.

A finding that a judgment debtor, with the purpose of concealing his property and defrauding his creditors, and particularly the plaintiff, without any consideration, transferred property to his wife was a sufficient finding of fraudulent intent.

10. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 310*)—ACTIONS TO SET ASIDE—FINDINGS.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. R. Hervey, Judge.

Action by J. M. Sewell against Mary L. Price and others. From the judgment, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John E. Daly, of Long Beach, for appellants. Wm. J. Variel and J. Vincent Hanon, both of Los Angeles, and F. A. Knight, of Long Beach, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This action was brought to set aside certain conveyances and transfers of real and personal property claimed to have been made by the defendant W. R. Price to Mary L. Price, his wife, for the purpose of defrauding his creditors. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal on the judgment roll alone.

The complaint was in four counts; each applying to a different item of property. Common to all four counts are the allegations that the defendants W. R. and Mary L. Price are husband and wife; that on November 4, 1909, a judgment was duly rendered and entered in the superior court of Los Angeles county in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant W. R. Price for $7,728.18, and costs amounting to $101.70; that said judgment is still in full force and effect and entirely unpaid, except to the extent of $5.55, realized by the levy of an execution issued upon said judgment against the property of W. R. Price and returned by the sheriff unsatisfied, except in said sum of $5.55. It is alleged that W. R. Price has no property, other than set out in the complaint, out of which plaintiff's execution could be satisfied, with the exception of 1,400 shares of the stock of the "Building Association of the Society of the New or Practical Psychology," standing in the name of one Clinton Johnson; that this stock, as plaintiff alleges on information and belief, was put in Johnson's name for the purpose of defrauding creditors of said defendant W. R. Price; and that, unless the property described in the respective counts of the complaint can be applied to the payment of the judgment, the same must remain unpaid.

In addition, the first count alleges that "after perpetrating the fraud upon the plaintiff herein, which was the basis of the action upon which plaintiff recovered judgment, as aforesaid, to wit, on or about the 20th day of January, 1909, and for the purpose of concealing his property and defrauding his creditors, and particularly the plaintiff herein, the said W. R. Price, without any consideration, assigned to Mary L. Price, his wife, two hundred forty-five (245) shares of the capital stock of the 'Building Association of the Society of the New or Practical Psychology,' which belongs to him, and the said stock still stands in the name of the said Mary L. Price, and she falsely pretends that she is the owner of said property as her separate property; that the reasonable market value of said shares is the sum of $2,-450."

It is further alleged in said first count that Mary L. Price has threatened to transfer said capital stock, and will transfer it, unless restrained by an order of the court.

The second count alleges, in terms similar to those contained in the first, an assignment by W. R. Price to his said wife of all his interest in and to a deposit in the Citizens' Savings Bank of Long Beach. The judgment, however, gives no relief with reference to this deposit, and this count, therefore, requires no further notice.

The third count alleges a similar transfer by W. R. Price to his wife of lot 17 of the Holloway tract, situated in the city of Long Beach.

The fourth count sets forth a like transfer of the north 50 feet of lot 4 and the east 75 feet of the south 100 feet of said lot in block 5 of the city of Long Beach. With reference to the last-described property, it is further alleged that after the transfer to her the defendant Mary L. Price, "for the further purpose of deceiving the creditors of W. R. Price, * * * executed a mortgage of said property to the defendant Hannah Cushing to secure the payment of a promissory note for $7,000," payable five years after date. It is alleged that said mortgage was without consideration, and was given for the purpose of delaying and defrauding the creditors of W. R. Price.

The defendants answered separately, denying the material allegations of the complaint. In addition, the answer of Mary L. Price alleges that on the 4th day of December, 1908, three days after the date upon which the property described in the fourth count is alleged to have been transferred to her, she filed a homestead on said property in due form, which homestead was duly recorded, "and that the same is now a perfect, valid homestead on said property," subject to the mortgage of Hannah Cushing.

The findings were in favor of the plaintiff, and followed the allegations of his complaint, except, as already indicated, with reference to the second count, and except, further, that the court found that the mortgage executed by Mary L. Price to Hannah Cushing was not made without consideration, and was not made for the purpose of delaying and defrauding the creditors of W. R. Price. It should also be noted that, while the complaint alleges the transfer by W. R. Price to his wife of the north 50 feet of lot 4 and the east 75 feet of the south 100 feet of said lot in block 5 of the city of Long Beach (this being the property described in the fourth count), the court finds that the transfer was of a one-half interest in said property. It also found that on the 4th day of November, 1908, the defendant Mary L. Price filed a homestead on the last above described property, which homestead was recorded as alleged in her answer.

The judgment is that the 245 shares of the capital stock of the Building Association of the Society of the New or Practical Psychology be declared to be the property of W. R. Price, and the transfer of the same to Mary L. Price is adjudged to have been fraudulent and void. A like adjudication is made regarding lot 17 of the Holloway tract. With reference to the property in lot 4 of block 5, described in the fourth count, it is adjudged that the transfer of a one-half interest therein be declared fraudulent and void, and that Price be declared the owner of said property, "subject to the homestead rights filed on the same by Mary L. Price," and subject to the Cushing mortgage. It is further ordered and adjudged that the defendant Mary L. Price be enjoined and restrained from transferring or conveying the 245 shares of the capital stock of the building association.

[1, 2] The first point made by the appellants is that the complaint and the findings are insufficient to sustain the judgment in favor of the plaintiff, for the reason that they do not show that the judgment for $7,728.18 and costs recovered by the plaintiff against Price is a final judgment. It was not necessary to allege or prove this fact. The general rule undoubtedly is that until a judgment becomes final by affirmance on appeal, or by the lapse of the time within which an appeal might be taken, such judgment is not admissible in evidence, and cannot be relied upon as the foundation of rights declared in it. Feehey v. Hinckley, 134 Cal. 467, 66 Pac. 580, 86 Am. St. Rep. 290, and cases cited. But the rule has no application to the case at bar. The present action is of the kind commonly known as a creditor's bill. Its purpose is to apply to the satisfaction of the creditor's demand property of the debtor, which was transferred by such debtor with intent "to delay or defraud any creditor or other person of his demands." Civ. Code, § 3439. Section 3441 of the Civil Code provides that "a creditor can avoid the act or obligation of his debtor for fraud only where the fraud obstructs the enforcement, by legal process, of his right to take the property affected by the transfer or obligation." Consequently it is universally held that a creditor is not in a position to attack a transfer for fraud, unless he has a specific lien upon the property transferred, or has reduced his claim against the debtor to judgment. The rule is thus stated in Brown v. Campbell, 100 Cal. 635, 35 Pac. 433, 38 Am. St. Rep. 314, quoting from Bump on Fraudulent Conveyances (2d Ed.) p. 522: "A creditor cannot be said to be delayed, hindered, or defrauded by any conveyance until some property out of which he has a specific right to be satisfied is withdrawn from his reach by a fraudulent conveyance. Such specific right does not exist until he has bound the property by judgment, or by judgment and execution, as the case may be, and has shown that he is defrauded by the conveyance in consequence of not being able to procure satisfaction of his debt in a due course of law."

[3] The bill maintained by a judgment creditor to subject to the payment of his demand property fraudulently transferred by the debtor is not, strictly speaking, an action upon his judgment. It is really an action for equitable relief against the obstruction caused by a transfer, which hinders him in satisfying his claim by the ordinary process of law; that is to say, by an execution. If, then, he has put himself in a position to levy execution, he has done everything necessary to enable him to attack the transfer which hinders his enjoyment of his right. The fact that the time for appeal has not expired does not prevent the issuance or the levy of execution under a money judgment; nor is the right to have execution affected by the fact that an appeal is actually taken, unless an undertaking to stay execution has been given. It must accordingly be held that, in the absence of such undertaking, a plaintiff who has recovered judgment may maintain a creditor's bill, notwithstanding the fact that the time for an appeal has not expired, or an appeal has actually been taken and is pending. Such was the ruling of the District Court of Appeal for the First Appellate District, in Jenner v. Murphy, 6 Cal. App. 435, 92 Pac. 405, and we are cited to no authority holding to the contrary.

[4] The further objection is made that the court failed to find upon the title or ownership of one-half of the property described in the fourth count. It is true that the complaint alleges a transfer of the entire property, and that the finding refers only to a one-half interest. But we cannot see that the appellants are in any way injured by the fact that only one half of the property described in the fourth count is declared to be subject to the plaintiff's demand, or that a finding regarding the other half interest, even though it had been in favor of appellants, would have authorized a judgment more favorable to them. If the further finding would not have had this effect, its absence affords no ground for reversal. Windhaus v. Bootz, 92 Cal. 617, 28 Pac. 557.

[5-7] The appellants argue that, since, under our decisions, a homestead cannot be selected or claimed on lands owned by the claimant as a tenant in common or joint tenant (Schoonover v. Birnbaum, 143 Cal. 548, 83 Pac. 999), the effect of setting aside the transfer of an undivided one-half of the property from W. R. Price to his wife is to invalidate the homestead claimed by her. But the rule does not apply where the joint or common tenancy is that of husband and wife (Swan v. Walden, 156 Cal. 195, 103 Pac. 931, 134 Am. St. Rep. 118, 20 Ann. Cas. 194), which, in the absence of anything to the contrary, we must, in support of the judgment, presume to be the condition here. And, beyond all this, the judgment expressly makes the title of W. R. Price subject to the homestead filed by his wife. Here is an express adjudication of the validity of the homestead. The plaintiff is not appealing, and the defendant Mary L. Price may therefore rest with security upon the adjudication that her homestead is valid. In this respect the judgment is in her favor, and she is not in a position to attack it because, in her opinion, the court founded its conclusion upon insufficient premises.

[8, 9] The contention that the court did not make any finding of intent to defraud on the part of W. R. Price is not sustained by the record. We have already quoted the allegations of the complaint, and these allegations are, as to each count, carried into the findings. Thus, taking the first count as an example, it is alleged and found that on or about the 20th day of January, 1909, "and with the purpose of concealing his property and defrauding his creditors, and particularly the plaintiff herein, the said W. R. Price, without any consideration, assigned to Mary L. Price, his wife, 245 shares of the capital stock of the building association," etc. It is true that in cases arising under section 3429 of the Civil Code the question of fraudulent intent is one of fact and not of law (Bull v. Bray, 89 Cal. 286, 26 Pac. 873, 13 L. R. A. 576), and the fact must accordingly be alleged and found. But here is a finding which declares in terms that the transfer was made for the purpose of concealing the debtor's property and defrauding his creditors. Nothing more is required.

[10] It is suggested that the findings are not sufficient to show that the 1,400 shares of stock put in the name of Clinton Johnson were fraudulently transferred to him. He was not a party to the action. The only purpose of mentioning the stock in his name was to show that the judgment debtor did not have property, other than that involved in the suit, out of which plaintiff's execution might be satisfied. If that stock had been fraudulently transferred to Johnson, the plaintiff was prevented from effectually seizing it by execution; and the fact that the stock remained liable for Price's debts was no obstacle to plaintiff's pursuing the property involved in this action. On the other hand, if the transfer to Johnson was bona fide and vested the title to the stock in him, the plaintiff could not, under any circumstances, pursue such stock, and was for that reason in a proper position to attack the transfers made by Price to his wife. In any event Johnson, not being a party to this action, could not, of course, be affected by any judgment rendered herein, even if the court had undertaken to make an adjudication regarding the stock held by him. But this, as we have seen, it did not do. The judgment contains nothing which concludes anybody with reference to this stock.

[11] Upon the oral argument herein, and by supplemental brief filed after the hearing, the appellants suggest that since the taking of this appeal the judgment recovered by the plaintiff, Sewell, against W. R. Price for $7,728.18, upon which the execution mentioned in the complaint herein was issued, has been reversed by this court (Sewell v. Christie and Price, 124 Pac. 713), and it is claimed that by such reversal the foundation of this action has been destroyed. But, in the absence of anything in the record to show such reversal, or to show that the judgment so reversed was the one set up in the complaint in this action, we cannot take notice of the alleged fact. The appellants cite Hollenbach v. Schnabel, 101 Cal. 312, 35 Pac. 872, 40 Am. St. Rep. 57, and similar cases, as establishing the doctrine that courts will take judicial notice of their own records. But the rule is limited to proceedings in the same case. It is well settled that courts cannot in one case take judicial notice of their records in another and different case. 16 Cyc. 918; People v. De La Guerra, 24 Cal. 73; Lake Merced W. Co. v. Cowles, 31 Cal. 214; Ralphs v. Hensler, 97 Cal. 296, 32 Pac. 243.

It might seem, at first sight, that the refusal to here consider the reversal of the money judgment recovered by plaintiff will work an irremediable injury to the appellants. But this is not so. In the first place, the judgment in this case does not direct any seizure or sale of the property involved. It declares that property to be owned by W. R. Price, and thus makes it possible to levy upon it an execution directed against the property of W. R. Price. But, if the judgment against Price has been reversed, no execution can issue thereunder. Furthermore, if the judgment in this action is now affirmed, notwithstanding the present existence of facts which make it inequitable that the judgment should stand, and the failure to make those facts appear is due to no fault of the appellants, it is not to be doubted that adequate relief might be had by an independent action in equity to restrain the plaintiff from taking advantage of the judgment now under review. 23 Cyc. 991.

The judgment is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 30, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 694*)—REVIEW—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

The evidence not being before the court on an appeal on the judgment roll alone, its sufficiency to support the findings cannot be questioned.

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 24*)—LIMITATION APPLICABLE.

A party to an action, in consideration of her attorney's agreement to perform the necessary professional services on the trial thereof and on appeal, agreed in writing to transfer to him one-half of the water rights recovered by her in that action. Pending the litigation, she died. Held, that an action against her heir to compel the transfer of such water rights to the attorney was one for the specific performance of a contract in writing, and hence subject to Code Civ. Proc. § 337, limiting the time within which to bring actions founded on instruments in writing, executed in this state.

An action for specific performance of a client's agreement to transfer one-half of the water rights recovered by her in an action to her attorney in consideration of his services on the trial of the action and on appeal was properly brought within four years from the judgment on appeal in the prior action, since until such judgment the attorney had not fully performed the contract on his part and was not entitled to demand a conveyance.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; F. F. Oster, Judge.

Action by T. E. Archer against Katie Harvey and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

R. E. Bledsoe, of San Bernardino, for appellants. T. R. Archer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The defendants appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff. The appeal is taken on the judgment roll alone. The complaint alleges that on November 21, 1898, Hannah S. Skinner, the predecessor in interest of the defendants entered into a written agreement with the plaintiff, Archer. By the terms of the writing, which is set forth at length in the complaint, Mrs. Skinner, in consideration of services performed for her by Archer as attorney and counsel in a cause entitled B. W. Cave et al. v. George W. Tyler et al., and of further services to be performed "in appealing said cause to the Supreme Court" and presenting it in said court, and the payment of one-half of the costs and court fees of such appeal, agreed to give to Archer one-half part of such water and water rights in a certain cienega as might be awarded to Mrs. Skinner in the aforesaid cause. Archer agreed to faithfully perform the services mentioned and to pay one-half of the costs of appeal in consideration of the one-half part of all said water and water rights. The complaint goes on to allege the performance by plaintiff of all the obligations on his part. It is alleged that plaintiff conducted the litigation in the action of Cave v. Tyler through two trials in the superior court, and two appeals to the Supreme Court; the final decision in said cause having been rendered on the 5th day of August, 1905. By that decision it was finally determined that the interest of Hannah S. Skinner in the waters described in the contract was and is "two inches of water, continuous flow, measured under a four-inch pressure of and from the waters of said cienega." There are further allegations as follows: Pending said litigation, in January, 1901, Hannah S. Skinner died intestate, the owner of said two inches of water, and leaving her surviving two heirs at law, the defendant Katie Harvey, her daughter, and Robert Powell, her son. L. A. Harvey, one of the defendants, is the husband of Katie Harvey. The daughter became administratrix of her mother's estate. During the administration, the defendants acquired the interest of the son, Robert Powell, in said two inches of water, and, upon distribution of the estate of Hannah S. Skinner, the entire estate, including said two inches of water, was distributed to the defendant Katie Harvey. The defendants have ever since owned and held said two inches by such title. The defendant Katie Harvey, as administratrix, was in 1901 substituted in her mother's place in said action of Cave v. Tyler, and thereafter said litigation was conducted by plaintiff under said contract for defendants at their request and with their knowledge and co-operation. Each of the defendants has at all times had knowledge of the contract and of its performance on plaintiff's part. It is alleged that the contract was and is fair and just to said Hannah S. Skinner and the defendants, and that the consideration to be received and actually received for the transfer of the water right was and is reasonable and adequate. No part of said water right has been conveyed to plaintiff, and defendants, notwithstanding a demand by plaintiff, refuse to convey it to him. The prayer is that defendants be required to specifically perform the contract by conveying to plaintiff one inch of said two inches of water. The answer denies many of the foregoing allegations, and in addition pleads that the action is barred by the provisions of sections 336, 337, 338, and 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. On all these issues the findings were in favor of plaintiff, and a judgment was entered directing a conveyance as prayed.

[1] But two points are made by the appellants: First. It is urged that the court erred in holding that the plaintiff's claim was not barred by the statute of limitations. It is difficult to see how this contention can be advanced on an appeal on the judgment roll, in view of the fact that there is a finding that the action is not barred. On such appeal the evidence is not before us, and its sufficiency to support the findings is, of course, not to be questioned.

[2, 3] But, apart from the finding on the statute of limitations, the other facts appearing would not have justified a conclusion that the action was barred. The complaint was filed on the 29th day of July, 1909. The decision of this court, finally adjudicating Mrs. Skinner's water rights, was filed on August 5, 1905, less than four years theretofore. The action was one for the specific performance of a contract in writing, executed in this state. The plaintiff's obligation to appeal the case of Cave v. Tyler and present it in the appellate court was not fully performed until final judgment in that court. Even after the filing of the opinion in August, 1905, a rehearing might have been granted, and plaintiff might have been called upon to render further services. Until complete performance on his part, he was not entitled to demand a conveyance. Bartlett v. Odd Fellows' Sav. Bk., 79 Cal. 218, 21 Pac. 743, 12 Am. St. Rep. 139; Thurber v. Meves, 119 Cal. 35, 38, 50 Pac. 1063, 51 Pac. 536. Under section 337, the only statutory provision of those pleaded by defendant which has any relevancy to the case, the plaintiff had four years within which to bring his action. This period, as we have seen, had not expired.

Norton v. Bassett, 154 Cal. 411, 97 Pac. 894, 129 Am. St. Rep. 162, cited by appellants, has no application to the facts of this case. That was an action to have a trust declared and for an accounting. The defendants were involuntary trustees, having succeeded to the legal title upon the death of a voluntary trustee. It was held that the cause of action accrued and the statute began to run as soon as the title descended to the defendants. The present action was not, like the one in the case cited, brought against the defendants as "dry, involuntary, legal trustees." It was brought to compel the specific enforcement of an agreement to convey real property. Since the defendants were not purchasers or incumbrancers in good faith and for value, the obligation was enforceable against them "in like manner" as it could have been enforced against Mrs. Skinner if she had been alive when the cause of action accrued. Civ. Code, § 3395. That the action was so regarded by defendants is shown by the fact that they pleaded section 337 of the Code of Civil Procedure—a section properly applicable to a suit to enforce a written agreement.

[4] But even if the complaint could be viewed as one to enforce an involuntary trust, the appellants, by failing to plead section 342, the section applicable in cases like Norton v. Bassett, have waived their right to rely on this provision of the statute. Bank v. Wickersham, 99 Cal. 655, 34 Pac. 444.

[5, 6] Second. The contention is made that plaintiff was bound to present his demand for adjudication to the court in which the administration of Hannah S. Skinner's estate was pending, and that he is barred by the decree distributing the water right of the decedent to the defendants. Notwithstanding some uncertainty in earlier rulings, the later decisions of this court are clear to the effect that a decree of distribution has no such effect. The decree under section 1666 of the Code of Civil Procedure "is conclusive as to the rights of heirs, legatees or devisees, but it is conclusive against them only as heirs, legatees or devisees, only so far as they claim in such capacities. * * * It merely declares the title which accrued under the law of descents or under the provisions of the will." Chever v. Ching Hong Poy, 82 Cal. 68, 22 Pac. 1081; Martinovich v. Marsicano, 137 Cal. 359, 70 Pac. 459; Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 156 Cal. 510, 105 Pac. 981. A decree distributing to the heirs is therefore not conclusive against one claiming as grantee from such heirs by an instrument executed after the death of the ancestor and before the decree. Chever v. Ching Hong Poy, supra; Cooley v. Miller & Lux, supra. Nor does it bind third parties who claim an interest adverse to that of the testator or intestate. Theller v. Such, 57 Cal. 447; Bath v. Valdez, 70 Cal. 350, 11 Pac. 724; Barnard v. Wilson, 74 Cal. 512, 16 Pac. 307. It is immaterial, therefore, whether we say that, at Mrs. Skinner's death, the plaintiff owned an equitable interest in the water right (Howell v. Budd, 91 Cal. 342, 351, 27 Pac. 747), or that no interest vested in him until, by performance, he became entitled to conveyance. In the first alternative, he claimed adversely to the estate; in the second, his right was acquired, after the intestate's death, against the heirs. In neither view was his claim affected by the fact that the court, sitting in probate, undertook to distribute the property to the heirs.

The judgment is affirmed.

3. MORTGAGES (§ 38*)—DEED AS MORTGAGE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence, in an action to have an instrument, in form of a deed, declared a mortgage, and released on payment of amount due, held to show it was intended as security for a debt.

4. MORTGAGES (§ 32*)—OBLIGATION—FORM.

The obligation essential to a mortgage need not be in form of a note, but may be an implied promise of the mortgagor to repay money loaned to him by the mortgagee.

5. MORTGAGES (§ 608½*)—REDEMPTION—ACTION—COMPLAINT.

As regards plaintiff's indebtedness being due and payable, it is enough that the complaint, to have a deed declared a mortgage and released, avers plaintiff agreed to repay on a certain past day the sum borrowed, and that only a certain part of it has been paid, from which the legal conclusion that the balance is due and payable necessarily follows.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1815; Dec. Dig. § 608½.*]

6. MORTGAGES (§ 608½*)—REDEMPTION—LACHES.

As regards laches, in delaying action to have a deed declared a mortgage and released, it is sufficient excuse that defendant has repeatedly excused and exonerated plaintiff from obligation to make payment on the indebtedness and requested him not to make further payments.

7. MORTGAGES (§ 608½*)—REDEMPTION—ESTOPPEL.

One who has given a mortgage of lots, in the form of a deed, does not, by assenting to the mortgagee selling one of the lots, estop himself from maintaining an action to have the deed declared a mortgage, and to have the other lots redeemed; nothing being claimed as to the lot sold, except credit for the actual price received by the defendant.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Baxter Todd against Mary L. V. Todd. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

George Beebe, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Carter, Kirby & Henderson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The parties are husband and wife. On June 5, 1895, the plaintiff executed an instrument, in form a grant, bargain, and sale deed, purporting to convey to the defendant a lot in the Victor Heights Tract, in the city of Los Angeles, and 12½ other lots situate in a tract near said city. The complaint in this action alleges that the instrument so executed, although absolute in form, was intended by the parties to be a mortgage to secure the payment of $1,600, loaned by defendant to plaintiff. The agreement of the parties, as the complaint avers, was that said sum of $1,600 was to be repaid on June 5, 1896, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, and if not so paid to be compounded. It is further alleged that on March 1, 1898, the defendant, with plaintiff's consent, sold and conveyed the lot in the Victor Heights Tract to one Deakin for the consideration of $1,000, which was retained by defendant as a payment on the indebtedness above mentioned; that no other payments have been made on said indebtedness. The complaint sets up an offer by plaintiff to pay the balance due, a demand for reconveyance, the defendant's refusal to reconvey, and plaintiff's continued ability and willingness to pay upon receiving such reconveyance. The prayer is for an accounting of the amount due, that the instrument be declared a mortgage, and that defendant be required to reconvey or release upon payment of the amount adjudged to be due. The answer denies the making of any loan, or that the instrument in question was intended to be a mortgage. The defendant alleges that she purchased the property of plaintiff for $1,600, and that the deed executed to her was an absolute conveyance, as it purported to be. She avers that the Victor Heights lot, sold by her, was her separate property. She also sets up the payment by her of certain taxes levied upon the property. The findings were in favor of the plaintiff on the issues regarding the making of the loan and the purpose with which the deed was delivered and accepted. The court found that the defendant sold the Victor Heights lot for $1,000, and retained said sum as a payment on the indebtedness. It is found that the unpaid balance of the indebtedness, with interest, amounts to $2,243.67, and that the defendant paid taxes which, with interest, amount to $196.75. The total sum due from plaintiff to defendant is $2,440.42, and the judgment decrees that on payment of this sum the defendant execute and deliver to plaintiff a satisfaction of the instrument of June 5, 1895, which is adjudged to be a mortgage. The defendant appeals from the judgment, bringing up the evidence by means of a bill of exceptions.

[1-3] The appellant's principal contention is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that the instrument executed by plaintiff and defendant was a mortgage. That a deed absolute in form may, by parol testimony, be shown to have been intended to be a mortgage, is not questioned as, of course, it could not be, in view of the many authorities so holding. A few citations will suffice. Civ. Code, § 2924; Montgomery v. Spect, 55 Cal. 352; Malone v. Roy, 94 Cal. 341, 29 Pac. 712; Woods v. Jensen, 130 Cal. 200, 62 Pac. 473; Holmes v. Warren, 145 Cal. 457, 78 Pac. 954; Couts v. Winston, 153 Cal. 688, 96 Pac. 357. If the deed was intended merely as security for the payment of a debt, it is a mortgage, "no matter how strong the language of the deed or any instrument accompanying it might be." Woods v. Jensen, supra. Although it has often been said that the character of an absolute deed cannot be changed to that of a mortgage except "upon clear and convincing evidence," the rule is well settled that, where there is a substantial conflict, it is primarily for the trial court to determine whether the evidence in favor of the claim of mortgage is clear and convincing. Couts v. Winston, supra, and cases cited. But here we need not resort to this rule to uphold the finding, since the evidence that the deed was given for security for the debt is not only clear and direct, but, in truth, it is without substantial contradiction. The transaction was finally consummated between the plaintiff and one Griffin, the agent of defendant. At Griffin's suggestion, plaintiff executed a deed absolute, and took a paper, signed by defendant, purporting to give to him an option to purchase the lots, within one year, for $1,600, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. Prior to that time the plaintiff had asked the defendant to lend him $1,600, and had offered to give her the lots as security, and she had, after some consideration, agreed to comply with his wishes, and referred him to Griffin for the consummation of the deal. There had been no mention of a sale, or of anything but a loan. On these points the testimony of the defendant agreed with that of the plaintiff. Griffin, too, testified that his instructions from Mrs. Todd were to loan the money on the security of the land, and that nothing was said to him about buying the property. In letters written by Mrs. Todd through a series of 10 or 12 years, she repeatedly spoke of the property as being "mortgaged" or "incumbered" to her, and said that she had "loaned" the money to plaintiff. Other testimony, too, confirmed the correctness of plaintiff's contention. Opposed to it is nothing but the statement of Griffin that, at the time of the transaction, he had been of the opinion that the delivery of the deed would have the effect of a conveyance, if the option should not be acted upon within the year.

[4] The existence of an obligation is, of course, essential to a mortgage. But it is not necessary that the obligation be evidenced in writing, if in fact there was a debt. Hushon v. Hushon, 71 Cal. 407, 12 Pac. 410; Locke v. Moulton, 96 Cal. 21, 30 Pac. 957; Montgomery v. Spect, supra. The money having been loaned to the plaintiff, his promise to repay was implied, and was quite as effectual as would have been a promissory note executed by him. Couts v. Winston, supra.

[5] The appellant contends that the complaint is defective in that it does not allege that the plaintiff's indebtedness is due and payable. But the complaint does state that plaintiff agreed to repay the sum borrowed on the 5th day of June, 1896, and that no part of it, with the exception of $1,000 realized from the sale of a lot, had been paid. This was an averment of facts from which the legal conclusion that the balance was due and payable necessarily followed. In Ganceart v. Henry, 98 Cal. 281, 33 Pac. 92, relied on by appellant, the complaint contained no allegation that the money was agreed to be repaid at a time prior to the commencement of the action.

[6] It is urged that the plaintiff was guilty of laches in delaying his action for over 13 years after the expiration of the time for which the loan had been made. But the complaint states a sufficient excuse for the delay in paying or in seeking to enforce redemption by the averment that the defendant "repeatedly excused and exonerated plaintiff from the obligation to make further payments on said indebtedness, and requested him not to make further payments." The finding in support of this allegation is fully supported by the evidence, which also furnishes other grounds justifying the delay.

[7] We cannot agree with appellant's contention that plaintiff is estopped from maintaining this action by his assent to defendant's sale of the Victor Heights lot to Deakin. Undoubtedly he would be estopped to deny Deakin's title, as is, in effect, held in Wamsley v. Crook, 3 Neb. 344, cited by appellant. But, since he claims nothing with respect to this lot except credit for the actual purchase price received by defendant, we see no reason why his rights in the lots which have not been sold should be held to be impaired. The sale to Deakin was, in legal effect, a sale made with the consent of both mortgagor and mortgagee. It conveyed a good title to the purchaser, and released the mortgage, pro tanto. The authorities cited by appellant are not in conflict with this view.

No other points are presented.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1144*)—APPEAL—PRESUMPTIONS—CONTINUANCE.

Where the record fails to show that accused objected to a continuance, it will be presumed on appeal that he consented, so that, though the continuances amounted to more than 60 days, he is not entitled to a dismissal of the prosecution under Pen. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

John Peter was convicted of an assault with intent to commit murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

S. L. Mash, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was charged with and convicted of the crime of assault with intent to commit murder. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The defendant asserts that the trial court erred in not granting his motion to dismiss the case, on the ground that the defendant was not brought to trial within the time prescribed by section 1382 of the Penal Code. The information was filed on April 12, 1912, and various continuances were had up to June 29th, when the motion to dismiss was made. As to some of such continuances the minutes of the court fail to show that defendant objected to them, or that they were ordered without his consent; they will therefore be presumed on appeal to have been consented to by him. People v. Douglass, 100 Cal. 1, 34 Pac. 490; People v. Ebanks, 117 Cal. 652, 49 Pac. 1049, 40 L. R. A. 269.

[2] Even if this were not true, defendant's point would still be without merit, for the record shows that he consented to all of the continuances commencing with May 17th; in other words, he consented to 35 days out of the 78 days' delay.

It clearly appears that the court had not lost jurisdiction of the case, and properly refused to dismiss the same. People v. Benc, 130 Cal. 159, 62 Pac. 404.

[3] Defendant assigns the admission of certain evidence as error on the ground that it was not proper rebuttal evidence. We think it was correctly admitted as such; but, even if it were not, the defendant having failed to object to it upon that ground at the time it was offered, he cannot now be heard to complain.

The evidence was amply sufficient to sustain the verdict, and we find nothing in the court's charge to the jury warranting defendant's claim that the law was erroneously laid down therein.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; John G. Covert, Judge.

Action by Benjamin G. McDougall against George R. Eaton and others. From an order denying a motion for new trial, defendant L. E. Hall appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. C. Russell, of Hanford, for appellant. Stratton & Kaufman and Stratton, Kaufman & Torchiana, of San Francisco (C. A. S. Frost, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

ALLEN, P. J. Appeal by defendant L. E. Hall from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The action was originally commenced in San Francisco county by plaintiff, an architect, against George R. Eaton, L. E. Hall, and W. D. Trewhitt to recover the expenses incurred in the preparation of certain plans and specifications for the construction of a building, alleged to have been ordered by said defendants under a promise upon their part to pay for the same. The complaint was filed on May 21, 1909. On September 10th following defendant Hall filed a demurrer to such complaint, and at the same time filed an affidavit for change of venue, setting forth the fact that neither affiant nor any of his codefendants were residents of the city and county of San Francisco, but that, on the contrary, both affiant and Trewhitt were residents of Kings county; and at the same time Hall filed proper affidavits of merits, together with a demand for change of place of trial, notice of the hearing of which demand was duly given on the date of filing. Thereafter, on October 25, 1909, service of process in the meantime having been had upon defendant Trewhitt, and he having made default, the superior court of San Francisco county entered judgment against said Trewhitt by default. Subsequently, on November 15, 1909, the superior court of San Francisco county made its order changing the place of trial of the action to Kings county, notwithstanding which order the superior court of San Francisco county, on March 15, 1910, proceeded to hear the demurrer of Hall to the original complaint, and made its order overruling the same, and giving defendant Hall 10 days to answer. Subsequently the papers were transmitted to the superior court of Kings county, and on April 1, 1910, Hall served and filed his answer, denying generally and specifically the allegations of the complaint; and on the 4th day of January, 1911, the action came on for trial in the superior court of Kings county, which court made its findings adverse to defendant Hall, and rendered judgment against him for the unpaid amount due plaintiff. In due time defendant Hall moved for a new trial, which was denied, from which order denying a new trial, he appeals upon a bill of exceptions.

[1] The principal contention of appellant is that the superior court of San Francisco county was without jurisdiction to enter the default of Trewhitt, or to consider and pass upon the demurrer theretofore filed by Hall, and for that reason the order appealed from should be reversed. It may be conceded that, the action being a personal one, and the uncontradicted evidence being that San Francisco was not the proper place for trial, it was the duty of the superior court of San Francisco county to immediately grant the motion for a change of place of trial, upon the granting of which jurisdiction ceased, and that any subsequent action was without jurisdiction and void. But, assuming all of this, appellant made no effort to have the superior court of Kings county pass upon his demurrer on file, and which, notwithstanding the order of the court of San Francisco county overruling it, was still pending for hearing, but elected to answer and proceeded to trial without any determination of the issues of law thus presented by the demurrer. In doing this he must be taken as having waived his demurrer, and cannot be said to have been prejudiced by the unauthorized act of the superior court of San Francisco county; neither does any prejudice appear, so far as defendant Hall is concerned, by reason of the rendition of judgment against Trewhitt.

[2] Appellant further contends that there is no evidence in the record supporting the finding that defendant Hall authorized the preparation of the plans and specifications, or agreed to pay for the same, or any portion thereof. We do find in the record evidence of the fact that the three defendants were engaged in a joint enterprise; that in furtherance thereof all three of the parties agreed that Trewhitt should go ahead and order the plans made. It is true the evidence was conflicting upon this point, but with that we have nothing to do.

It is further contended that under the contract for the preparation of the plans it was agreed that the same should be prepared in a manner so as to permit the construction of a building to cost not to exceed $80,000, and that the plans as prepared contemplated an expenditure exceeding $120,000. Here, again, the evidence is conflicting. There is evidence in the record to the effect that no stipulation was had as to the cost of the structure when the plans were ordered.

[3] Witness Trewhitt was permitted by the court to testify that he and his codefendants were partners in the enterprise. We see no prejudicial error in permitting such evidence, in view of the fact that it was shown that they were jointly interested in the enterprise and expressly authorized Trewhitt, as their agent, to make the contract. The agency of Trewhitt was thus established, and the joint and several liability of the defendants therefor.

An examination of the record discloses no prejudicial error warranting a reversal of the order denying the motion for a new trial; and the same is affirmed.

Charles M. Shortridge and James P. Sex, both of San Jose, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, of San Francisco, for the People.

LENNON, P. J. The defendant in this case was informed against for the crime of murder. Upon his trial he was found guilty of murder in the first degree, and his punishment was fixed by the jury at imprisonment in the state prison for life. Judgment was rendered and entered accordingly, from which and an order denying a new trial defendant has appealed.

No claim is made that the verdict and judgment are not supported by the evidence. The evidence on the contrary shows the defendant to have been justly convicted, and therefore the verdict and judgment must stand unless it shall affirmatively appear from the record before us that the defendant was substantially damaged in his defense by some error or irregularity committed upon the trial in the lower court.

The only points relied upon for a reversal involve the correctness of isolated portions of the trial court's charge to the jury, and the failure of the trial judge and the defendant to accompany the jury upon an inspection of the premises on which it was claimed the homicide was committed.

[1] The attack made upon certain of the instructions of the trial court upon the law of self-defense is hypercritical; but, even if that was not so, the correctness as a whole of the charge to the jury is never to be tested by singling out and assailing, as is done here, individual instructions which, when detached and isolated from the charge in its entirety, may not contain every qualification, exception, or contingency which may possibly arise under the facts of the particular case on trial. The trial court is not required to repeat, qualify, and explain the essentials of the law applicable to the facts of the case in every individual instruction of its charge to the jury; and that charge will ordinarily be held good and sufficient if, as in the present case, it as a whole clearly, correctly and without conflict states the law of the case.

[2] With reference to the jury's view of the premises, the record shows that, after the argument of the case was concluded in the lower court, counsel for defendant requested that the jury be permitted and directed to visit and view the scene of the crime, in order that they might have a more accurate understanding of the distances designated and delineated upon a map or diagram of the premises which was used in evidence during the trial. The district attorney protested against this procedure upon the ground that it was irregular, in this: That its effect would be the introduction of evidence upon the issues involved after the argument of the case to the jury had been completed. The trial court nevertheless granted the request, and thereupon ordered that the jury be conducted in a body in the custody of the sheriff to the scene of the homicide. With the consent of the defendant Detective Ray Starbird was appointed to show the premises to the jury. A deputy sheriff was sworn to take charge of the jury. In his sole custody, and accompanied only by the person appointed to show them the premises, the jury visited and viewed the scene of the crime. It is an undisputed fact, as shown by the record on the motion for a new trial, that neither the trial judge nor the defendant was present with the jury on this occasion. That record further shows that during the short interval of the jury's absence the trial judge and the attorneys for the defendant remained in the courtroom, and that the defendant at his own request was taken to the county jail for the purpose of procuring tobacco, where he remained until the jury returned to the courtroom. The minutes of the trial court show that upon the jury's return further hearing of the case was continued to the following day, when the trial court, without further evidence or argument, proceeded to give its instructions upon the law of the case, and then submitted the same to the jury. The record on the hearing of the motion for a new trial shows further and affirmatively that counsel for the defendant made no request that the trial judge or the defendant be present with the jury upon the view of the premises. No objection was made, either before or after the view, to the failure of the judge and defendant to accompany the jury. From all that was said and done at the time of and subsequent to the making of the order for the view of the premises, the inference is irresistible that all parties understood that neither the trial judge nor the defendant was to be present. At all events, it clearly appears that counsel for the defendant knew that the trial judge and the defendant did not leave the courtroom with the jury, and, if counsel were as watchful of the defendant's interests then as they were after he was convicted, they must have understood that the trial judge neither understood nor intended that either he or the defendant should be present with the jury during the time they were viewing the premises. Upon the return of the jury no objection was taken to the manner in which the view was had; and it was not then claimed nor afterwards shown upon the hearing of the motion for a new trial that the absence of the trial judge resulted in prejudice to the defendant's case. On the contrary, it was affirmatively shown that in all matters the view of the premises was taken in the usual way and in an orderly manner, and that it was as effective and free from outside interference as if the trial judge had been present in person.

Under these circumstances, it must be held that the defendant waived both his right and the trial judge's duty to be present at such view.

[3] It is the law of this state that, in viewing the place at which an offense is charged to have been committed, the jury is receiving evidence; and the right of the defendant to be present, if he demands it, cannot be denied him without committing a serious irregularity. The defendant, however, may waive his right to be present with the jury upon a view of the premises; and, if it can be fairly said that he did waive such right in the lower court, he will not be heard to complain here that he was wrongfully deprived of that privilege. People v. Tarm Poi, 86 Cal. 225, 24 Pac. 998; People v. Tarbox, 115 Cal. 57, 46 Pac. 896; People v. Bird, 132 Cal. 261, 64 Pac. 259; People v. Fitzgerald, 137 Cal. 546, 70 Pac. 554; People v. Mathews, 139 Cal. 527, 73 Pac. 416; People v. White, 5 Cal. App. 329, 90 Pac. 471; State v. Louie Moon, 20 Idaho, 202, 117 Pac. 757; State v. Hartley, 22 Nev. 342, 40 Pac. 372, 28 L. R. A. 33; State v. Lee Doon, 7 Wash. 308, 34 Pac. 1103; State v. Ah Lee, 8 Or. 214; State v. Mortensen, 26 Utah, 312, 73 Pac. 562, 633. The trial judge as a matter of course is an essential part of the court. Obviously there can be no court without the judge; and it is the sworn duty of the trial judge to be present at every stage of the trial, including a view of the premises. It has been held, however, in this and in other jurisdictions, that the duty of the trial judge to be present at a view of the premises may be waived by the defendant. State v. Louie Moon, supra; People v. White, supra; Elias v. Territory, 9 Ariz. 1, 76 Pac. 605, 11 Ann. Cas. 1153. While that is no doubt the case, yet it is apparent that such duty can never be omitted, even with the consent of the defendant, without the likelihood of substantial harm resulting to the defendant, and thereby necessitating the reversal of any judgment which may be rendered against him. Fortunately, in the present case, nothing occurred during the view of the premises which in any wise tended to injure the defendant, and a reading of the whole record discloses that he was fairly tried and justly convicted.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by M. A. Root against Mary Greadwohl. From a judgment for plaintiff and denial of a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. M. Drew and W. P. Thompson, both of Fresno, for appellant. Guy E. Dyar, of Fresno, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment and from an order denying a new trial in an action upon a promissory note, wherein the plaintiff was awarded a judgment against the defendant in the sum of $400.

The note in suit was executed by the defendant to plaintiff's assignors in payment of a broker's commission for the sale of certain real estate belonging to the defendant. As a defense to the action the defendant in her answer alleged in substance that she never contracted to give the note sued on; that she never agreed to pay the money at the time, in the manner, or in the amount specified in the note; that the note did not express the terms and conditions of the real contract between plaintiff's assignors and defendant; that the note was signed by the defendant through mistake and under a misapprehension as to its contents, and, finally, that the consideration for the note had wholly failed before it became due.

The court found generally and specifically that all of the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint were true, and that all of the denials and defenses of the defendant's answer were untrue.

[1] There is no merit in the defendant's contention that the trial court should have found in favor of the defense of a failure of consideration merely because the evidence adduced at the trial showed that the purchaser procured by plaintiff's assignors for defendant's property failed to pay the full purchase price thereof as agreed. The sale of the defendant's property to the purchaser procured by plaintiff's assignors was completed, and the broker's commission earned, when the defendant, after receiving one thousand dollars in cash on account of the sale, gave the purchaser a deed to the property and took his note, secured by a mortgage upon the land sold, for $4,500, the balance of the purchase price. The services of a realty broker are fully performed and his commission fully earned when the sale of the property is completed or when he has procured a purchaser ready and willing to enter into a valid contract of sale upon the terms fixed by the owner. Dolan v. Scanlan, 57 Cal. 261; Gunn v. Bank of California, 99 Cal. 349, 33 Pac. 1105; Brown v. Mason, 155 Cal. 155, 99 Pac. 867, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 328. The fact that the purchaser in the present case subsequently defaulted in his payments of the purchase price of the land sold was no concern of the plaintiff's assignors. That fact could not operate to deprive them of the commissions due for their services rendered in procuring a purchaser for the defendant's land, who was willing and at the time was able to buy the property, and who did actually enter into a valid contract of sale at the price and upon the terms specified by the defendant. After a sale of real property has been completed, the default or insolvency of the purchaser procured by the broker will not defeat the recovery of the latter's commission. Shainwald v. Cady, 92 Cal. 83, 28 Pac. 101; Bendict v. Wilson, 10 Cal. App. 719, 103 Pac. 350.

[2] Upon the issue of the making and execution of the note in suit, the defendant was permitted without objection to give testimony which tended in some degree to show that plaintiff's assignors had orally agreed at the time of the execution of the note to accept $100 in cash on account of their commissions for making the sale of defendant's land, and to wait for the $400 balance due them until such time as the purchaser should make a second payment of $1,000. This testimony was offered and received apparently upon the theory that because of the alleged ignorance, misapprehension, and mistake of the defendant in executing the note, parol evidence was admissible to vary the terms thereof. Counsel for the defendant now insists that the evidence upon this phase of the case is without conflict, and, if this be so, the findings of the court are contrary to the evidence. Counsel for the plaintiff, on the other hand, insist that the evidence upon this, and upon every other issue in the case, is in substantial conflict, and that in any event a judgment for the defendant could not have been rendered solely upon evidence which tended to show the existence of a contemporaneous oral agreement which was totally at variance with the written agreement of the parties as finally expressed in the note.

It will not be necessary for us to follow counsel in their discussion of the rule relating to the admission of oral evidence to vary or contradict the terms of a written instrument, because, in our opinion, the evidence upon the whole case is in substantial conflict upon all of the material issues. The trial court found against the defendant upon the issue as to whether or not the defendant executed the note in suit; and the evidence upon this phase of the case in effect covered the issue as to whether or not defendant knew that she was signing a promissory note rather than another and totally different contract. In the presence of a substantial conflict upon these and all of the issues in the case the findings of the trial court are conclusive upon us and cannot be disturbed.

This we think disposes of all of the points made by appellant that are worthy of serious consideration.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Where a libel was published in Japanese and Chinese, a complaint which sets forth the translation thereof is sufficient because Const. art. 4, § 24, provides that judicial proceedings shall be conducted in English, and Code Civ. Proc. § 426, subd. 2, requires the complaint to contain a statement of the cause of action in ordinary and concise language.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; John Ellsworth, Judge.

Action by Lulu G. Stevens against T. Kobayshi and S. Takeshita. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying their motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Carl E. Lindsay, of San Francisco, for appellants. Fitzgerald & Abbott, of San Francisco, and Charles A. Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action for libel. Judgment went for plaintiff. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

The defendants were the publishers of a daily newspaper called "The Japanese-American News." The complaint alleges that "on the 28th day of January, 1910, said defendants published a certain libel of and concerning the plaintiff, which publication was in Japanese and Chinese figures and characters, and when translated into English reads as follows: 'Now this woman used to be on Harrison street, a Chinese doctor's concubine'; by no means get Miss Stevens to advise; Miss Stevens surely is no good or worthy of teaching; she is not decent; don't wait to see her; keep away; you will make a mistake to go there; do not let Miss Stevens fool you; there is still more to be found out.'" Two points are presented for our consideration.

[1] The article was not set forth in the complaint in the language in which it was alleged to have been published; and defendants' first point is that their demurrer, based upon that ground, should have been sustained. There is no merit in this position. "Judicial proceedings shall be conducted and preserved * * * in no other than the English language." Const. art. 4, § 24. Subdivision 2 of section 426 of the Code of Civil Procedure requires that a "complaint must contain a statement of the facts constituting the cause of action in ordinary and concise language." The Japanese or Chinese language is not ordinary language within the meaning of that provision. See, also, section 950, Pen. Code; People v. Ah Sum, 92 Cal. 648, 28 Pac. 680; 31 Cyc. 78. In 1 Abbott's Trial Brief, p. 460, the author states the law as follows: "An instrument in a foreign language may be pleaded by using, instead of a copy of the original, a correct translation, alleging it to be such." In Christenson v. Gorsch, 5 Iowa, 374, it is said: "The pleadings in courts should be in the English language; and in declaring upon a contract in German it is not necessary to attach a copy in such foreign language." While it may not, according to Lambert v. Blackman, 1 Blackf. (Ind.) 59, satisfy the practice requiring a literal copy, it is still equivalent to pleading the legal effect. In Butts v. Long, 94 Mo. App. 687, 68 S. W. 754, it is held that it is sufficient to recite the English meaning of the foreign language alleged to be slanderous.

[2] The translation admitted in evidence differed in some respects from the translation of the published matter alleged in the complaint; and defendants assert that their objection based on that difference should have been sustained. The only portion of the published article relied upon by the plaintiff was the part in italics, and the only difference between this portion and the corresponding portion of the translation admitted in evidence was that in the one case the word "mistress" was used, and in the other the word "concubine" was employed; but as the evidence further disclosed that this difference arose from the translation of the Japanese word "mekake" which might be rendered in either manner, the point cannot be held well taken.

[3] It was not necessary for the plaintiff to prove all the words alleged. She proved enough to establish her cause of action, and that is sufficient. 25 Cyc. 444, 447; Townsend on Libel and Slander (4th Ed.) § 365; *Fleet v. ## 1. WITNESSES (§ 389*) — IMPEACHMENT — FOUNDATION.

2. WITNESSES (§ 388*) — IMPEACHMENT — INCONSISTENT STATEMENTS — FOUNDATION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2052, providing that a witness may be impeached by previous inconsistent statements, but the statements must first be related to him, with the circumstances of times, places, and persons present, and he must be asked whether he made such statements, questions whether the witness made inconsistent statements in the presence of a number of deputy sheriffs, naming two of them, is a sufficient foundation for the admission of inconsistent statements made in a conversation with a sheriff.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 798*) — INSTRUCTIONS — REASONABLE DOUBT.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1173*) — APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Hajara Singh and Kaesar Singh were convicted of robbery, and from a judgment and an order denying their motion for new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

Lewis H. Smith, of Fresno, for appellants.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

LENNON, P. J. The defendants in this case were convicted of the crime of robbery, and have appealed to this court from the judgment, and from an order denying them a new trial.

The alleged error of the trial court in the admission of evidence, and the refusal to give certain requested instructions, are the only points presented and discussed in support of the appeal.

[1] The defendant Hajara Singh was called and testified as a witness in his own behalf. Upon direct examination he testified that he was at the place where the robbery occurred on the day that it was charged to have been committed. Upon cross-examination he was asked if he did not state, in the presence of several deputy sheriffs, on the day that he was arrested and brought into the sheriff's office, that he was not at the place of the robbery on the day of its commission. The defendant failed to give a direct answer to the question. The question was substantially repeated several times, but upon each occasion the defendant to all appearances willfully evaded giving a direct answer. Thereupon the district attorney asked the general question, "Well, did a conversation of that kind occur down there in the jail?" Again the defendant dodged the question, and finally he was asked if he did not, "in the presence of a number of deputy sheriffs, Mr. Thorwaldson and Mr. Bartoff and others," say, in effect, that he was not at the scene of the crime at all on the day of its commission. To this question the defendant answered, "I did not say anything like that." At this point the defendants rested their case; and the prosecution called Walter S. McSwain, sheriff of Fresno county, who, when sworn as a witness, was asked if the defendant had said when he was arrested, in the presence of the sheriff and a number of deputy sheriffs, that "he was not out to the Truxwa place, or out where Kaesar Singh and Inder Singh and Ishar Singh was, on Christmas day." To this question counsel for defendants objected, among other things, that no proper foundation had been laid for it. The trial court overruled the objection, and permitted the witness to answer "for the purpose of impeachment, and not for any other purpose," that the witness had made the statement indicated in the question.

It is now insisted upon behalf of the defendants that no proper foundation was laid for the impeaching testimony, because the impeaching question put to the assailed witness made no reference to any conversation occurring in the presence of Sheriff McSwain, and also because the assailed witness neither affirmed nor denied that he had said the things imputed to him by the impeaching question.

It is true generally, as asserted by counsel for the defendants, that a witness cannot be impeached by evidence of previous contradictory statements which he does not deny having made; but this rule is subject to the qualification that such evidence is admissible if the witness does not distinctly admit that he made the statements attributed to him. Jones on Evidence, § 845; Stephen on Evidence, art. 131; Stewart v. State, 42 Fla. 591, 28 South. 815.

[2] In the present case the evidently evasive answers of the assailed witness to several of the questions put to him were tantamount to a refusal to admit the statements therein imputed to him; and this in itself was sufficient to warrant the people in showing, if they could, that he did make those statements. But, however that may be, his answer to the final question of the district attorney, that "he didn't say anything like that," relieves the situation of all doubt, and clearly made the impeaching evidence of Sheriff McSwain admissible, if the foundation question was otherwise sufficient. It is a settled rule of evidence that before contradictory statements of a witness can be properly admitted in evidence for impeachment purposes the proper foundation therefor must be laid. The essentials of a sufficient foundation for the introduction of such evidence are to be found in section 2052 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides: "A witness may * * * be impeached by evidence that he has made, at other times, statements inconsistent with his present testimony; but before this can be done the statements must be related to him, with the circumstances of times, places and persons present; and he must be asked whether he made such statements, and, if so, allowed to explain them."

The rule requiring such foundation was designed for the purpose of fully informing the assailed witness of the particulars of the alleged contradictory statement, together with the circumstances of the time and place of its making, and the persons present, in order that the witness, in justice to himself and the party in whose behalf he was called, might fairly and intelligently deny, affirm, or explain the statements attributed to him. Accordingly the requirements of the rule under discussion are sufficiently complied with when it is made to appear, as was done in the case at bar, that the assailed witness understood the nature and purport of the contradictory statements imputed to him, and was fully informed of the time and place of their utterance, and knew generally who was present on the occasion referred to. In short, minor defects in the foundation question should not be seriously considered; and it will generally suffice in a foundation question to designate merely the name of the person to whom the statement was made, without naming all of the other persons who may have been present, if it is otherwise clear that the attention of the witness is called to the conversation in such a manner that it can with reasonable certainty be identified by him.

In the present case all of the several foundation questions put to the assailed witness specifically referred to the time and place of the alleged contradictory statements; and one, at least, of those questions called the witness' attention to a conversation claimed to have been had "in the presence of a number of deputy sheriffs, Mr. Thorwaldson and Mr. Bartoff and others." This, we are satisfied, constituted a sufficient foundation, within the spirit and purpose of the rule, for the subsequent introduction of the impeaching testimony given by the witness Sheriff McSwain. Ludtke v. Hertzog, 72 Fed. 142, 18 C. C. A. 487; State v. Bartmess, 33 Or. 110, 54 Pac. 167.

[3] The trial court refused to give certain requested instructions, which were to the effect that the defendant was entitled to the individual opinion of each member of the jury, and that if any juror entertained a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant he should not vote for a verdict of guilty, merely because a majority of the jurors believed the defendant to be guilty. These instructions were framed and requested in the very language of instructions similarly refused in the case of People v. Dole, 122 Cal. 486, 55 Pac. 581, 68 Am. St. Rep. 50. In that case the Supreme Court said that such instructions contained a correct statement of the law, and should have been given. This admonition was subsequently repeated in the concurring opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Beatty, in the case of People v. Howard, 143 Cal. 316, 323, 76 Pac. 1116; and in the case of People v. Wong Loug, 159 Cal. 520, 114 Pac. 829, the Supreme Court reiterated the propriety and justice of giving the same or a similar instruction in every criminal case. The verdict and judgment in each of the three cases just cited were reversed, but not because of the refusal to give the requested instructions. A reversal was ordered in each instance for other errors occurring at the trial which, apparently, affected the substantial rights of the defendant.

[4] While the opinion of the Supreme Court, as expressed in those cases, is binding upon us, and should have controlled the trial court in its application of the law to the facts of the present case, nevertheless we are satisfied that the mere failure to charge the jury as requested was not, in and of itself, an error of sufficient gravity to warrant a reversal. The subject-matter of the requested instructions was substantially embodied in the oath administered to the jurors "that they and each of them" would "well and truly try the matter at issue * * * and a true verdict render according to the evidence." The requested instructions were, in effect, simply admonitory and cautionary of the sworn duty of the jurors, and merely told them to do what they should do without any instruction upon the subject. We apprehend that if the refusal to give such an instruction was the only point involved in the case of People v. Dole, supra, and the other cases following it, the judgment in those cases would not have been reversed. If that be so, then it must be held here that, although the refusal to give similar instructions in the present case was error, it was not an error which, standing alone, requires a reversal of the judgment. Moreover, we are unable to say, after an examination of the entire case, including the evidence, that the error complained of resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

No other error appearing in the trial of this case, it is ordered that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

Webster, Webster & Blewett, of Stockton, for appellants. Clary & Louttit, of Stockton, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiffs alleged in their complaint that on the 13th day of September, 1909, plaintiff, Nellie Breidenbach, was driving along the streets of the city of Stockton in a carriage drawn by one horse; that defendants were then the owners of a horse and wagon which were in the control and possession of defendants; "that the said horse belonging to the defendants was an unruly, fractious, and vicious horse and well known to the defendants to be such an unruly, fractious, and vicious horse; that the defendants carelessly and negligently left said horse and wagon without a driver upon the public highway of the said city of Stockton, and that, by reason of said carelessness and negligence on the part of the defendants, the said horse then being attached to the said wagon ran away, and struck the carriage in which the plaintiff, Nellie Breiden-bach, was driving along the highway, and overthrew the same, and threw the plaintiff, Nellie Breidenbach, out of the carriage upon the ground, whereby the plaintiff, Nellie Breidenbach, was bruised, wounded, and lacerated, and was for about 15 days confined to her bed, and is still suffering as a result of said bruising, wounding and lacerating, to the damage of plaintiffs in the sum of $1,000." Defendants, in their answer, admit ownership of the horse and wagon, and that they were in the possession and control of their employé, O'Dell, at the times mentioned in the complaint. But they deny each and all the material averments of the complaint imputing negligence. The cause was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and at the conclusion of plaintiffs' evidence the court granted defendant's motion for a nonsuit on the ground stated in the motion, to wit, "that no negligence whatever has been proven against the defendants." A motion for a new trial was denied, and defendants had judgment. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment and order denying their motion for a new trial.

[1] The judgment was entered on April 1, 1911, and notice of appeal was served and filed on March 1, 1912. The appeal from the judgment, having been taken more than six months after entry of judgment, may be dismissed. Brownlee v. Reiner, 147 Cal. 641, 82 Pac. 324; Sheakley v. Nelson, 13 Cal. App. 379, 109 Pac. 891; Code Civ. Proc. § 939. The only points available to appellants are that there was sufficient evidence on the question of defendants' negligence to go to the jury; that it was error to grant the nonsuit; and that errors of law were committed in the rulings of the court in the omission or rejection of evidence which would warrant a reversal of the order refusing to grant a new trial.

The evidence on which appellants rely as tending to show negligence of defendants is found in the testimony of the plaintiff, Mrs. Breidenbach, and witness Charles Turner. As there is not much of it, we will set out all that is found in the record. Mrs. Breidenbach was riding in a buggy with her mother along Center street, in Stockton. She testified: "A. Near the center of Center street, and there was several buggies tied to the right of the street, and naturally I had to turn out of their way, and I don't know, I saw—there was some collision in the street. I saw Mr. Turner waving his hands, and several people screaming, but I did not just understand what they was saying, and I said there was something wrong, speaking to Mother. She looked back, and at the same time I glanced back, and I said 'My goodness.' There was a runaway coming behind us; right behind us, and we were to our right, and my idea was—I told Mother 'just be careful, don't touch the lines'— * * * Q. Just go ahead and tell what happened, Mrs. Breidenbach. A. As I said, I told my mother to leave me alone; and I thought I could get out of the way of it, but I had to be very careful on account of the car tracks, not overturn our buggy. And I thought I could get out and beat the horse. But the next thing I realized was I saw that black mare alongside of us. I saw my mother thrown into the street. I did not think I was going to be thrown out at the time. I did not realize what was happening. In the next minute I was lying in the street. * * * Q. Now, at that time, or when you looked back at this runaway, did you see whether or not there was a driver on the wagon? A. There was no driver on the wagon. I am positive of that."

Witness Turner also testified to this latter fact. He testified that he was working in defendants' stable at the time, was familiar with their horses, and had helped hitch them up, and of this particular horse he said he had "hitched it up lots of times." He was asked to tell what he saw of the accident, and answered: "I was washing the wagon. I saw the horse. I came to the front of the door, on the east side; that is, in front of the barn on the east side. I looked down and saw the horse coming from Weber avenue. I seen the horse coming running. That was about I guess 300 or 400 feet down, and Mrs. Breidenbach and her mother * * * were driving in front of the barber shop across the street. This was about 150 yards coming to them on the full tilt. I hollered to them 'Drive on,' ran out on the street, and hollered to them 'Drive on.'" He testified that, shortly after seeing Mrs. Breidenbach, the wagon drawn by the running horse struck her buggy, and she and her mother were thrown out. Witness followed up the running horse to the point not far away where "they caught her down there, and I went and got her. I led her—she was out of the harness almost. * * * Q. When you got her, did she have a halter on? A. No; she didn't have a halter. When I used to send the horse out, I most generally always sent one of these little ropes with her, to tie with. Sometimes it was in the wagon and sometimes it was on her neck. Q. When you found her that day did she have a halter? A. Had a little rope around its neck, and I led her back. Q. Was that rope complete? A. The rope was tied up on the hames. Q. It was not dragging, or anything of that kind? A. No, sir; nothing but the lines dragging, that is all I seen was dragging. * * * Q. Were you acquainted with the character of that horse, the kind of horse it was? A. Well, it was a mare not all the time liable to be trusted, I will say that." He was asked again to tell what kind of a horse that was. "A. Well, she was a mare that sometimes you could go in the stall with her, sometimes you could not, just according to how she felt or anything. She was liable to pull back on you sometimes, or anything else. Q. I will ask you whether or not you know of your own knowledge whether that horse had ever run away before this particular runaway? A. Not before this particular runaway, I don't think so." He was asked if she ran away after that, but his answer was not responsive to the question and was stricken out.

From the testimony, and we have stated all that had any immediate or remote bearing upon the question of negligence, plaintiffs present the matter in the following concrete form: "The conditions governing the case at bar are that the horse and wagon belonging to the defendant was running away unattended and the hitching strap was not loose and dragging, but was fast to the hames. Such was the testimony of the witness Turner. Everything, therefore, indicated negligence on the part of the defendants or their employé, and we maintain the burden was thrown upon the defendants to show that the horse was attended or was properly secured, or that his running away was wholly without fault of the defendants or their employé."

Just what significance should be attached to the fact that the hitching strap was not dragging when the horse was found, but was made fast to the harness, is not easy to determine. The inference appellants would draw is that the condition of the hitching strap indicated that the horse was not tied or secured in any way by it when the horse ran away or the hitching strap would have been dragging, which in the latter case might indicate that the horse had been tied and had broken loose.

[2] However, the point principally relied on is that when a horse runs away unattended in the streets of a city, and in its course injures a person without his fault, a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the owner of the horse is shown. An examination of the authorities and our own conception of what the law ought to be convince us that appellants' position is the correct one, and that the court erred in granting the nonsuit.

The responsibility of the owner of a horse for an injury committed by it begins at the moment the owner takes the horse from its stall. He is presumed to know how he handled the horse, what he did with it, and when and how it escaped from him, if it runs away. These are facts not within the knowledge of the injured person who first sees the horse as it is about to run over him. It may be that the only witness to the cause of the runaway was the owner or driver. The horse may have started because left unhitched; or it may have taken fright from some defect in hitching it to the wagon, or from the wagon itself, or from some part of the harness giving way, or from some object at the roadside, or from careless driving, or from some other of the numerous causes of runaways. It would be an exceptional case of a runaway in which the driver or owner could not explain the cause. But the plaintiff ought not to be put to the risk of resting his recovery upon the testimony of the guilty party. The rule laid down in Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 556, 40 Pac. 1021, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146, was as follows: "When a thing which causes the injury is shown to be under the management of the defendant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use the proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from the want of care."

Defendants admit ownership and possession of the horse on the day of the accident. They admit that the horse was in the custody and control of their servant, O'Dell. O'Dell's deposition was taken by plaintiffs and offered in evidence but, on objection of defendants, the court properly, we think, denied its admission. It was admitted, however, that the deposition was regularly taken before a notary public and transcribed by the stenographer, but, before it had been read over and signed by the witness, he committed suicide. The deposition is not included in the bill of exceptions. If any inference could be indulged from this circumstance, it would be that probably the witness who could explain the cause of the runaway had made an explanation unfavorable to defendants, and hence the objection to its admission. We are not permitted to speculate as to the purport of this deposition. But this untoward event lends some support to the view we entertain that, in such case as this, the plaintiffs should not be forced to prove that the runaway was caused in its inception by defendants.

Recurring to the rule in the Giant Powder Company Case, supra, we have here a horse and wagon that were concededly under the "management" of the defendants' driver. We do not understand that this management must be shown to have existed at the moment of the accident. The accident was "such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen if those who have the management use the proper care." (Horses do not in the ordinary course of things run away. If they did, their use would have to be prohibited.) It seems to us the rule alluded to should apply here.

It was held by the Supreme Court in Rowe v. Such, 134 Cal. 573, 66 Pac. 862, 67 Pac. 760, that the rule in the Giant Powder Company Case, supra, did not apply to the facts in the Rowe Case. In that case, which is relied upon by appellants, the horse was not unattended. The driver was on the wagon at the time the horse started to run, and he was thrown off the wagon. There was no evidence showing fault of the driver. All the facts were before the jury and there was nothing shown from which negligence could be imputed to the driver. Hence the rule had no application.

[3] But, whether this particular rule should apply or not, we think that, under the circumstances here appearing, there was sufficient evidence of negligence to call for an explanation by the defendants and that the court erred in granting the motion for nonsuit. Let us turn for a moment to what the courts have said. The decisions are generally to the effect that the running away of horses where no driver is present creates a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the owner. Where, however, a horse runs away with his driver, it has been held that there is nothing in that fact itself to show negligence on the part of the driver. 29 Cyc. 595. Generally, negligence will not be presumed from the mere fact that a horse ran away, unless the horse was unattended. 6 Thompson on Negligence, § 7665. We do not consider those cases where the horse is attended by his driver, although we find that they are sometimes inappropriately referred to as sustaining a view contrary to that we have taken. It must be remembered, too, that in some states negligence is a question solely with the jury, and the court is not permitted to say that certain facts constituted negligence prima facie, and thus remove the case from the jury. This is the rule in Connecticut and cases from that jurisdiction, such as Button v. Frink, 51 Conn. 342, 50 Am. Rep. 24, cited in Rowe v. Such, 134 Cal. 573, 66 Pac. 862, 67 Pac. 760, relied on by respondents, and O'Brien v. Miller, 60 Conn. 214, 22 Atl. 544, 25 Am. St. Rep. 320, cannot be used to support the position taken by defendants. In Gorsuch v. Swan, 109 Tenn. 36, 69 S. W. 1113, 97 Am. St. Rep. 836, it was held that when a team is found running away, unattended, upon a public thoroughfare, and doing hurt to one lawfully thereon, negligence is prima facie imputable to the owner from this fact alone.

In Gannon v. Wilson, 1 Sadler (Pa.) 422, 5 Atl. 381, the charge of the trial court was approved that "when a horse and wagon are found running along, without a driver, upon the sidewalk of a public street, and injury to another person or his goods is caused by it, it is prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the owner." The court held that it is the duty of the owner of a horse not voluntarily to permit it to run on the sidewalk of a public street, and, when so found, the owner must rebut the presumption of negligence arising therefrom.

It was held in Crawford v. Upper, 16 Ont. App. Rep. 440, that the fact that a horse runs away in a city street, and does injury, shows a prima facie case of negligence which calls for explanation on the part of the defendant owner, and a nonsuit was held erroneous.

In Unger v. Forty-Second St. Ferry, etc., 51 N. Y. 497, a team of horses became detached from one of the defendant's cars and ran away, injuring the plaintiff. No proof was offered to show how the horses became detached from the car, or as to the cause. The court said this was sufficient to make out a prima facie case, and the fact that the horses were unattended and unfastened in the street was, unexplained, evidence of negligence against the defendant, and hence no error was committed in refusing to nonsuit the plaintiff at the close of the evidence.

Hummell v. Wester, Brightly, N. P. (Pa.) 133, was similar to Gannon v. Wilson, supra, and it was held that the law presumes negligence on the part of the owner of a horse attached to a wagon or carriage, found running away on a city sidewalk, and it lies upon the owner to show that there was no fault on his part.

In the case of Watson v. Weekes, it was held, as stated in Tolhausen v. Davies, 59 L. T. N. S. 436, that upon proof that defendant's horse harnessed to a cart, unattended, running along a highway, whereby the plaintiff, being lawfully thereon, was injured, a judge could not rightly nonsuit, for such facts were more consistent with the absence of ordinary care in the superintending a horse, than with such care having been used.

Snee v. Deerkie, 6 F. (Ct. Decisions) 42 (England), cited in 1 Butterworth's Dig. 67, held that a presumption (though a rebuttable one) of negligence arises if a runaway horse and carriage knock a person down in a public street.

The fact that a team of runaway horses was found dashing along a public highway, without attendance of the owner or his servants, was held, in Kokoll v. Brohm & B. L. Co., 77 N. J. Law, 169, 71 Atl. 120, to raise a presumption of negligence in their management and care which will render the owner liable, in the absence of explanation, for injuries caused by their unrestrained acts. Followed in Francois v. Hanff, 77 N. J. Law, 364, 71 Atl. 1128.

In Pearl v. Macaulay, 6 App. Div. 70, 39 N. Y. Supp. 472, the court said: "This is an action to recover for personal injuries. The plaintiff, while crossing a street in the city of Brooklyn, was knocked down and run over by the defendant's horse and wagon. At the time of the accident the horse and wagon was unattended by any person. On proof of those facts the plaintiff presented a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the defendant. Unger v. Forty-Second St., etc., R. Co., 51 N. Y. 497; Doherty v. Sweetser, 82 Hun, 556, 31 N. Y. Supp. 649. The defendant therefore was called upon to explain how it was that the horse was running at large without fault on his part."

In a Louisiana case it was held that: "The fact that a team is found running away upon the streets of a city without a driver requires explanation as to how and why this should have been, and if the driver is not produced as a witness, or his absence accounted for, it is fair to presume that no satisfactory explanation could have been given." Maus v. Broderick, 51 La. Ann. 1153, 25 South. 977.

There would seem to be a peculiar hardship in the present case to deny the plaintiff the benefit of this rule, for she endeavored to show by the driver himself what the explanation was and was deprived of his testimony, on objection of defendants, by the suicide of the witness before he had the opportunity to read his deposition and sign it. The plaintiff in our opinion was not called upon to make any explanation of the cause of the running, but that this duty devolved upon defendants. See, also, Howley v. Kraemer, 36 Misc. Rep. 190, 73 N. Y. Supp. 142; Kelly v. Adelman, 72 App. Div. 590, 76 N. Y. Supp. 574; Manzoni v. Douglas, L. R. 6 Q. B. Div. 145.

It is freely admitted that, on the principal question discussed, there are cases holding squarely to the rule contended for by respondents. But the weight of authority is clearly the other way, and, if it were not, we should still adhere to the views herein expressed.

[4] Respondents call attention to the complaint, and claim that there was no evidence of any kind that defendants had "left said horse and wagon unsecured and without a driver upon the public highway in the city of Stockton," or "that the defendants carelessly and negligently left said horse and wagon unsecured and without a driver upon the public highway," etc. It is said the proof is at variance with the pleadings, and hence the court was justified in granting the nonsuit. The only ground for the motion for nonsuit was "that no negligence whatsoever has been proven against the defendants." We have endeavored to show that plaintiffs made out a prima facie case of negligence. The motion was not on the ground of variance between the proofs and pleadings. The reviewing court is not at liberty to consider any ground which was not stated in the motion. Shain v. Forbes, 82 Cal. 577, 583, 23 Pac. 198.

The judgment and order are reversed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by H. G. Henderson, administrator of John J. Davies, deceased, against J. G.

De Turk. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. A. Stice, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Carter, Kirby & Henderson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and an order denying motion for new trial in an action to quiet title to certain real property in Los Angeles county.

Defendant claims solely under a deed from the state based on a sale and alleged deed to the state on account of delinquent taxes. The deed to the state recited the name of the person assessed as "E. W. Davies," while the assessment was to "E. W. Davis."

[1-3] The law in force both at the time of the sale and the time of the execution of the deed provided that the deed to the state must recite, among other things, "the name of the person assessed." Section 3785, Pol. Code. This means, of course, the name of the person assessed as it appears upon the assessment roll. It has uniformly been held in this state that a tax deed which misrecites or omits to recite any one of the facts required by the statute to be recited has no effect at all as a conveyance, the theory being that it is competent for the Legislature to prescribe the form of instrument which, as the result of a proceeding in invitum can alone divest the citizen of his title, and that, where the statute prescribes the particular form of the tax deed, the form becomes substance, and must be strictly pursued, and it is not for the courts to inquire whether the required recitals are of material facts or otherwise. See Baird v. Monroe, 150 Cal. 560, 564, 89 Pac. 352, and cases there cited. The particular point here involved was decided in Grimm v. O'Connell, 54 Cal. 522, where the assessment was to "Charles Grimm," and the tax deed recited that the property was assessed to "Charles Grimm and all owners or claimants known or unknown." It was held, upon the theory above stated, that the deed was void because it failed to correctly recite the name of the person assessed. There are other decisions holding that any such deed is void when it misrecites or omits to recite any one of the facts required by statute to be recited therein, and there is no decision laying down a different rule.

[4] As is substantially said in respondent's petition for a rehearing, these decisions constitute a rule of property from which the court should not depart.

[5] The deed cannot be held valid by applying the rule of idem sonans, if we are to adhere to the ruling in Emeric v. Alvarado, 90 Cal. 444, 465, 27 Pac. 356. There the assessment was to "Castero," while the owner's name was "Castro." The court said: "It is not a case to which the rule of idem sonans applies. Tax proceedings are in invitum, and, to be valid, must closely follow the statute, and idem sonans applies to cases of pleas of misnomer and issues of identity, where the question is whether the change of letters alters the sound—not to assessments and other cases of description, where the written name is material. 'Different letters will make different names, though the sound be the same.' The deed to Pollard described the land sold as having been assessed to 'Castro,' and does not purport to be made in pursuance of an assessment to 'Castero.' While there is a diversity of opinion in other jurisdictions on this point, we think this ruling should be followed in this state.

[6] The failure of the deed to the state to recite correctly the name of the party assessed is not remedied or cured by either section 3807 or 3628, Political Code. Section 3628 refers only to the "assessment." Under it, an "assessment" is not rendered invalid by reason of a mistake in the name of the owner. Section 3807, Political Code, provides: "When land is sold for taxes correctly imposed as the property of a particular person, no misnomer of the owner, or supposed owner, or other mistake relating to the ownership thereof, affects the sale, or renders it void or voidable." This section has existed in its present form ever since the codes were adopted in 1872, and was the law when the deed involved in Grimm v. O'Connell, supra, was held invalid. It was cited in the argument in that case. It does not purport to apply to the deed made in pursuance of the sale, and, as the law now stands, five years thereafter in the event that no redemption has been had, and cannot be held to dispense with the requirement that the deed shall correctly recite the name of the person to whom the property was assessed, as a condition to its validity. Until a valid deed is made to the state, the state cannot sell the property to another (section 3897, Pol. Code), and the owner has the right to redeem at any time prior to a valid sale by the state (section 3780, Pol. Code).

[7] Section 3787, Political Code, makes such a tax deed evidence of the regularity of such proceedings as are named therein only when it is a deed conforming to the requirements of the law.

The learned judge of the trial court did not err in holding that the deed was invalid.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

SMITH v. WOODS et al. (S. F. 5,866.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1912.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 576*)—CONCLUSIVENESS—ERRORS.

In an action on notes alleged by defendants to have been procured by fraud, the court properly refused defendants' offer of the reporter's record of the testimony in the trial of a former case, wherein a judgment for a cancellation of the same notes for the same fraud was denied to defendants; such judgment being res judicata, regardless of nonjurisdictional errors.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by H. O. Smith against J. R. Woods and others. From judgment for plaintiff and denial of new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Henry Hawson and E. A. Williams, both of Fresno, for appellants. Frank H. Short and F. E. Cook, both of Fresno, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment against them, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The action was upon three promissory notes, each for the principal sum of $1,200. Plaintiff herein sued as an assignee of the notes, for a valuable consideration, before maturity, and as one who received them in good faith. The defense alleged was that the notes had been obtained by J. B. McCrairie, the payee thereof, by false and fraudulent representations in a transaction involving the sale of a certain stallion; that plaintiff had been a party to the fraud; and that he had taken the instruments in question with full knowledge of their fraudulent taint.

[1] Defendants rely upon two assignments of error in asking for a reversal of the judgment against them. These are: (1) That the court erred in excluding certain evidence offered to prove the alleged fraud which induced the making of the notes; and (2) that one of the notes was improperly admitted in evidence, because, as appellants contend, the real owner was not a party to this suit. There had been another action, entitled Woods et al. v. McCrairie, in which the plaintiffs were the persons who appear as defendants here. That was a suit to cancel the notes here involved. The complaint therein contained the identical allegations of fraud which were set forth in the answer in this case. At the trial of this case counsel for defendants offered the reporter's record of the testimony received in the trial of the former case. Plaintiff's counsel made no objection to the form of the offered testimony, but opposed its admission upon the ground that the defense sought to be established thereby had been passed upon by the court in the former action and adjudicated adversely to the contention of these defendants; a judgment having been entered in the earlier action to the effect that this plaintiff had acquired the notes for a valuable consideration, before maturity, as a purchaser in good faith. This objection was properly sustained by the court. Much of appellants' brief is devoted to a discussion of the alleged errors committed in Woods et al. v. McCrairie. If there were material errors in that trial, they would have been available upon the appeal of that cause; but they have no place here, where all of the evidence taken in that case was offered in bulk as there received. No matter what the condition of the record in Woods et al. v. McCrairie may have been, the ultimate fact remained that upon the evidence adduced in the trial of that cause the court, acting within its proper jurisdiction, had entered a judgment against the plaintiffs therein, and that was a subsisting judgment at the time of the trial of this cause.

[2] There is nothing in the other point made by appellants that plaintiff, H. O. Smith, is not the real party in interest in the action upon one of the notes. This is based entirely upon the fact that the note in question bore an indorsement of an order to pay the sum mentioned therein to John W. and Edgar W. Loyd. This is signed by the plaintiff, but he swore that the note was his property, acquired September 20, 1909; that it had never been out of his possession; that while the purported assignment had been written by him the note had never been delivered to the Loyds. In the absence of bad faith, an action upon a note cannot be defended upon the ground that the title is not in the plaintiff, if plaintiff has possession, and defendant would be protected by the payment of any judgment on the note. Dyer v. Sebrell, 135 Cal. 597, 67 Pac. 1036; Naglee v. Lyman, 14 Cal. 453; Bank of Lassen County v. Sherer, 108 Cal. 513, 41 Pac. 415. It has been held that even the owner of the equitable right to a part of the proceeds of a note is not a necessary party to an action on the note. Curtis v. Sprague, 51 Cal. 239; Caldwell v. Lawrence, 84 Ill. 161.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Action by Henry Fox and others against L. J. Hall and others. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

James W. Oates, of Santa Rosa, for appellants. J. T. Coffman, of Healdsburg, and A. B. Ware, of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. From the judgment which followed the granting of defendants' motion for a nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal.

The averments of plaintiffs' complaint essential to this consideration are the following: Lola Fox (wife of plaintiff, Henry Fox), her brother, Clarence C. Hall, and her sister, Rosa E. Patchett, defendants herein, were the owners in fee as tenants in common, each seized of an undivided one-third of a certain ranch in Sonoma county. The ranch was incumbered by a mortgage securing an indebtedness of some $29,000, due the William Hill Company, a corporation. Lola Fox died in 1905, and her husband, Henry Fox, became administrator of her estate which in due course was distributed in equal shares to the heirs of Lola Fox, namely, her husband and her children, Chrystal Fox and Elizabeth Fox. In February, 1905, and before administration upon the estate of Lola Fox, but after her death, Henry Fox and Chrystal Fox, entered into a written agreement with L. J. Hall, the father of Lola and of Clarence C. Hall and Mrs. Patchett. This agreement provided that the undivided interest of Lola Fox, deceased, in the ranch above mentioned (which interest by her death had descended to Henry Fox, Chrystal Fox and Elizabeth Fox) should "remain in the custody and control of said L. J. Hall, and to his use, during his natural life, provided and so long as said Clarence C. Hall and Rosa E. Hall (now Patchett) take no steps to divide or partition the said lands. But during the time the same shall so remain in the custody and control of said L. J. Hall he is to pay all taxes on the same and shall pay upon the mortgage debt now subsisting against the same the net income from the same until said mortgage debt is paid off." The complaint then alleges the receipt of large sums of money annually by L. J. Hall as the net income of the ranch, his failure to devote any portion of this net income to the payment of the mortgage debt, the foreclosure of the mortgage and the compulsory payment by the administrator of the estate of Lola Fox of $11,314.70, the one-third part of the mortgage debt at the time of foreclosure. Specifically it is averred that in the year 1905 the net income of the said one-third interest in said lands so received by L. J. Hall was $5,000, in the year 1906, $5,000, and in the year 1907, $6,500, and it is further averred that no part of this income had ever been paid over to plaintiffs or for their use.

It is further charged that the defendants Clarence Hall and Rosa Patchett knew of the agreement, knew of their father's intent, alleged in the complaint to have existed when he made the agreement, not to perform his covenant to pay the net income upon the mortgage debt, and that they joined with and assisted their father to dispose of all the net income by expending it for improvements upon lands belonging to Clarence and Rosa, and that defendants Clarence and Rosa became the purchasers at the foreclosure sale. It is also alleged that L. J. Hall is insolvent. For relief plaintiffs demanded a judgment against L. J. Hall for the sum of $11,314.70, with interest, and a lien upon the ranch property now owned by Clarence and Rosa for whatever part of this $11,314.70 L. J. Hall had expended for improvements upon it. A like lien is sought upon other real estate owned by Clarence and Rosa for such portion of the net income as might have been by Hall expended upon these lands. There was also a prayer for general relief. The complaint was unverified. L. J. Hall made answer by general denial. Clarence and Rosa answered separately by general denial, and further pleaded a specific defense not necessary to set forth.

The evidence was clearly insufficient to have supported any judgment against Clarence Hall or Rosa Patchett, and, so far as these defendants are concerned, the motion for nonsuit was properly granted. They were not parties to the contract upon which the claim of plaintiffs is founded. The theory of the complaint apparently was that the lands of Clarence and Rosa should be held for the amount of net income expended thereon by L. J. Hall, because L. J. Hall had, with their knowledge, made this agreement without intending to perform it, and because he was insolvent, and therefore unable to compensate plaintiffs by a payment to them of an amount equal to the net income which he had failed to apply to the satisfaction of the mortgage debt. We need not inquire whether this theory is well founded in law, since there was no attempt to introduce evidence in support of the supposed facts on which it rests. The record contains no testimony tending to show that L. J. Hall, when he made his agreement, intended to violate it, or, by necessary consequence, that his codefendants knew of such intent. Nor is there any evidence to sustain the allegation of insolvency.

With respect to the defendant L. J. Hall, the case presents a different aspect. The plaintiffs introduced evidence tending to show the making of the contract as alleged, the occupancy of the ranch by L. J. Hall, the receipt of large sums of money derived from the sale of products of the ranch, the failure on the part of L. J. Hall to pay any part of the mortgage debt, and the satisfaction by the estate of Lola Fox of one-third of the mortgage, amounting to $11,314.70.

[1] There was, however, no proof of the expenses incurred in operating the ranch; in other words, the plaintiffs made a showing of gross income, but none of net income realized. They failed, therefore, in establishing their allegation that L. J. Hall had received sufficient net income to have paid off the mortgage, or any part of it, and were not, as the proof stood when they rested, in a position to demand judgment against L. J. Hall for any specific sum. But the fact that they were not entitled to all the relief which they had asked did not justify a nonsuit. The complaint closed with a prayer for general relief. It is the right, indeed the duty, of the court, to grant any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issues. Code Civ. Proc. § 580; Hurlbutt v. N. W. S. S. Co., 93 Cal. 55, 28 Pac. 795; Zellerbach v. Allenberg, 99 Cal. 57, 33 Pac. 786.

[2] The contract between the plaintiffs and L. J. Hall, followed by his possession of their property and the management thereof, entitled them to an accounting from him of such management, and of the receipts and disbursements, to the end that they might then demand the payment of any net income which should have been applied to the reduction of the mortgage debt. The facts alleged and proved showed the existence of a fiduciary relation sufficient to invoke the jurisdiction of a court of equity to compel an accounting, which, as the evidence shows, had been demanded of the defendant L. J. Hall. 1 Cyc. 427; Wooster v. Nevills, 73 Cal. 58, 14 Pac. 390; Green v. Brooks, 81 Cal. 328, 22 Pac. 849; San Pedro Lumber Co. v. Reynolds, 111 Cal. 588, 44 Pac. 309; Coward v. Clanton, 122 Cal. 451, 55 Pac. 147. Upon such accounting, the burden would probably be upon the said defendant to establish any expenditures or credits upon which he might rely as offsets to the gross income shown to have been received by him. 1 Cyc. 448; Marvin v. Brooks, 94 N. Y. 71; Thatcher v. Hayes, 54 Mich. 184, 19 N. W. 946. But, be that as it may, the plaintiffs were entitled to an accounting, and, if the case had been submitted without further evidence, an interlocutory judgment directing such accounting would have been proper. 1 Ency. of Pl. & Pr. 102; 1 Cyc. 447. See Duff v. Duff, 71 Cal. 513, 12 Pac. 570.

[3] The accounting might have been ordered through a reference, or the court might, with or without a preliminary interlocutory order, have proceeded to take and state the account itself (Emery v. Mason, 75 Cal. 222, 16 Pac. 894), rendering such final judgment thereon as might appear to be proper.

The judgment in favor of the defendants Clarence C. Hall and Rosa E. Patchett is affirmed.

The judgment in favor of the defendant L. J. Hall is reversed.

BEATTY, C. J., does not participate in the foregoing decision.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by James J. Stevinson, a corporation, to quiet title and to enjoin William H. Joy from removing a building. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank H. Farrar, of Merced, for appellant. F. G. Ostrander and H. K. Landram, both of Merced, for respondent.

HEENSHAW, J. This action was brought by plaintiff to quiet its title to a parcel of land in the county of Merced and to enjoin defendant from removing a building which he had constructed thereon. As to the land in controversy, defendant asserted an interest growing out of the following facts found by the court: On October 1, 1908, the plaintiff, with one Lee Pearson, entered into a written contract, whereunder plaintiff extended to Pearson the privilege of purchasing the land for the sum of $1,195, upon the payment by Pearson to plaintiff of the sum of $2 per week until the total sum paid should equal the sum of $1,195. Pearson was given the right to use and occupy the land during the life of the agreement, and under it Pearson did enter into possession of the land. Time, and in particular the time of payments, was declared to be material and of the essence of the contract. The court found that the provision making the punctual payments of the essence of the contract and providing for a forfeiture thereof in case such payments were not made at or within the times limited was waived by the plaintiff; that plaintiff "accepted from said Pearson various sums of money at various times long after the same were due, which it credited upon the said purchase price of $1,195; and did inform the said Pearson that said weekly payments would not be insisted upon, and, before any forfeiture of said privilege to purchase said lands would be declared by plaintiff, that notice of any delinquency in said payments and a demand for the payment of the same would be made upon him by the plaintiff; that on the 19th day of October, 1909, and before any notice of forfeiture of said privilege, or any notice of delinquency of any payment had been given the said Pearson, and before any demand for the payment of any money then due under the said agreement had been made upon said Pearson, the said Pearson forwarded the plaintiff all the moneys due from him to plaintiff at said time under said agreement, but plaintiff refused to accept the same or any part thereof. Plaintiff has never given said Pearson any notice of his delinquency of any of said payments and has never made any demand upon said Pearson for any payment or payments due under said agreement. Plaintiff has never given said Pearson any notice that it would insist upon the provisions of said agreement as to time being of the essence of said agreement for said weekly payments." Further, the findings show that the defendant leased this land from Pearson at a monthly rental sum of $4.50, and that defendant was in possession of the leased land under the terms of his lease; that he erected upon the leased land a building of the value of about $500; that this building is not permanently affixed to the land, but rests upon boards which are not imbedded in the ground or attached to any material which is affixed to the land; that this building may be removed from the land without disturbing it; that at the time of the erection of the building it was agreed and understood by and between Pearson and the defendant that defendant should have the privilege of removing the building at any time he so desired.

The precise terms of the contract touching the matters hereinafter to be considered are as follows: "Time and punctuality are hereby made material to and of the essence of this option. Upon termination of the option herein except by purchase, if possession has been taken by first party, second party shall have the right to immediately or at any time thereafter enter upon said land and premises and retake possession thereof, together with improvements and appurtenances thereunto belonging, and said party covenants and agrees that he will then surrender unto said second party upon demand said lots, improvements and appurtenances without delay or hindrance. No waiver of times of payments for continuance of option shall be valid in favor of the first party unless reduced to writing and subscribed by the second party thereto. No assignment of this option shall be valid unless the same be made with the written consent of the second party. It is further understood and agreed that no agent of either party to this option has authority to alter or to change the terms of this option or to bind either party hereto by any statement, except those herein contained."

The court under the findings, which have been sufficiently indicated, gave judgment for defendant, sustaining him in his possession and refusing an injunction against him. From this portion of the judgment plaintiff appeals.

[1] It is first urged that the court erroneously admitted evidence upon which it based its finding that plaintiff "did inform the said Pearson that said weekly payments would not be insisted upon, and before any forfeiture of said privilege to purchase said lands would be declared by plaintiff, that notice of any delinquency in said payments and a demand for the payment of the same would be made upon him by plaintiff." The evidence here referred to is the evidence of Pearson, the party to the option contract made with plaintiff. Pearson was allowed to testify that Whistler, plaintiff's agent, prior to the execution of the contract, told him that, "as long as a man was trying to do right making his payments, everything would be all right whether or not I had kept up on my land," and that subsequently, after the execution of the contract and when Pearson was in default in his payments, that he (Pearson) said to Whistler: "In an off-hand way, not thinking but what it was all right, I said 'I suppose if I get behind, would they be apt to take the land from me?' and he said, 'Don't you worry about that.' He said: 'It will be credited up to you. There will be a statement if you get behind two weeks.' He said: 'There will be a statement sent to you showing you have paid so much and so much in arrears.'" This evidence was clearly inadmissible. As to the first purported statement of Whistler made antecedent to the execution of the contract, it was a bald attempt to vary by parol the terms of a subsequently executed written contract. None of the circumstances under which such evidence is permissible are here present. Even going to the unwarranted extent of saying that this testimony amounted to "evidence of the circumstances under which the agreement was made," still the occasion was not shown which makes evidence of such circumstances permissible. There was no extrinsic ambiguity to be explained; there was no illegality or fraud to be established. Code Civ. Proc. § 1856.

[2] The testimony of Whistler's declaration subsequent to the execution of the contract was equally inadmissible. Here again was a plain effort not only to vary the terms of a written contract, but to vary the terms of a written contract which declares the agreement to be that no agent has authority to alter or change its terms, by showing that an agent of the plaintiff did undertake to do this precise thing, moreover, to show this without any attempt to establish any authorization or power in the agent so to do. If therefore the judgment which the court rendered depended upon the findings based upon this evidence, a reversal would be necessary. But the finding above quoted, to the effect that plaintiff informed Pearson that the weekly payments would not be insisted upon, may be entirely discarded, and the judgment still be supported by the finding of ultimate fact, namely, that plaintiff waived the agreement making time of the essence of the contract.

[3] To a consideration of the evidence and of the law touching this finding we are thus brought. It is shown without dispute that the contract between plaintiff and Pearson was entered into on October 1, 1908; that thereafter he made numerous payments which were received by plaintiff and credited to him under his option contract; that no one of these payments was made within the times limited by the contract; that they were made at irregular intervals from October 1, 1908, until August 21, 1909; that thus in October, 1909, he was 12 weeks overdue in his payments; that he had received no notice from plaintiff demanding the payments and no notice that plaintiff had or would exact the forfeiture because of nonpayment. When, in October, he sent to plaintiff the full amount of the moneys due, he received a letter from plaintiff in response returning the $25 which he had sent; the letter stating that it was returned "for the reason that your option to purchase the west half of lot 18, section 14, of the Stevinson Colony has been canceled by us on account of your failure to make your payments when due, in accordance with the conditions expressed in the option formerly held by you."

Thus, then, is presented the question of the correlative rights of the parties under the facts shown. Appellant insists that by its conduct in accepting the delinquent payments it did no more than to waive its right to declare a forfeiture on account of such delinquencies, but that its right to declare and enforce a forfeiture as to any other delinquencies and to enforce this forfeiture without previous notice to the defendant cannot be questioned. The cases, however, which it cites in support of this position, fall far short of sustaining it. McGlynn v. Moore, 25 Cal. 384, was an effort to enforce the forfeiture of a lease for a failure to build a warehouse within the time covenanted by the lease. It appeared that after the failure to build the warehouse the landlord accepted rent. This court declared that this acceptance of rent, with full knowledge of the facts constituting a breach of the covenant, was a waiver of the forfeiture, unless the covenant to build was a continuing covenant. It determined upon the language of the lease that it was not a continuing covenant, and the tenant was therefore right in insisting upon a waiver. Clearly this case has no bearing upon the question. In Jones v. Durrer, 96 Cal. 95, 30 Pac. 1027, no question of notice to the tenant was involved. The tenant persistently refused to comply with continuing covenants of the lease, and the holding of this court is merely to the effect that waivers of former breaches do not preclude the lessor from maintaining an action for subsequent breaches continuous in their nature. It is equally plain that this case is not in point. The right of plaintiff to maintain an action of forfeiture for breach of the covenant is not here in question. The real question is whether or not the tenant is entitled to notice before the forfeiture is exacted, and, if so, to what kind of notice. Thompson v. Gerner, 104 Cal. 168, 37 Pac. 900, 43 Am. St. Rep. 81, which appellant declares to be precisely in point and conclusive upon the matter, was an action upon a promissory note which provided for the payment of a monthly interest at 8 per cent. per annum, but further that, if the principal or interest be not paid as it becomes due, it shall thereafter bear interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month. The payee, after the principal had become due, had paid interest for a certain time at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, and this interest had been accepted. Thereafter, upon a later offer by the payee to pay another month's interest at the rate of 8 per cent., the holder of the note refused to receive it and demanded interest at 1 per cent. per month. The payee then tendered to plaintiff the whole amount of the principal due and the amount of interest at 8 per cent. per annum. This the plaintiff refused to accept. The court held that as to those months in which plaintiff had accepted interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum there was a waiver of the right to demand 1 per cent. a month; that the acceptance amounted to an executed oral agreement at variance with the terms of the written contract only for the months for which it was accepted. But, says this court, plaintiff "is entitled, however, to interest at 1 per cent. per month from the time she first demanded it." There is no parallelism between Thompson v. Gerner and the case at bar. But applying its reasoning, it would be unquestioned that plaintiff would be entitled to exact prompt payments and to enforce the forfeiture from and after the time it made demand on Pearson, a demand, however, which it never made. These are all the cases cited and relied upon by appellant, and it must be apparent that no one of them touches the question under consideration. The true rule is firmly established and recognized by all the authorities. Where time is made of the essence of the contract for the payment of rent or other payments of money, and this covenant has been waived by the acceptance of the rent or other moneys after they are due, and with knowledge of the facts, such conduct will be regarded as creating "such a temporary suspension of the right of forfeiture as could only be restored by giving a definite and specific notice of an intention to enforce it." Such is the language of Monson v. Bragdon, 159 Ill. 66, 42 N. E. 383, quoted with approval by this court after an extensive review of the authorities in Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290, 110 Pac. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126. So in Standard Brewing Co. v. Anderson, 46 South. 926, the Supreme Court of Louisiana declares that where month after month the lessor has been receiving payment of the rent a few days later, without objection, if he desires in the future to hold the lessee strictly to payment on the day the rent falls due, he must give him notice to that effect; otherwise, the lessee will not be in legal default from delaying the usual time. In Barnett v. Sussman, 116 App. Div. 859, 102 N. Y. Supp. 287, the same principle is declared in a case where realty was sold under a contract providing for payments in monthly installments at regular stated periods, and that on default in any payment the vendor might 30 days thereafter elect without notice, that all payments become forfeited to her as liquidated damages. It was held that the acceptance by the vendor from the beginning of payments not made according to the contract but irregularly as to time and amount, the purchaser being at all times in arrears, was a waiver of the forfeiture clause, which could not be revived, except on notice to the purchasers that if they did not pay the balance due within a reasonable time specified the forfeiture would then be exercised. It follows herefrom that the court's finding that plaintiff had waived its forfeiture clause and that the result was that it could not be restored without notice to Pearson and an opportunity to him to make good the delinquent payments cannot be controverted.

Appellant's argument upon the second count, namely, its right to an injunction to stay the threatened removal of the building, is based almost wholly upon its previous contention that Pearson had forfeited his option, and that defendant Joy therefore was a mere trespasser upon the property.

[4] Its further argument that the clause in the option declaring that an assignment of it should be invalid unless made with the written consent of the plaintiff is without efficacy in this consideration. The distinction between an assignment and a subletting is important and well recognized. A covenant against assigning will be strictly construed and will not be held to embrace the subletting. 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) pp. 659, 680. There was therefore nothing in Pearson's contract with plaintiff which forbade his subletting to Joy.

[5] And, finally, it may be said under the finding of the court, which is not attacked, the building erected by defendant was not attached to and did not become a part of the realty. Collins v. Bartlett, 44 Cal. 371; Pennybecker v. McDougal, 48 Cal. 160. As personal property plaintiff had no right whatsoever to defendant's structure.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

Wm. Crawford, of Los Angeles, for appellant. John C. Stick, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover a sum of money alleged to be due as rental under the terms of a lease. Plaintiff sues as assignee of the lessor of the property, and it is alleged in the complaint, and so found, that Hawkins and Eager, the defendants, are assignees of the original lessee. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which and an order denying his motion for a new trial defendant Eager appeals.

[1] The appeal is presented upon a record prepared and certified in accordance with the provisions of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, designated as the alternative plan of appeal. Under this section no printed transcript of the record is required. "In filing briefs on said appeal the parties must, however, print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court." Section 953c, Code Civ. Proc. No attempt whatever is made by appellant to comply with this provision, and the meager references to the evidence, such as "Rep's trans. pp. 41-45, lines 13 to 6," made in his brief, are unintelligible. It is the duty of attorneys who choose this method of appeal to comply with the provisions of the act governing the presentation of cases thereunder, and, where they wholly fail to so comply, this court will not assume the labor of examining the entire record for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the evidence supports a finding attacked for want of sufficiency of evidence.

[2] It is claimed that the court erred in overruling a general demurrer interposed to the complaint. There was attached to the complaint as a part thereof a copy of the lease. The instruments indorsed thereon, and upon which the judgment rendered against appellant is founded, are as follows:

"Los Angeles, Cal., Oct. 9, 1908. For valuable consideration, I hereby transfer and set over all my right, title and interest in and to the within lease, to Ralph S. Hawkins. David De Munbrun."

"Los Angeles, Cal., Oct. 9, 1908. I hereby agree to assume the within lease assigned to me by the lessee and all responsibility thereunder from date. Ralph S. Hawkins. Charles H. Eager."

"Los Angeles, Cal., Oct. 9, 1908. I hereby accept Ralph S. Hawkins and Charles H. Eager as the lessees in the within lease. C. M. Straub."

These papers were all executed at the same time and constituted one transaction, whereby the assignment of the lease by De Munbrun to Hawkins was assented to by C. M. Straub, the lessor, in consideration of both Hawkins and Eager assuming the covenants therein contained. Not only the assignment of the lease, but the acceptance of the assignee as lessee, constituted a consideration for the promises implied by appellant in assuming all responsibility upon the lease from the date of such assignment. There was no error in the ruling upon the demurrer.

[3] It appears that a majority of the judges of the superior court of Los Angeles county joined in the making of an order providing for an extra session of said court, and likewise joined in a request to the Hon. William M. Conley, judge of the superior court of Madera county, asking him to preside over the same. The case was duly assigned for trial to the department of the court so in obedience to such request presided over by Judge Conley. At the commencement of the trial, appellant's attorney objected to the introduction of any evidence upon the ground that neither section 67b, Code of Civil Procedure, nor section 8, art. 6, of the Constitution, as amended, authorized a majority of the judges to request a judge of the superior court of another county to hold a superior court in Los Angeles county. "My position," stated counsel, "is that only one judge can require another judge to sit, and that the majority of the judges cannot." Granting the point can be raised in the manner here presented, as to which we express grave doubts, there is no merit in appellant's contention. Section 8, art. 6, of the Constitution, provides that, "A judge of any superior court may hold a superior court in any county, at the request of a judge of the superior court thereof"; and further provides: "There may be as many sessions of a superior court at the same time as there are judges thereof, including any judge or judges acting upon request." Since the greater contains the less (section 3536, Civ. Code), the request here made by seven of the judges would necessarily constitute a request made by one judge.

The appeal is without merit, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. E. Prewitt, Judge.

Action by V. Sartori against Mario Pozzi and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John C. Scott, of Oakland, for appellants. John V. Filippini, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. In this action the defendants, Mario Pozzi, August Borlini, and Valeria Borlini were sued as individuals and as copartners in a restaurant business, which it was alleged they had been conducting under the name of the "Borlini Café and Grill." The action was for the reasonable value of merchandise alleged to have been sold and delivered to the defendants, and resulted in a judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $554.88, from which and from an order denying a new trial the defendants appeal upon the single point that the evidence does not support the finding of the trial court, on the one hand, to the effect that the defendants were copartners, and, on the other hand, that the goods sued for were sold and delivered to them at their individual instance and request.

The facts of the case upon which the judgment is based are practically without conflict and are substantially as follows: The Borlini Café and Grill was originally conducted by the Borlini Company, a corporation, which was managed by the defendant August Borlini. The other two defendants each held one share of stock in the corporation. The Borlini Company became insolvent, and settled with its creditors, of whom the plaintiff was one, at 50 cents on the dollar. The defendant Mario Pozzi at that time advanced to the Borlini Company the sum of $2,350 for the purpose of enabling it to settle with its creditors, and thereupon and in consideration thereof the corporation executed to him a bill of sale of its entire business. Thereafter the Borlini Café and Grill continued in business for the period of about eight months, under the personal management of Mr. August Borlini and his wife, the defendant Valeria Borlini. At the expiration of this time it was sold and transferred by the defendant Mario Pozzi to a Mr. Polli for the sum of $4,200. The plaintiff had sold and delivered merchandise to the Borlini Company prior to and up to the time of its failure, and continued to deliver merchandise to the Borlini Café and Grill until it was sold and disposed of by the defendant Mario Pozzi. The claim here sued on is for merchandise supplied to the Grill after its transfer from the corporation to the defendant Mario Pozzi and while it was being personally conducted by the defendants August Borlini and his wife. Out of the sum of $4,200 received from the sale of the Grill to Mr. Polli, the defendant Mario Pozzi gave to the defendant August Borlini the sum of $1,000.

In addition to the foregoing there is some evidence to the effect that the defendant August Borlini and Valeria Borlini, his wife, and the sister of the defendant Mario Pozzi, were in constant attendance upon the business of the Grill. There was also some evidence to the effect that the defendant Mario Pozzi was often present at the Grill and at times actually attended to some of its business. The plaintiff testified in part to the effect that the defendant Mario Pozzi had admitted, shortly after the settlement of the Borlini Company with its creditors, that he had purchased the business, and from that time on would run it himself. This testimony was flatly contradicted by Mario Pozzi, who testified that after the business was transferred to him by the Borlini Company he leased it to the defendant August Borlini from month to month at a monthly rental of $25.

[1] It is apparent, it seems to us, that neither the admitted nor the disputed facts of the case are sufficient to support the trial court's finding of fact that a copartnership existed between the several defendants in the conduct of the business after it was transferred by the Borlini Company to the defendant Mario Pozzi. Nothing that was said or done at any time by any one or all of the defendants indicated the existence of a real or ostensible partnership; and therefore the finding of the trial court in this behalf cannot be sustained.

It is equally apparent that the evidence is insufficient to support the trial court's finding that the merchandise delivered to the Borlini Café and Grill was sold to the defendants August Borlini and Valeria Borlini at their individual instance and request. While it is true that these last-named defendants were in charge of the business at the time the merchandise was ordered and delivered, it is evident from the testimony upon the whole case that they were acting merely as the agents of the defendant Mario Pozzi. This being so, the judgment against them cannot stand.

[2] The evidence, however, was, we think, amply sufficient to support the findings upon which the individual judgment against the defendant Mario Pozzi is based. True, he testified that he had no interest in the business after the time he claimed to have leased it to his codefendants; but the trial court, in the face of facts and circumstances to the contrary, was not compelled to accept his testimony as the truth.

Upon the whole case the trial court was justified, we think, in finding, as it did in effect, that the business of the Borlini Café and Grill was in fact owned by the defendant Mario Pozzi, and was being conducted by his codefendants as his agents at the time the merchandise sued for was sold and delivered.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed as to all of the defendants save and except Mario Pozzi, and as to him the judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by J. M. Trindade against the Atwater Canning & Packing Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Jas. F. Peck, of Oakland, Terry W. Ward, of San Francisco, and W. B. Bunker, of Oakland, for appellant. F. W. Henderson, of Merced, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. [1] On motion plaintiff was given judgment on the pleadings, and the question to be decided on this appeal of the defendant is whether a stockholder and director of a corporation, who has paid his proportion of the corporate debts, can successfully maintain an action against said corporation for reimbursement for the amount which he has paid. The claim of respondent is that the action "is one on implied contract and based upon the law that where one, although himself under a liability to make a payment, pays a sum for which another is primarily liable, he may recover from the latter the amount so paid." In support of his position, among other authorities, he cites sections 2847 and 2848 of the Civil Code, providing for the obligation of the principal to the surety who has satisfied the claim, and the remedies which the latter is entitled to enforce against the former. There is no doubt of the doctrine as thus stated, but the foundation principle is manifestly that the parties sustain to each other the relation of principal and surety. In other words, this duty exists and may be enforced where the primary obligation rests upon the one from whom reimbursement is sought and where the one paying the debt has simply become responsible for the performance by the principal of an express or implied promise in favor of a third party. Under the Constitution, statute, and decisions of this state, however, the relation of principal and surety does not exist between the corporation and its stockholders. As is well known, each stockholder of the corporation, by virtue of section 322 of the Civil Code, based upon section 3, article 12, of the Constitution, is rendered liable individually and personally "for such proportion of all its debts and liabilities contracted or incurred during the time he was a stockholder as the amount of stock or shares owned by him bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock or shares of the corporation." The said section of the Code provides that the creditor "may institute joint or several actions against any of its stockholders for the proportion of his claim payable by each, and in such action the court must ascertain the proportion of the claim or debt for which each defendant is liable, and a several judgment must be rendered against each, in conformity therewith." The creditor is not required to sue the corporation at all, and there is certainly nothing in the language of the statute that would seem to contemplate an action by the stockholder against the corporation for reimbursement. The responsibility of the stockholder is apparently considered and treated as independent and primary and we find it so declared by the Supreme Court.

In M., etc., M. Co. v. Woodbury, 14 Cal. 267, it is said: "It would seem, from a just and reasonable construction of the constitutional and statutory provisions upon this subject, that an individual corporator, in respect to his personal liability for the debts of the corporation, does not occupy the position of a surety, but that of a principal debtor. His responsibility commences with that of the corporation, and continues during the existence of the indebtedness. It is not in any sense contingent, but is declared to be absolute and unconditional. The remedial effect of these provisions, in which consists their only value, should not be impaired by construction. Similar provisions in other states have generally been construed in the same manner. It has frequently been decided that the members of a corporation, who are answerable personally for the corporate debts and liabilities, stand in the same position, in relation to the creditors of the corporation, as if they were conducting their business as a common partnership."

In Young v. Rosenbaum, 39 Cal. 654, it is declared, through Chief Justice Rhodes, that "the stockholders are not sureties of the corporation, but are principal debtors. A judgment against the corporation does not extinguish or suspend the liability of the stockholders, and it clearly does not merge it. The remedy against the corporation may, for some cause, be suspended, or, perhaps, barred without impairing the remedy against the stockholders, because the liability of the latter is primary, and is conditional or contingent only in this: that there must be a subsisting debt against the corporation."

In Morrow v. Superior Court, 64 Cal. 386, 1 Pac. 355, it is said: "As to the primary liability of the stockholders of the company for its debts, we entertain no doubt. * * * The liability of the stockholder is, in our opinion, as distinct and separate from that of the corporation as it would be if the act had made no provision for any other liability than that of the stockholders for the debts of the company."

A similar view, with the citation of a large number of authorities, is announced in section 4802 of Thompson on Corporations (2d Ed.) as follows: "The liability imposed by constitutions and statutes on stockholders for the debts of the corporation is now held and recognized generally as primary and not secondary. The conclusion, therefore, is that stockholders under such provisions do not occupy the position of surety to the corporation. Their liability is not only primary, but generally is direct to the creditors, and may be enforced without any proceedings whatever against the corporation, unless a suit against the corporation is made a condition precedent."

It is true, as pointed out by the learned author in section 4803 et seq., that by the wording of the statutes in many of the states the liability imposed upon the stockholders is secondary to that of the corporation itself, and therefore it has been held in those states that the stockholders sustain the relation of surety or guarantor. This circumstance explains the apparent conflict in some of the decisions. The utterances of our Supreme Court upon the subject, however, seem to be entirely harmonious. Some importance is attached by respondent to the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Crockett in Prince v. Lynch, 38 Cal. 535, 99 Am. Dec. 427, but it is hardly necessary to state that we are required to attach more importance to the opinion of the court therein, prepared by Chief Justice Sawyer, wherein it is declared, on page 532 of 38 Cal., 99 Am. Dec. 427, that: "The stockholder is not a surety in any sense of the term. He is under the Constitution and the statute primarily liable in the same sense as the corporation is primarily liable. The same identical act which casts the liability on the corporation also casts it on the stockholder. These are not separate contracts.

The stockholder does not stand in the position of an indorser or guarantor."

Nor do we find any comfort for respondent in Knowles v. Sandercock, 107 Cal. 629, 40 Pac. 1047, cited by him. The question there in relation to the point was one of pleading. It was properly held that the debt of the corporation must be averred as such and the showing that it was incurred while defendant was a stockholder fixed his statutory liability; the court saying: "The stockholder is, perhaps, not strictly liable on the contract, but on the statute. Still, if the debt of the corporation is created by a written contract, the debt of the corporation must be pleaded in the usual mode." We can find in the statutes or decisions of this state—we repeat—no warrant for the assumed position that said relation of principal and surety exists, and thus is the foundation of respondent's main contention swept away.

[2] The only other ground upon which with any degree of plausibility the action can be supported is that afforded by the principle of equitable subrogation in its broadest application as recognized by the authorities. In 37 Cyc. 363, for instance, it is said: "The doctrine is one of equity and benevolence and like contribution and other similar equitable rights was adopted from the civil law and its basis is the doing of complete, essential and perfect justice between all the parties without regard to form and its object is the prevention of injustice." On page 370 et seq. it is further stated that: "Formerly the right of subrogation was limited to transactions between principals and sureties, but it is no longer confined to cases of strict suretyship, but is broad enough to include every instance in which one party is required to pay a debt for which another is primarily answerable, and which in equity and good conscience ought to be discharged by the latter and in the mode which equity adopts to compel the ultimate discharge of the debt by him, who in good conscience ought to pay it, and to relieve him whom none but the creditor could ask to pay, * * * and, as its purpose is only to prevent fraud or subvert justice, it will not be applied where its exercise would promote injustice and thus can be applied only with a due regard to the legal and equitable rights of others." But the same author, on page 374, declares that subrogation is not allowed "in favor of him who pays a debt in performance of his own covenants, for the right of subrogation never follows an actual primary liability and there can be no right of subrogation in one whose duty it is to pay," and many cases are cited in support of the text.

Substantially the same statement of the doctrine is made by Sheldon on Subrogation, quoted in Redington v. Cornwell, 90 Cal. 58, 27 Pac. 42, as follows: "It is treated as the creature of equity, and is so administered as to secure real and essential justice, without regard to form and is independent of any contractual relation between the parties to be affected by it. It is broad enough to include every instance in which one party pays a debt for which another is primarily answerable, and which in equity and good conscience should have been discharged by the latter, * * * and it is not allowed where it would work any injustice to the rights of others." As we have already seen, respondent simply discharged his statutory and primary liability when he paid his proportion of the debt, and therefore, within the principle stated by the aforesaid authorities, he is not entitled to subrogation. But, looking at the question from a somewhat different viewpoint, a judgment for plaintiff under the circumstances would, or might, at least, operate to work an injustice to the rights of others. The probable effect would be the appropriation by plaintiff of all the assets of the corporation. This means an interference with the business of the corporation and a preference for one stockholder, who is also a director, to the disadvantage of other stockholders.

[3] As to the the former contingency, it will not be disputed that "each shareholder is entitled to have the capital stock of the corporation preserved unimpaired for the purpose of carrying on the business which the corporation was organized to perform." 10 Cyc. 551. Nor does it appear to us according "to equity and good conscience" to allow plaintiff to exhaust the funds to the detriment of others similarly situated. The stockholders are, of course, equal before the law, and none of them should have a better right than the others to appropriate the funds of the corporation for the payment of his particular claim. Of course, if the corporation were solvent, this feature of the case would not be entitled to such consideration. But, upon respondent's theory of subrogation, the stockholders who have paid their proportion of the liabilities become creditors, and the result is that the corporation is hopelessly insolvent.

[4] There would seem to be no difference, equitably considered, if, instead of a judgment for plaintiff, the corporation had preferred respondent, and, with knowledge of the claims of the other stockholders, had directed the remaining funds to be appropriated for the payment of plaintiff's demand. There is a conflict in the decisions of different jurisdictions, it is true, as to whether this should be permitted, but the more equitable view is that expressed by Mr. Freeman and quoted in section 6192 of Thompson on Corporations as follows: "When a corporation has become insolvent, every director must, as a general rule, be chargeable with notice of such insolvency, either because he actually has such notice or because his failure to have it cannot exist without his being negligent in the discharge of the duties of his office. * * *

The usual rule of allowing a race between creditors, and of rewarding the most diligent by permitting him to retain the fruits of his diligence, cannot be fairly applied between creditors, some of whom are directors or managing officers of a corporation and others of whom are not. The early start which the special knowledge of the director would permit and incite him to make will but rarely fail to enable him to distance all competitors. The only just and equitable rule, therefore, is one which will wrest from him the fruits of every form of device by which a preference may be sought, whether it be payment, security, assignment, or by judicial proceedings taken by him whether actually aided or not by his fellow directors."

The facts alleged in the pleadings bring this case, as we view it, within the compass of the foregoing principles. It appears that in October, 1910, the Merced Security Savings Bank and the Commercial Savings Bank of Merced commenced separate actions against the stockholders of defendant corporation to secure from them their proportional share of the debts due from defendant herein to said banks. The aggregate indebtedness was over $40,000. The subscribed capital stock of appellant corporation was 1,288½ shares, held by about 50 individuals, whose holdings ranged from 1 share to 340 shares. In January, 1911, all the stockholders, except four, paid their pro rata of said debts or suffered default judgments to be taken against them for the amounts due. Plaintiff was one of said four who appeared in the action by demurrer. Thereafter he voluntarily paid his proportion of said debts, and immediately brought the present action to recover of defendant the amount which he paid, to wit, the sum of $744.97. When he filed his complaint herein, the actions brought by said banks against the other three stockholders were still pending. The amount of the assets of defendant corporation does not exceed $1,000. Upon the theory of respondent as to his rights, it is thus to be seen what an advantage he secured by his speed in instituting the present action. We think, however, for the reasons already stated, that his vigilance should not be thus rewarded. The other stockholders, it is true, have not intervened, but the facts are fully set forth in the pleadings, and, if there is to be a virtual dissolution of the corporation and distribution of the remaining assets, the other stockholders should be brought in by order of the court that there may be an equitable disposition of the whole matter.

The view we have taken is in harmony with the decision of the Supreme Court in Sacramento Bank v. Pacific Bank, 124 Cal.

147, 56 Pac. 787, 45 L. R. A. 863, 71 Am. St. Rep. 36, wherein it is said: "Under the Constitution and statutes of this state, each stockholder may be compelled to pay to the corporation assessments to the full amount of his subscription to the capital stock of the corporation for the payment of creditors of such corporation, and also be individually liable to each creditor for such proportion of his claim as the amount of stock held by said stockholder bears to the whole of the capital stock. The two liabilities and the remedies based thereon are concurrent.

* * * It follows, then, that whatever the intervenor has paid, either directly to the corporation in the way of assessments, or on account of his personal liability as a stockholder directly to the creditor, he was bound to pay under the law and can recover no portion back either by subrogation or otherwise." In that action the intervenor was a stockholder in the defendant bank, and, by virtue of his statutory liability, had been compelled to pay his proportion of its indebtedness to plaintiff therein and he therefore made the claim that he was entitled to be subrogated to that extent in and to plaintiff's right to the dividend declared by the directors of the defendant corporation. While the facts, of course, were different, that case bears a striking analogy to this and the principle enunciated therein, we think, is controlling herein.

There is no harshness, we may say, in the rule we have announced. When the corporation is organized, the stockholders assume the burdens imposed by the statute. Each one is presumed to know that the Legislature has prescribed the measure of his liability, and has not provided that the creditor shall first bring his action against the corporation, or that the stockholder who pays his proportion of the indebtedness can look to the corporation for reimbursement. The stockholder takes this risk in view of the prospect of gain and to relieve him of it in the way attempted by respondent would be virtually to render nugatory the said statutory provision.

Without more particular specification, we may add that, if the doctrine espoused by respondent should be recognized by the courts, it might and would lead to serious complications in corporate liabilities, would likely work grievous injustice to many stockholders, and would greatly hamper the business and impair the usefulness of many corporations, and, furthermore, we cannot see that it is demanded by any requirement of the law or principle of equity and fair dealing.

The judgment is reversed.

KARRY et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SAN JOAQUIN COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 893.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 30, 1911.)

This opinion is referred to in the dissenting opinion published in 122 Pac. 475.

BURNETT, J. This is a proceeding in certiorari and grows out of the following situation: On April 22, 1909, in the superior court of the county of San Joaquin, an action was brought by E. Gjurich, one of the petitioners herein, against one Fanny Fieg, to recover the sum of $5,000 for alleged services. Thereupon a writ of attachment was issued and levied upon certain real and personal property of the defendant in the action. The undertaking for said attachment was executed by A. T. Karry and Herman Wendel, petitioners herein, and provided that they "do jointly and severally undertake in the sum of $400, and promise to the effect that, if the defendant recover judgment in said action, the said plaintiff will pay all costs that may be awarded to the defendant and all damages which he may sustain by reason of said attachment, not exceeding the sum of $400." The action was tried, and on June 10, 1910, judgment rendered in favor of the defendant Fieg for costs in the sum of $145.71. On June 14th, following, notice of appeal from said judgment was given, and on the same day the said Gjurich filed his undertaking on appeal with the clerk of the court. For the purpose of continuing in force the said attachment during the pendency of said appeal, the said Gjurich, on June 15, 1910, filed an undertaking in due form, according to the provisions of section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in the sum of $10,000, being double the amount of the debt claimed by said Gjurich, to secure the payment to said Fieg of all costs and damages which she might sustain by reason of said attachment. On the 1st day of July, 1910, while the aforesaid action was pending on appeal in the Supreme Court, the said Fieg brought an action in the justice court of O'Neal township, in said county, against petitioners herein, to recover said costs and damages claimed by reason of said attachment. The defendants appeared and pleaded in abatement the pendency of said appeal in the Supreme Court and the giving of said undertaking to continue the attachment in force. The justice court awarded judgment to the plaintiff therein as prayed for. The defendants thereupon appealed to the superior court of said county and, after a trial before Hon. J. A. Plummer, judgment was rendered in favor of said plaintiff, Fieg, and against the said defendants, the petitioners herein, for $145.71, the amount of the judgment recovered in the first-mentioned action.

As a return to the order to show cause issued by this court, a demurrer was filed and also a certified copy of the proceedings in the court below, sufficiently ample for the purposes of this decision. For convenience of reference, we shall hereafter designate the original action brought by Gjurich against Fieg as No. 1 and the action brought by Fieg against petitioners here to recover her costs and damages as No. 2.

The first question in order of sequence is, seemingly: What was the effect upon the judgment of the appeal in action No. 1? As to this, in view of the provisions of the statute and the decisions of the appellate courts, there can be, apparently, no kind of doubt. Section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that: "Whenever an appeal is perfected as provided in the preceding sections of this chapter, it stays all further proceedings in the court below upon the judgment or order appealed from, or upon the matters embraced therein, * * * but the court below may proceed upon any other matter embraced in the action and not affected by the order appealed from. * * * An appeal does not continue in force an attachment unless an undertaking be executed and filed on the part of the appellant by at least two sureties, in double the amount of the debt claimed by him, that the appellant will pay all costs and damages which the respondent may sustain by reason of the attachment in case the order of the court below be sustained; and unless, within four days after the entry of the order appealed from such appeal be perfected." Section 949 of the same Code is, as far as it goes, to the same effect and is as follows: "In cases not provided for in sections nine hundred and forty-two, nine hundred and forty-three, nine hundred and forty-four, and nine hundred and forty-five, the perfection of an appeal by giving the undertaking or making the deposit mentioned in section nine hundred and forty-one, stays all proceedings in the court below upon any judgment or order appealed from, except where it directs the sale of perishable property." It is not disputed that the appeal here was perfected as required by the statute.

If we are to give effect to the simple, unequivocal terms of the law, unless we have a case within some of the exceptions mentioned, it necessarily follows that no step could be taken legally to enforce or carry into execution or to impair or modify in any respect said judgment during the pendency of said appeal. It is apparent, indeed, from an examination of the foregoing provisions relating to the exceptions, that they have no application to the case at bar. In fact, there can be and is no pretense that any of them is germane to the question before us except possibly said section 942, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that, "if the appeal be from a judgment or order directing the the payment of money, it does not stay the execution of the judgment or order unless a written undertaking be executed on the part of the appellant by two or more sureties, to the effect that they are bound in double the amount named in the judgment or order," etc. But a judgment for costs is not a judgment directing the payment of money in the sense of the statute. The judgment under review was essentially that plaintiff take nothing and, as an incident thereto, that defendant be allowed her costs.

If additional assurance of the foregoing be sought, we may find it in the decisions at hand.

In Snow v. Holmes, 64 Cal. 232, 30 Pac. 806, it was held that, on appeal from a judgment of foreclosure of a mortgage upon personal property, the undertaking in the sum of $300 is sufficient to stay the execution of a judgment pending the appeal.

In re Schedel, 69 Cal. 241, 10 Pac. 334, involved the effect of an appeal from a decree of distribution, and the general rule was held to apply, and it was declared that "sections 942 to 945, inclusive, apply to appellants who are required to perform the directions of the judgment or order appealed from. This is manifest from their language."

In Pennie v. Superior Court, 89 Cal. 31, 26 Pac. 617, it was held that, on appeal from an order requiring the administrator to pay a family allowance to a certain claimant, an undertaking in the sum of $300 stayed all proceedings, and that an order made after said appeal directing the administrator to make the payment is beyond the jurisdiction of the superior court and should be annulled upon certiorari.

So, in Powers v. Chabot, 93 Cal. 266, 28 Pac. 1070, it was held that, since no bond is required to stay execution in addition to the usual bond for costs on appeal from a judgment foreclosing a chattel mortgage, a bond given upon such appeal, to secure a judgment for deficiency, is not a statutory bond and is without consideration and void.

In McCallion v. Hibernia, etc., Society, 98 Cal. 445, 33 Pac. 330, it is said: "As to that portion of the judgment awarding costs against appellants, a stay bond was not required to restrain the issuance of an execution to recover such costs. The appeal bond effected that object. The real judgment in the case is that plaintiffs are the owners of the money, and, no stay bond being required by the statute as to such a judgment, no stay bond is demanded as to the costs. The costs taxed against the defendant were incidental to the judgment, and as to a stay of execution, inseparably connected therewith. A judgment for costs is not the judgment directing the payment of money contemplated by section 942. If such were the fact, a stay bond would be required in almost every conceivable case, when to the contrary, it is only required in the four cases covered by sections 942 to 945 of the Code."

It must be apparent that even the exceptions provided for in the Code present a somewhat anomalous situation. It seems rather peculiar that an execution based upon and presupposing a judgment should be permitted before there really is a judgment in the proper sense of the term. "A judgment is the final determination of the rights of the parties in an action or proceeding" (Code Civ. Proc. § 577), and, "until litigation on the merits is ended, there is no finality to the judgment, in the sense of a final determination of the rights of the parties, although it may have become final for the purpose of an appeal from it." Gillmore v. American C. I. Co., 65 Cal. 63, 2 Pac. 882. In the exceptional cases referred to, however, the "judgment" signifies the determination by the trial court of the rights of the parties; but those cases should not, obviously, be enlarged beyond the terms of the statute.

The next inquiry is: What was the basis for the complaint or the cause of action in No. 2 upon which plaintiff relied for recovery? It is contended by respondent that the action was brought upon the undertaking in attachment and that the suit was not brought on the judgment in action No. 1. In a sense it must be true that said undertaking is the basis for the action. The undertaking constituted a contract for the payment of money under certain conditions. But it is as clear as anything can be that the obligation imposed upon the sureties on that undertaking was a conditional one, contingent upon the happening or existence of certain facts. The sureties bound themselves to pay only "if the defendant recover judgment in said action." Said recovery of judgment in No. 1 was and is, therefore, an essential element in the cause of action in No. 2. The recovery of judgment was the circumstance agreed upon to fix the liability of the sureties and make it absolute instead of conditional. "A suit on a bond cannot be commenced before there is any breach of the bond." Cook v. Ceas, 143 Cal. 226, 77 Pac. 65. While it may not be said, probably, that the recovery of judgment in action No. 1 is the sole cause of action in No. 2, it must be conceded that no cause of action could have been stated without an averment that said judgment had been recovered, and the said action could not be maintained without proving that judgment was rendered for defendant in action No. 1. But there is no principle better established than that sureties may stand upon the strict letter of their undertaking and its terms must be strictly construed in their favor. Indeed, since it is a statutory bond, it is reasonable to hold that the terms used therein which are defined by the statute were used in such statutory sense. Therefore the action against the sureties was premature for the reason that no judgment has as yet been rendered in action No. 1; the action being still pending on appeal, and the "judgment" referred to meaning the final determination of the rights of the parties.

But, again, the sureties promised to pay "all costs that may be awarded to the defendant and all damages which he may sustain by reason of said attachment." What does the term "costs" comprehend? Considered in connection with the preceding clause in reference to the recovery of judgment, it can simply mean that the sureties will pay all costs that may be awarded to the defendant therein by the judgment in action No. 1; in other words, whatever judgment for costs that may be rendered. By said judgment, therefore, if rendered, is the fact of their liability fixed and the extent of their liability determined. Thus it is clearly disclosed that the judgment in action No. 1 is the basis for action No. 2. But it is settled beyond controversy that "an action will not lie upon a judgment until it has become final." Feeney v. Hinckley, 134 Cal. 468, 66 Pac. 580 (86 Am. St. Rep. 290). "Until that time has arrived, no cause of action upon the judgment has accrued." Hills v. Sherwood, 33 Cal. 474. In Cook v. Ceas, supra, it is said: "It has been held here in a great number and great variety of cases that so long as an action or proceeding is pending in this sense the judgment or order from which an appeal has been or may be taken cannot be made the basis of any new action."

There is only one other possible application of the term "costs" as used in said undertaking, and that is to refer it to the expense that may be incurred by reason of the attachment. But, under said construction, it is apparent that no ground for the action exists, since the attachment is still in force by virtue of the said $10,000 bond. There could be no breach of the undertaking to pay the costs and damages caused by the levy of the writ of attachment while the property is still lawfully subject to said writ. We presume this will not be disputed.

The result of the foregoing discussion, as we conceive it, is that the trial court awarded judgment upon a cause of action that had not arisen and that may never arise by reason of the disposition hereafter of said appeal to the Supreme Court. It may be stated, also, that if respondents should be upheld petitioners will be required to pay the money, although it may be subsequently determined that defendant in action No. 1 is not entitled to judgment for costs. Whereas, if the action of the court below is annulled, plaintiff in No. 2 is abundantly protected by the said $10,000 bond.

No doubt this was given consideration by the learned trial judge, but it appears from his opinion that he felt constrained by the decision in Bailey v. Aetna Indemnity Co., 5 Cal. App. 740, 91 Pac. 416. In our opinion, however, that case is easily distinguishable from this. There an action was brought and a writ of attachment was levied upon property belonging to the defendant. A bond was thereupon given by defendant for the release of said property, and it was accordingly relieved from the lien of said levy. Judgment was obtained by plaintiff in the action, and there was no stay of execution. A writ of execution was thereupon issued and returned unsatisfied. The very conditions existed, therefore, which were necessary to fix the liability of the sureties on the bond given to release the attachment, and a judgment against them was properly upheld. This is made clear by reference to sections 552, 554, and 555 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The last two provide for the release of the attachment upon the giving of an undertaking, and they prescribe the terms of said undertaking; and section 552 provides that "if the execution be returned unsatisfied, in whole or in part, the plaintiff may prosecute any undertaking given pursuant to section five hundred and forty or section five hundred and fifty-five, or he may proceed, as in other cases, upon the return of an execution." Here, as we have seen, no execution on the original judgment was issued or could be legally, and the liability of the sureties is contingent and not absolute.

The remaining question is as to the remedy. Herein it is claimed that at most a mere error was committed not in excess of jurisdiction and that it cannot be reached by certiorari.

We deem it unnecessary to discuss the function and scope of this writ, as the subject has received ample consideration from various courts. Reference may profitably be had to the following decisions, among others, of our Supreme Court: Monreal v. County Judge, 46 Cal. 79; Reynolds v. Co. Ct. San Joaquin, 47 Cal. 604; In re Schedel, 69 Cal. 241, 10 Pac. 334; Pennie v. Sup. Ct., 89 Cal. 31, 26 Pac. 617; Buckley v. Superior Court, 96 Cal. 119, 31 Pac. 8; Stewart v. Superior Court, 100 Cal. 543, 35 Pac. 156, 563; Holbrook v. Superior Court, 106 Cal. 589, 39 Pac. 936; Schwartz v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 106, 43 Pac. 580; McClatchy v. Superior Court, 119 Cal. 413, 51 Pac. 696, 39 L. R. A. 691; Daly v. Ruddell, 129 Cal. 300, 61 Pac. 1080; Stumpf v. Board of Supervisors, 131 Cal. 364, 63 Pac. 663, 82 Am. St. Rep. 350.

It may be said as to these cases that they are substantially consistent in their exposition of the nature of the writ and of the legal principles involved in its operation, but in the application of those principles to the diverse facts of the various cases we find quite a contrariety of opinion. This is not surprising, since it is manifestly a question of great difficulty, at times, to determine whether an error is jurisdictional or not and what facts are essential to clothe the court with legal authority to proceed with the trial of an action.

It is confidently asserted, though, that if the situation here is understood, authority for the issuance of the writ will not be hard to find and such authority will be recognized as consonant with well-established principles of law.

To reiterate somewhat, the case is essentially this: A judgment was rendered in a certain action. An appeal was taken which ipso facto, stayed all proceedings upon that judgment. Nevertheless, another action was brought, based upon said judgment and which constituted in effect an attempt to make said judgment operative and to carry it into execution. The prosecution of this proceeding was permitted by the trial court. It would be no different in principle if the court had allowed an execution to be issued and levied to satisfy said judgment. Since all proceedings upon said judgment looking towards its enforcement were and are stayed by the plain provisions of the statute, no court has any legal authority—in other words, any jurisdiction—to entertain a proceeding to appropriate the fruits of the litigation while that litigation is still pending and undetermined.

In re Schedel, supra, decided that a writ of supersedeas should issue to stay proceedings on a decree of distribution of the estate of a deceased testator pending an appeal therefrom by a legatee. The writ of supersedeas is "an auxiliary process designed to supersede the enforcement of the judgment of the court below brought up by a writ of error for review." Williams v. Bruffy, 102 U. S. 249, 26 L. Ed. 135. It is issued because of the want of jurisdiction to enforce the judgment. It stays a threatened step towards execution. The effect is the same as the annulment by certiorari of steps that have already been taken for the enforcement of a judgment whose operation has been suspended.

In Pennie v. Superior Court, as we have already seen, the order directing the payment of the family allowance was annulled on certiorari.

Stewart v. Superior Court involved the application for a writ of review to annul an order of the court below adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt for the disobedience of its judgment. It was held that the appeal in the original action operated as a supersedeas against the judgment, and that, since said petitioners did nothing except to restore the property to the condition that existed at the time said judgment was rendered, there was no contempt on their part, and the order adjudging them guilty was annulled on certiorari.

So, in Daly v. Ruddell, 129 Cal. 300, 61 Pac. 1080, it was held that a supersedeas would issue to restrain the lower court from taking any action to enforce a judgment in reference to the laying of a pipe line where there was an appeal from said judgment pending in the Supreme Court.

We think it reasonably certain, upon principle and under the foregoing and other authorities, that this is a proper case for certiorari, and the demurrer is overruled, and the judgment of the lower court is set aside and annulled.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Isabella Black against J. F. Riley. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. E. Wright and Crittenden Thornton, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Edwin H. Williams, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HALL, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and the order of the court denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The action was brought to recover the sum of $930, alleged to have been wrongfully retained and converted to his own use, out of a sum of $2,500, alleged to have been collected by defendant for and on behalf of plaintiff as her attorney.

The answer is in substance and effect that, though defendant did collect the sum of $2,500, only the sum of $1,366.51 was the property of plaintiff, and that the balance thereof, according to agreement between plaintiff and defendant, was the property of defendant as and for his fee for services rendered to plaintiff. The action was tried before a jury, and resulted in a verdict for the sum of $930 in favor of plaintiff.

The general facts of the case are that plaintiff asserted a claim to certain moneys on deposit in three different banks in San Francisco, standing on the books of said banks in the names of Sophia Moore and plaintiff. The moneys, to the amount of $13,611.18, had been deposited by Sophia Moore, who had since died.

Plaintiff employed defendant as her attorney in the matter, and he procured a settlement with the administrator of the estate of said Sophia Moore, whereby there was paid to plaintiff the sum of $2,500 in full settlement of her claim. This money was paid by check drawn to the order of plaintiff, but the check was retained by defendant until presented to the bank for payment, when plaintiff, for the purpose of procuring payment, wrote her name on the back thereof, at the direction of defendant, but without seeing or knowing the amount thereof, as she claimed, upon which it was presented to the bank by defendant, and the money placed upon the counter and at once taken into the possession of the defendant, who shortly afterward, on the same day, turned over to plaintiff the sum of $1,366.51, and gave her a receipt in full for his services in the matter. Such receipt, however, stated no amount.

Plaintiff's theory of the case, which is supported by the evidence given by her, is that defendant was employed by her as her attorney in the matter, and that as her attorney he collected for her $2,500 with little trouble, and after only three interviews with the attorneys representing the estate, and, without any agreement as to his fee, retained for his own use all but $1,366.51, and in so doing, not only failed to inform her of the amount for which he had settled, but, in fact, concealed from her such knowledge, and that the amount retained was to the extent of $930 in excess of the reasonable value of his services. Defendant, on the other hand, claimed that at the time of his employment, and as a part of the terms thereof, it was agreed between plaintiff and defendant that he should be entitled to all that he should succeed in obtaining for her in excess of the amount on deposit in the German Savings & Loan Society, which amount turned out to be $1,366.51. His testimony tended to support this theory of the case, and also that he informed her, when he turned over to her such sum, of the amount he had collected.

[1] The record presents a clear case of a conflict of evidence as to the matters really in controversy, and for that reason the verdict of the jury cannot be disturbed as not supported by the evidence.

[2] The second point urged by the appellant is that "the action is misconceived, and, if any action at all will lie against the defendant, it should be in equity." Precisely the same contention was made, and the same authorities cited by the appellant, in Cox v. Delmas, 99 Cal. 104, 112, 33 Pac. 836, a case in all its essential features similar to the case at bar, and in which the judgment was sustained, though the action was, as is the one at bar, an action at law for money had and received. "The action for money had and received may be maintained whenever an equity arises from the circumstances that one has money which he ought to pay to another." Quimby v. Lyon, 63 Cal. 394. The testimony of plaintiff, if true, showed such a case, and the action was therefore properly brought at law to recover money had and received for the account of plaintiff.

[3] The court refused to give an instruction requested by defendant as follows: "You are instructed that an attorney dealing with a person about to become a client as to his contract for payment for services occupies no different position than any other two persons contracting for payment of services. No presumption of undue influence applies to a transaction where an attorney is in a hostile attitude to his client, nor in case of the contract by which the relation of attorney and client is originally created and the compensation of the attorney fixed." The court was justified in so doing. While the first and last propositions stated are correct statements of the law, it is not true that "no presumption of undue influence applies to a transaction where an attorney is in a hostile attitude to his client," and the authority cited by appellant in support of such proposition does not sustain him. It is said in Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 156 Cal. 510, 105 Pac. 981, that "the presumption does not apply to a transaction in which the attorney openly assumes a hostile attitude to his client." (Italics are ours.) This is a very different proposition from the one that "no presumption of undue influence applies to a transaction where an attorney is in a hostile attitude to his client." Whenever an attorney, for his own benefit, deals with his client, in regard to property that is the subject of his employment, he is in a hostile attitude to his client, but is still bound to the exercise of the utmost good faith toward his client in such transaction, and the burden is upon him to rebut the presumption of undue influence. It is only when he openly assumes a hostile attitude that his transactions with his client will be free from the presumption of undue influence on the part of the attorney. Cooley v. Miller & Lux, supra. The court, therefore, did not err in refusing the requested instruction.

[4] The court gave as an instruction an extract that it read from the case of Cox v. Delmas, 99 Cal. 123, 33 Pac. 836, in regard to the duty of the attorney to act with entire fairness in dealings with his client, and to which the court added: "That rule of law applies where the relation of client and attorney exists between two parties, and where in a matter relating to the business or affairs of the client, intrusted to the attorney as such, in any dealing of that kind, whereby an advantage is procured or obtained by the attorney from the client, the law requires the fairest and most conscientious dealings upon his part, because, upon transactions of that character, it looks with a jealous scrutiny." No complaint can be justly made of the law as read from Cox v. Delmas, or as stated by the court, as an abstract proposition. Appellant, however, claims that it was not pertinent to the facts of this case. It was perfectly pertinent to the theory of the facts as testified to by plaintiff, which we have heretofore detailed in substance.

[5] It is claimed that the court erred in omitting the last sentence from the following instruction requested by defendant: "You are instructed that the contract of employment between an attorney and a client need not be in writing, and that an attorney can agree to perform his services on a contingency. And if the client agrees to employ the attorney, and pay him for his services all over a certain sum which he may recover for him, said contract will be enforced, unless fraud was used by the attorney in securing the contract." So far as the last sentence correctly states the law, it is substantially covered by the first sentence. The omitted sentence is not an accurate statement of the law, for not only may such a contract be avoided if procured by fraud, but the same result follows if procured through undue influence or mistake.

Some other minor matters have been called to our attention by appellant, which we do not think necessary to notice in detail.

The verdict of the jury finds sufficient support in the evidence given by the plaintiff. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: LENNON, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Ejectment by William Main against Susan A. Thornton and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

N. C. Coldwell, of San Francisco, and Frank H. Short and F. E. Cook, both of Fresno, for appellant. M. K. Harris, of Fresno, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action in ejectment in which the complaint alleges ownership and right of possession in plaintiff to the W. ½ of section 4, township 15 south, range 19 west, situated in Fresno county, wrongful possession of which is alleged to be in defendants. Defendants had findings and judgment. Plaintiff appeals from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

It was stipulated at the trial that title was in the defendants "subject to, and unless the same has been, divested by the assessments, taxes, tax proceedings and tax deeds introduced in evidence as hereinafter set forth, * * * and that the only question concerning the title to the property between plaintiff and defendants relates to the regularity and sufficiency of the tax deeds and proceedings introduced in evidence with relation thereto, as herein in this bill of exceptions referred to." In his opening brief plaintiff claims title by virtue of the following deeds: July 18, 1899, J. B. Hancock, tax collector of Fresno county, to the state, "conveying to the state the S. W. ¼, section 4/15/19; also, June 25, 1903, deed from said tax collector to the state, "for the N. W. ¼, section 4/15/19"; also July 27, 1903, authorization of the state controller to the tax collector of Fresno county "to sell at public auction the said S. W. ¼, section 4/15/19, sold to the state July 3, 1894. And also N. W. ¼, section 4/15/19, sold to the state June 24, 1898"; also that, pursuant to such authorization, the tax collector of said county, "by deed dated the 22d day of August, 1903, sold the S. W. ¼, section 4/15/19 to the plaintiff, William Main; and that on the 22d day of August, 1903, said tax collector, in pursuance of such authorization, sold to the plaintiff, William Main, the N. W. ¼, section 4/15/19."

In his opening brief appellant states that, "In the absence of any specific objection to their sufficiency (the proceedings set forth in the transcript), we rest upon the presumption that 'official duty has been regularly performed.'" Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 15. And upon section 3786 of the Political Code, making a tax deed "primary evidence," and section 3787 of the same Code, "declaring that such deed shall be conclusive evidence of the regularity of all other proceedings, from the assessment by the assessor, inclusive, up to the execution of the deed." Claiming that, as the deeds are sufficient on their face, "it is the duty of the party attacking them," says the brief, "to show to the court by these records * * * that they are insufficient to vest title in the state," citing Klumpke v. Baker, 131 Cal. 81, 63 Pac. 137, 676, and other cases. Awaiting the announcement of defendants' objections, plaintiff does not attempt to show the regularity of the proceedings under which he claims title. This was, perhaps, logical and not unfair to the court, although an appellant is usually expected to state the grounds on which a reversal is asked. But after the objections were fully pointed out by the respondents, plaintiff filed no reply brief, and, in submitting the matter contents himself with calling attention again to the fact that the southwest quarter of the section was twice sold to the state and, "as to the multiple attacks made on the proceedings affecting the northwest quarter, we submit the same on the record." If we have fallen into error in reaching a conclusion, appellant cannot claim to have aided us very much to avoid it; and, if we have been so fortunate as to reach a right conclusion, it will be largely due to our being guided by the uncontroverted statements of fact found in the record as pointed out by respondents. The tax proceedings in relation to the two parcels are separate and will be so considered.

[1] The southwest quarter: This parcel was assessed for taxes for the year 1893, and, the taxes not being paid, the land was sold to the state on July 3, 1894. Basing his deed on said sale made in July, 1894, the tax collector conveyed the land to the state July 18, 1899. As the law stood in July, 1894, when the sale was made to the state, it provided that if the land is not redeemed within the time allowed for redemption, a deed should be made to the purchaser, but a provision in the law continued the right of redemption for an indefinite period and until the notice therein required is given the owner by the purchaser. The tax deed created no presumption that the law requiring notice to be given had been complied with.

[2] The law existing in 1894 governed the case and regulated the right of redemption. Miller v. Miller, 96 Cal. 376, 31 Pac. 247, 31 Am. St. Rep. 229; Reed v. Lyon, 96 Cal. 501, 31 Pac. 619; Walsh v. Burke, 134 Cal. 594, 66 Pac. 866; Johnson v. Taylor, 150 Cal. 201, 208, 88 Pac. 903, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 818, 119 Am. St. Rep. 181. The statute applied to the state as a purchaser. San Francisco & Fresno L. Co. v. Banbury, 106 Cal. 129, 132, 39 Pac. 439. The case of Johnson v. Taylor, supra, is quite like the case here and discusses the questions fully.

[3] As the owners' right to redeem the southwest quarter remained until the provisions of section 3785, Political Code, were complied with, and as they were not complied with, plaintiff's tax deed conferred no title.

[4] The tax collector undertook to cure the title by again selling the land to the state in July, 1895, and making a deed in 1900. But section 3813 of the Political Code expressly provided that the land should not be again exposed to sale. The law provided for assessing the land, and these assessments became a charge to be paid on redemption. Section 3815. These assessments merely fixed the amount, in addition to the original charges, which were to be paid on redemption. See San Francisco, etc., L. Co. v. Banbury, supra;

Honeycutt v. Colgan, 3 Cal. App. 348, 352, 85 Pac. 165.

Respondents make the point that the description of the land as "S. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  of section 4/15/19" in the certificate, and S. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$ , section 4/15/19, is not a sufficient description, although the county is designated. It is not necessary to pass upon the question. We held in Canty v. Staley, 10 Cal. App. Dec. 327, that a similar description was sufficiently definite. The trial court allowed the deputy auditor of the county to testify, as he did, that he would have no difficulty in finding the land from such description. The case was reheard in the Supreme Court, but this point was not referred to. 123 Pac. 252.

The northwest quarter: The deed of the tax collector, based on the sale for delinquent taxes for the year 1897, recites that the assessment was $2,400; that the amount of taxes was $47.04, made up of county taxes, $34.08, and state taxes, $12.24, making together $46.32. There was added $12.76 as accruing costs, and the property was sold for $59.80, whereas the true amount was $59.08. The sale was for 72 cents in excess of the taxes and charges.

It is pointed out by respondents "that there is hardly any resemblance between the recitals in the deed and in the certificate," whereas section 3786 of the Political Code requires them to be the same. The deed recites that the property was assessed at $2,400, the certificate says $43,950; the deed states the taxes levied to be $47.04, the certificate $664.69; the deed says the property sold for $59.80, the certificate $743.05. In the tax proceedings confusion is worse confounded. Respondents seem to be supported in the following statement: "It cannot be determined from an inspection of the records what the tax was upon the property, what the assessed valuation was, or what it sold for." Section 3785 of the Political Code provides that the deed must recite the person assessed, the date of the sale, and description of the land sold, the amount for which it was sold, that it was sold for delinquent taxes, giving the assessed value and the year of assessment, with other requirements. The record in the present case shows that but little regard was paid to these requirements.

[5] So far as the sale of the N. W.  $\frac{1}{4}$  is concerned, the excessive amount of 72 cents, for which the property was sold, is of itself sufficient to make the sale void. In Rimmer v. Hotchkiss, 11 Cal. App. Dec. 499, 503, an excess of 52 cents was held fatal to the deed. The cases on the point are there cited. The case was reheard in the Supreme Court and the same view taken of this excess. 123 Pac. 256.

The order is affirmed.

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 80*)—SUBLEASE—NOTICE OF ORIGINAL LEASE.

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 80*)—SUBLEASE—TERM.

An original lease was for nine months from the day of July 15, 1909, or for so much of that time as the buildings were not removed by order of any municipal authority, and at the same time the original lessees executed a sublease from July 20, 1909, to July 20, 1910, which provided that it was "to hold only to the conditions of original lease." Some 13 months after the expiration of the original lease the month to month tenancy of the original lessees was terminated by notice of the owner and sublessees' furniture removed. Held, that the term granted by the sublease when construed with the original lease was not for a year absolutely, but only for a year in case the original lease was not sooner terminated.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by George Georgeos against M. Lewis and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Wm. H. Chapman, of San Francisco, for appellants. Edward R. Eliassen, of Oakland, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. In this action the plaintiff secured a judgment for damages against the defendants in the sum of $210 for the alleged breach of an implied covenant of quiet possession, which it is claimed was contained in a sublease from defendants to plaintiff of a portion of certain premises occupied by the defendants in the conduct of a saloon business, under a lease from the owners of the building.

The defendants have appealed from the judgment alone, and the case comes here upon the judgment roll and a duly authenticated transcript of the record of the proceedings and all of the evidence had upon the trial in the lower court, as provided in section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The essential facts of the case upon which the judgment is based are shown by the findings of the lower court and the record of the evidence adduced at the trial to be as follows:

The original lease of the entire premises from the owner of the building to the defendants was dated the 20th day of July, 1909, and granted the use and occupation of the premises to the defendants "for a period of nine months from the 15th day of July, 1909, or for so much of that time as the buildings are not removed by order of any municipal authority of the city and county of San Francisco, or in compliance with the requirements of any municipal authority of the city and county of San Francisco."

On the 20th day of July, 1909, the date of the original lease, the defendants, by a lease expressed in writing, sublet to Michael Pappas and William Pasros for use as a bootblack stand a space five feet in width by 12 feet in depth, situate in the front of the premises, from the said "20th day of July, 1909, to the 20th day of July, 1910, at the annual rental of $900 payable monthly in advance in equal payments of $75." This sublease was in the ordinary form; and, in addition to the usual covenants and agreements of such instruments, stipulated that it was "to hold only to the conditions of original lease."

On February 24, 1910, the plaintiff, for a valuable consideration and with the consent of the defendants, became the assignee of the sublease, and was in the occupation of the space leased thereunder on June 20, 1910, at which time the building was torn down and both the plaintiff and defendants evicted and deprived of possession by the overlandlord.

On June 14, 1910, some 13 months after the term expressed in the original lease had expired, the month to month tenancy, under which the defendants were then holding, was terminated by due notice to that effect from the owner of the building; and, when the work of the destruction of the building was commenced, plaintiff's fixtures and furniture were summarily and forcibly removed from the premises.

It is an undisputed fact in the case that neither of the defendants was instrumental, directly or indirectly, in the destruction of the building, and that the eviction of the plaintiff was caused solely by the independent act of the defendants' landlord.

It will be noted that the life of the defendants' tenancy under the original lease was by the very terms of that instrument limited to April 15, 1910, and might have been sooner terminated by an order from the municipal authorities to destroy the demised premises. Notwithstanding this, the defendants granted on the 20th day of July, 1909, and the plaintiff acquired by assignment, the sublease in question for a period of time which on its face extended three months beyond the term granted to the defendants by the original lease.

Out of this situation but one question arises, and that is: Were the defendants, as the immediate lessors of the plaintiff, liable as a matter of law for the admitted damage resulting to plaintiff from his eviction solely at the hands of the overlandlord, merely because they, the defendants, had undertaken to give a sublease to the plaintiff for the full period of a year rather than for the unexpired nine months of the term granted by the original lease?

The judgment of the lower court evidently was founded upon the theory that, notwithstanding the defendants' limited and contingent tenure under the original lease, the relation of landlord and tenant existed between the defendants and plaintiff for the full period of time granted in the sublease, and that this relation, with all of its attendant rights and liabilities, could not be avoided nor in any wise abridged by the fact that the defendants' tenure under the original lease had expired on April 15, 1910, and was from that date by operation of law transformed into a tenancy from month to month, under which the defendants occupied and used the building until the date of its destruction.

This theory, when viewed in the light of the express covenants and conditions of the original lease and sublease, cannot be sustained.

[1] It may be conceded generally that every lease in the usual and ordinary form carries with it an implied covenant that the lessee will not be disturbed in his possession during the term by the lessor nor any other person having the paramount title. This is so, however, only in the absence of a stipulation in the lease to the contrary; and even then this implied covenant of quiet enjoyment ends with the determination of the original estate of the lessee. Rawle on Covenants for Title, § 275; McCowry v. Croghan's Adm'r, 1 Grant Cas. (Pa.) 307; Brookhaven v. Baggett, 61 Miss. 383; Maxwell v. Urban, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 565, 55 S. W. 1124; Mershon v. Williams, 63 N. J. Law, 398, 44 Atl. 211. But, however that may be, the plaintiff in the present case took the sublease in question subject to the terms and conditions of the original lease, and therefore the respective rights and liabilities of the parties must be ascertained from a consideration of their agreement and understanding as contained in the expressed covenants and conditions of the original and sub lease.

[2] It is the duty of a person contracting for a sublease to ascertain the provisions of the original lease; and a subtenant is charged with notice of the existence of the original lease, and is bound by its terms and conditions. 1 Wood on Landlord and Tenant, § 93, p. 184; Jones on Landlord and Tenant, § 455; Blachford v. Frenzer, 44 Neb. 829, 62 N. W. 1101; Dunn v. Barton, 16 Fla. 765.

[3] But, even if this were not so, the clause contained in the sublease under consideration that it was "to hold only to the conditions of the original lease" was actual notice to the plaintiff of the existence of the original lease; and knowing of its existence he was charged with knowledge of its covenants, conditions, and limitations which, by reference, were made a material part of the terms and conditions of the sublease. Coalinga, etc., Co. v. Associated Oil Co., 16 Cal. App. 361, 116 Pac. 1107; Brock v. Desmond & Co., 154 Ala. 634, 45 South. 665, 129 Am. St. Rep. 71.

The expressed covenants of the original and sublease are obviously opposed to the existence of an implied covenant which was to endure beyond the term granted to the defendants by the original lease.

[4] In short, the sublease expressed the complete understanding and agreement of the parties only when read and construed in conjunction with the original lease; and, when so read and construed, it is apparent that it was the agreement and understanding of the parties that the term granted by the sublease was not for one year absolutely, but only for that time in the event that the tenancy of the defendants under the original lease was not sooner terminated. Illinois Starch Co. v. Ottawa, etc., Co., 125 Ill. 237, 17 N. E. 486.

It follows from what has been said that the evidence adduced at the trial does not support the trial court's findings of fact, and that the plaintiff was not entitled as a matter of law to recover for the breach of an implied covenant of quiet enjoyment.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Action by the City of Corona against John L. Merriam and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

G. R. Freeman, of Corona, for appellant. Purington & Adair, of Riverside, W. S. Clayson, of Corona, and H. L. Carnahan, of Riverside, for respondents.

ALLEN, P. J. The original action was brought by the city to recover of defendant, its treasurer, upon his official bond, certain public moneys alleged to have been wrongfully, unlawfully, and without right converted by the treasurer to his own use, which sum, it is alleged, was the property of said city. It was stipulated upon the trial: "That the defendant John L. Merriam, while acting as city treasurer, deducted from the moneys in his hands belonging to said city the sum of $556.43, claiming the right to do so under the terms of an ordinance, No. 140, of said city of Corona." The ordinance referred to provides as follows: "The city treasurer shall receive a salary of fifteen dollars ($15) per month, and the sum of one per cent. on all moneys received and paid out by him as treasurer of the said city, which said salary and percentage shall be payable monthly." It was further stipulated: "If the correct construction of said Ordinance 140 is that said defendant Merriam is entitled, as city treasurer, to 1 per cent. only on all moneys both received and paid out by him, then the judgment will be in favor of the plaintiff and against said defendant for $556.43." And further: "If, however, the proper construction of said ordinance is that said defendant is entitled to retain to himself 1 per cent. on all moneys received by him, and also 1 per cent. on all moneys paid out by him, then judgment shall be in favor of the defendant, dismissing said action." The trial court, in construing said ordinance, determined that the proper construction thereof is that said defendant is entitled to retain to himself 1 per cent. on all moneys received by him, and also 1 per cent. on all moneys paid out by him, and dismissed the action at plaintiff's costs, from which judgment plaintiff appeals.

[1,2] We are of opinion that the court erred in its construction of the ordinance. Section 1858 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "In the construction of a statute or instrument, the office of the judge is simply to ascertain and declare what is in terms or in substance contained therein, not to insert what has been omitted, or to omit what has been inserted." We think that the terms of the ordinance are plain and unambiguous. Its literal interpretation, to our minds, comprehends both a receipt and disbursement of funds before any commission is payable. To construe the ordinance otherwise would be to say that the word "and," as it appears in the ordinance, should be read "or." Our Supreme Court, in Robinson v. Southern Pacific Co., 105 Cal. 543, 38 Pac. 94, 722, 28 L. R. A. 773, has determined that ordinarily the words "and" and "or" are in no sense interchangeable terms, but, upon the contrary, are used in the structure of language for purposes entirely variant. We see nothing which would warrant a court, in the face of section 1858 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in reading into this ordinance the word "or." By so doing an entirely different meaning would be given the ordinance, which, as said in Robinson v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, would be judicial legislation pure and simple. In addition to this, were it even conceded that the terms of the ordinance are ambiguous, nevertheless the rule of strict construction applicable in such cases demands that a construction should be given favorable to the government. San Diego County v. Bryan, 123 Pac. 347.

[3] "Acts relating to the fees and compensation of public officers are strictly construed, and such officers are only entitled to what is clearly given by law." Lewis' Sutherland, Statutory Construction, § 714. "It is well-settled law that no officer is entitled to fees of any kind, unless provided for by statute, and that the law conferring such right must be strictly construed, because of statutory origin and right." State v. Wofford, 116 Mo. 220, 22 S. W. 486.

[4] Respondents insist that, by reason of the fact that defendant had been permitted to retain 1 per cent. of the moneys received, and, in addition, 1 per cent. on moneys disbursed, for a time preceding June 1, 1911, the same amounted to an adopted construction. It has never been held, to our knowledge, that a contemporaneous construction adopted by the parties interested in the enforcement of an ordinance is in any sense controlling. The extent to which any of the decisions go is that, where an ordinance is ambiguous, such adopted construction is to be given weight. But we do not consider the language of the ordinance under consideration to be such as would, under any circumstances, permit an adopted construction to be either controlling, or to be given weight in its construction.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to the trial court to render a judgment in plaintiff's favor for the amount claimed in the complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Action by Louis J. Sievers against the Union Assurance Society of London. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. F. Riley, of San Francisco, for appellant. L. S. Melsted and E. H. Williams, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from the judgment in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial in an action upon a policy of insurance against loss by fire. From the record it appears that the plaintiff took out said policy in the defendant company, being in the sum of $1,000, and upon a building erected on leased ground; that the lease contained no privilege of renewal, and the building at the expiration of the lease was to "revert to and become the property of" the lessor; that during the life of the policy, and at a time one year lacking four days before the expiration of the lease, the building was totally destroyed by fire; that the plaintiff received a monthly rental from the building of $225, and paid $175 per month as ground rent, making a profit of $50 a month; that the value of the building destroyed was $1,650. The judgment was in favor of the plaintiff for the face of the policy, i. e., $1,000.

We think, as contended by defendant, that the judgment should have been for the value of the interest of the insured, and not for the value of the building; in other words, that the judgment is excessive by approximately $400. Section 2588 of the Civil Code provides that where, as here, the "name of the person intended to be insured is specified in the policy, it can be applied only to his own property interest." To the same effect is section 2550 of the Civil Code, which reads: "The measure of an insurable interest in property is the extent to which the insured might be damaged by loss or injury thereof." So, too, is section 2551, which provides: "The sole object of insurance is the indemnity of the insured, and if he has no insurable interest the contract is void."

The question was decided in the case of Davis v. Phoenix Insurance Co., 111 Cal. 409, 43 Pac. 1115. There the plaintiff had paid on account of the purchase price of certain property the sum of $450, when it was destroyed by fire; the actual cash value was $800, and a policy of insurance for that amount had been issued to him. Under the terms of the contract of purchase, the plaintiff was under no obligation to carry out the contract, he not having bound himself to pay the whole purchase price, and the court held that the extent of his insurable interest was the amount paid on account of the purchase of the property at the time of the fire. At page 415 of 111 Cal., at page 1117 of 43 Pac., of the opinion, the court observed: "What is the extent of plaintiff's insurable interest? Insurance is a contract whereby one, for a consideration, undertakes to compensate another if he shall suffer loss. It is a contract of indemnity. * * * Under such a contract reparation must be made to the injured for the loss which he has suffered through his interest in the subject-matter, and to the extent of that interest, not exceeding the limit fixed by the policy. * * * In common parlance we speak of a house as being insured; but, strictly speaking, it is not the house but the interest of the owner therein that is insured. * * *

The defendant contends that there is no sufficient allegation of nonpayment, and that the complaint is defective in several other respects. The defendant filed an answer, and the case was tried and decided as though the matters criticised by it were properly in issue. Hence, perhaps, the defects in the complaint must be regarded as cured. However that may be, the alleged defects are of such a character that they may be easily remedied upon another trial, which must be had for the error discussed hereinbefore, so we do not deem it necessary to deal with them at length.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

Everts & Ewing, of Fresno, for appellant. E. L. Howell and Drew & Drew, of Fresno, for respondent.

HALL, J. This purports to be an appeal from a judgment and order "sustaining the demurrer of defendant to plaintiff's petition herein." The petition was one for a writ of mandate against the defendant as city clerk of the city of Sanger. The record before us discloses that the court sustained defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's petition, but it does not disclose that any judgment, either denying or dismissing the petition, was ever rendered or entered. The notice of appeal in the record purports to be an appeal "from that certain order and judgment * * * sustaining the demurrer of defendant to plaintiff's petition herein." The only order in the record is as follows: "The demurrer to the petition for a writ of mandamus, which said demurrer is on file herein, is argued by respective counsel and submitted, and it is by the court ordered that the said demurrer be, and it is hereby, sustained." There is no final judgment in the record whatever.

An appeal does not lie from an order either sustaining or overruling a demurrer. The action of the court upon the demurrer can only be reviewed upon an appeal from the final judgment entered in the action or

FRENCH v. PHELPS. (Civ. 988.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 15, 1912. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 14, 1912.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 129*)—MARKETABLE TITLE.

The test determinative of the proposition whether in a particular case the purchaser in an executory contract for the sale of real estate will be legally justified in rescinding or repudiating the contract on the ground that the vendor is unable to convey a perfect title is whether the tender of a deed conveys a legal and equitable title free from all litigation, palpable defects, and grave doubts, or whether the tendered conveyance will be such proof of title as will give the purchaser the recorded means of vindicating the validity of the title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 238-244, 249; Dec. Dig. § 129.*]

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 315*)—DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION—CONCLUSIVE-NESS—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

A decree of distribution made by a court acquiring jurisdiction on the giving of the notice of the hearing of the petition for distribution as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1659, which distributes the estate to decedent's widow, acquiring the interests of legatees, some of whom are minors or mentally incompetent, cannot be attacked collaterally on the ground of the insufficiency or incompetency of the evidence to sustain the finding, but is conclusive on the heirs, legatees, or devisees whose interests are involved and adjudicated within sections 1666, 1678, 1908, declaring that a decree of distribution is conclusive as to the rights of the parties interested, subject only to be reversed or modified on appeal, and authorizing the distribution of the estate, though some of the heirs, legatees, or devisees may have conveyed their shares, and providing that a judgment in respect to the administration of the estate of a decedent is conclusive, and they can only attack the decree for fraud through an appropriate proceeding.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1298-1314; Dec. Dig. § 315.*]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 315*)—DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION—PRESUMPTIONS.

The rule that all presumptions must be indulged favorably to the regularity of the proceedings leading to a judgment will be applied to a decree of distribution of an estate, and it will be presumed that the evidence on which such a decree is predicated is sufficient and competent, and that any legal objections that could have been made against it were made by the party objecting to the decree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1298-1314; Dec. Dig. § 315.*]

4. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 172*)
—PURCHASE BY EXECUTOR OF INTEREST OF LEGATEES.

A purchase by an executor of the interests of legatees, though prohibited by Code Civ. Proc. § 1576, is not void, but only voidable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 650½; Dec. Dig. § 172.*]

5. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 315*)
—DECREE OF DISTRIBUTION—VALIDITY.

A decree of distribution which distributes the estate to decedent's widow acting as executrix and acquiring the interests of legatees, some of whom are infants and some incompetents, confirms title in her, in the absence of any evidence of inadequate consideration for the title acquired.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1298-1314; Dec. Dig. § 315.*]

6. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 141*)—TITLE OF VENDOR—DEFECTS.

Where a defect in a vendor's title or a doubt as to its soundness is disclosed on the face of the record title, the purchaser need go no farther; but, where the title depends on some extrinsic fact not disproved by the record, he must prove such fact to justify a refusal to accept the title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 265; Dec. Dig. § 141.*]

7. VENDOR AND PURCHASER (§ 129*)—TITLE OF VENDOR—SUFFICIENCY.

The title of a vendor contracting to convey a perfect title was based on a decree of partial distribution of the estate of the deceased husband of the vendor who acted as executrix. The decree confirmed in her the interests of legatees acquired by purchase. Some of the legatees were minors and one was mentally incompetent. The decree on its face was valid. The conveyance from the legatees constituted a part of the evidence on which the court acted in making the decree. There was no substantial ground on which the decree could be attacked on the ground of fraud on the rights of the infants or the incompetent. Held, that the vendor could convey a title free from litigation, palpable defects, and doubts, and the purchaser was not justified in refusing to accept the title tendered by the vendor.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; G. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by R. A. French against Josephine A. Phelps. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hillyer, Stringham & O'Brien and Robt. L. Mann, all of San Francisco, and Chas. N. Kirkbride, of San Mateo, for appellant. Ross & Ross, of San Mateo, and W. C. Sharpstein, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment rendered and entered against him by the superior court of San Mateo county.

The action was instituted for the purpose of recovering judgment for the sum of $27,750, the major portion of which sum is for damages for the alleged breach of a contract for the sale of certain real estate, $5,000 of the balance representing the sum deposited, at the time of the execution of said contract, by the intending vendee, one George W. Phelps, as a payment on the purchase price, and $250 thereof for the expense incidental to the examination of the title to the property involved in the agreement and preparing the necessary papers.

It is alleged in the complaint that, prior to the commencement of the action, said George W. Phelps assigned the claim declared upon to the plaintiff.

The land affected by this controversy is situated in the county of San Mateo, and it appears that on the 17th day of December, 1906, the defendant, by a writing, conferred upon the real estate firm of Filcher & Cox, having offices in Redwood City, in said county, the authority and right "to sell, and they are given exclusive sale for a period of sixty days from date hereof, and thereafter until such authority is withdrawn by me in writing, of the following described property," and then follows a description of the land, which embraces 180.88 acres. The agreement further provides that the land should be sold at a price which would net to the defendant the sum of $687.50 per acre, "or any less sum agreed upon by me," and, in consideration of the services performed by Filcher & Cox for so negotiating the sale, said firm was to receive as compensation "all they receive over the above stated price, if said property is sold during the life of this contract," etc. Filcher & Cox were further authorized by the agreement "to execute and deliver for me and in my name a contract of sale of said property at the price agreed upon by me, and to accept and hold a deposit on account of the purchase price of said property," and it was stipulated upon the part of the defendant that she would, upon the sale of said property as indicated, convey the same, with a perfect title, free and clear of incumbrances, to the purchaser. The agreement also contains this provision: "If the title to said real estate is imperfect, I am to be allowed thirty days from and after notification to said Filcher & Cox of any defects therein, and I agree within that time to make the title perfect if it can be done, and if the judgment is that it cannot be done within the time allowed, the deposit made to said Filcher & Cox may be returned to the purchaser, unless the time to perfect the title is extended by mutual consent." The authorization further provided that, upon a sale being made, the sum of $20,000 should be paid in cash, and the balance to be made in deferred payments and secured by a mortgage upon the land.

In pursuance of the authorization to dispose of said land thus conferred upon them, Filcher & Cox, for the respondent, and one George W. Phelps, as trustee, on the 15th day of February, 1907, entered into a contract of sale, whereby the former agreed to sell and the latter agreed to purchase said land for the sum of $875 per acre, the payments to be made as specified in the written engagement of Filcher & Cox to negotiate and consummate the sale of said property. Upon the execution of said contract, George W. Phelps, on account of the cash payment of $20,000 required by the contract to be made, paid to and deposited with Filcher & Cox the sum of $5,000. This money was turned over to the respondent. The agreement of sale, substantially following the stipulation in that respect embraced in the instrument conferring upon Filcher & Cox the authority to sell the land, contained the following provision with regard to the title to the property: "The vendee shall have a reasonable time to examine title to said property, but in no event shall said time exceed sixty (60) days from date. If, however, the title to said real estate is imperfect, the vendor shall be allowed thirty (30) days from and after notification by the vendee to the vendor or Filcher & Cox, her agents, of any defects and the vendor agrees to make the title perfect if it can be done within that period, and if it cannot be so done, said deposit of five thousand dollars ($5,000.00) shall be returned to the vendee unless he shall extend the time to perfect the title or shall consent to waive said defects." It appears that George W. Phelps (not related to the respondent) in the proposed purchase of the land represented a syndicate, which appears to have been organized for the special purpose of buying the property and of which he, Filcher & Cox, and some others were members. The respondent, in due course, tendered a deed to the land to the vendee named in the contract of sale, and the latter refused to accept said instrument or the title purporting to be conveyed thereby, for the asserted reason that it did not, and that the respondent could not, for certain reasons to be hereafter examined, convey a perfect title to the property. In order that the objections to the title thus interposed by the proposed vendee may be clearly understood, the facts from which crystallized the source of the respondent's title to the property involved in this controversy should now be given.

The respondent derails her title through conveyances from the legatees which transfers were confirmed by a decree of partial distribution of the estate of her deceased husband, Timothy Guy Phelps, who died testate in the county of San Mateo, on the 11th day of June, 1899, leaving a valuable estate situated in said county, and consisting, among other kinds of property, of some 2,900 acres of land and a number of blocks in the town of Redwood City.

The will of the deceased contains the following provisions:

"After paying all my just debts and liabilities, including my funeral expenses, I will and bequeath unto my wife, Josephine Amelia Phelps, the sum of $50,000.00 and one-half of all my estate, real, personal and mixed, etc., over and above said sum of $50,000.00.

"And I will and bequeath to my sisters Phoebe W. Daughaday and Frances L. Witter, and their heirs, and the heirs of my deceased brothers, Alexander Dean Phelps and Mark Gale Phelps, and the heirs of my deceased sisters, Elizabeth Bentley and Permelia Harris, one-half of the surplus or remainder of my estate, over and above the said $50,000.00; one share to Phoebe W. Daughaday, one share to Frances L. Witter; one share to the heirs of Alexander Dean Phelps, and one share to the heirs of Elizabeth Bentley; and one share to the heirs of Permelia Harris;

"I will to the heirs of my deceased brothers and sisters the amounts to which said brothers and sisters would have been entitled had they been alive, under distribution of the one-half of my estate over $50,000.00, and without reference to the number of heirs either of them may have left;

"In order that I may be clearly understood, I repeat; I will to my wife, Josephine Amelia Phelps;

"First. $50,000.00 and

"Second. The one-half of my estate over $50,000.00, and the other persons named, the remaining one-half above that amount."

Said will named the widow (respondent) as executrix thereof, to act as such without the necessity of giving a bond for that purpose, and by due proceedings the instrument was admitted to probate, and letters testamentary granted and issued to her. Some six years after the proof of the will and the appointment and qualification of the respondent as executrix, the latter purchased the entire interests of all the other beneficiaries under said will, and on May 9, 1905, after due proceedings, the superior court of the county of San Mateo entered its decree of partial distribution of said estate, the effect of which was to vest in the respondent the title of all the other legatees or beneficiaries named and referred to in the last will of the deceased to all their interests in said estate. The petition for said partial distribution alleged, among other things, that the petitioner "has purchased of and from all of the heirs and devisees mentioned in said last will and testament all of their right, title, and interest in and to all of the real and personal property mentioned and described" in the will and in the instruments conveying said interests, and the decree, after setting forth that certain objections were filed against the petition, declares that "the court proceeded with the hearing on said petition and objections. And evidence having been introduced and heard and said matter and objections having been submitted to the court for decision, the court finds that all the allegations of said petition are true." The property involved here was accordingly distributed to the respondent; the objections to the petition not having been sustained.

It appears that some of the legatees or beneficiaries, whose interests the respondent thus acquired, resided in other states, and that some were minors and one mentally incompetent, and that the conveyances transferring their respective interests to the respondent were executed, in most of the instances, by and through their attorneys in fact, exercising their authority as such, and to so execute conveyances, under powers of attorney, executed by said legatees. In the case of Elizabeth Carpenter, an insane legatee, the conveyance was by Joseph Leggett, guardian of her estate, and for and in the names of Arthur and Natalie Phelps, minors, the conveyance was by Willis G. Witter, appointed attorney in fact by the "mother and natural guardian" of said minors, residing in the state of Texas.

The alleged defects in the title to the land specified and urged by the vendee are based upon the absence from the abstract of title of the proceedings culminating in the appointment of guardians of the estates of Elizabeth Carpenter, incompetent, and Arthur and Natalie Phelps, minors, and upon the alleged insufficiency of certain powers of attorney to confer authority upon the attorneys in fact therein named to execute deeds or conveyances of real property. The respondent was notified by the intending vendee of the alleged defects so specified in the title to the property, but, nevertheless, as seen, tendered her deed to the vendee, insisting that the title, notwithstanding the alleged defects pointed out by the vendee, was perfect.

The vital question presented here is: Did the respondent tender to the vendee named in the contract of sale a deed conveying both a legal and equitable title "free from all litigation, palpable defects and grave doubts"? Sheehy v. Miles, 93 Cal. 288, 292, 28 Pac. 1046; Lawton v. Gordan, 37 Cal. 202, 206; Bauer v. Pierson, 46 Cal. 293. Or, to put the question in the language employed in Crim v. Umlsen, 155 Cal. 697-703, 103 Pac. 178, 180 (132 Am. St. Rep. 127), did the respondent tender to the vendee a conveyance with such proof of title "as will arm him with the recorded means of vindicating its validity in after times"? See Calhoun v. Belden, 66 Ky. (3 Bush) 674.

[1] The rule as stated in the above interrogatories must be conceded to involve the test determinative of the proposition whether, in a particular case, a party to an executory contract for the sale of real estate as an intending vendee will be legally justified in rescinding or repudiating such contract upon the ground that the vendor is unable to convey a complete or perfect title to the property. And we think that, in the case at bar, the conveyance tendered to the party named as vendee in the contract of sale fully measured up to the requirements as to title prescribed by such test, and that consequently the findings and judgment must be upheld.

[2] It is not claimed that the decree is void upon its face, but the contention is that certain of the evidence upon which the court predicated said decree discloses imperfections in the title of respondent acquired through the decree. It is, in other words, claimed, as we have already shown, that certain powers of attorney did not confer upon the attorneys in fact therein named the power or authority to execute conveyances of real estate, and that the abstract of title fails to show the proceedings of the superior court in the matter of the guardianship of two minors and an incompetent, the deeds conveying the interests of said minors and incompetent in the estate of the deceased to the respondent having been executed by the guardians. (It seems that the record of the guardianship proceedings was destroyed by the great fire in San Francisco in April, 1906.) Thus it will be observed that the objections thus urged against the respondent's title necessarily involve, in effect an attack, collateral in its nature, upon the decree. It is very clear that the objections to the title, which has been adjudged by a decree or judgment of court having jurisdiction of the proceeding and the subject-matter thereof to be in the respondent, entered by a court having jurisdiction of the proceeding and the subject-matter thereof, would not be heard in a proceeding collateral to that culminating in the making of the decree, and we think the objections urged under the circumstances revealed here afford no legal excuse for the refusal of the vendee to carry out his part of the agreement of sale. Indeed, it is our opinion that the decree of distribution confirmed in the respondent a perfect title to the property.

Section 1908 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that in case of a judgment or order against a specific thing, or in respect of a will, or the administration of the estate of a decedent, the judgment or order is conclusive upon the title to the thing, the will, or the administration. Section 1678 of the same Code provides: "Partition or distribution of the estate may be made as provided in this chapter, although some of the original heirs, legatees or devisees may have conveyed their shares to other persons, and such shares must be assigned to the person holding the same, in the same manner as they otherwise would have been to such heirs, legatees, or devisees."

As seen, the petition for a partial distribution of the estate, including the property concerned here, alleged that the petitioner "has purchased of and from all of the heirs and devises mentioned in said last will and testament all their right, title, and interest in and to all of the real and personal property belonging to said estate, * * * and that all of said heirs have by their instruments in writing conveyed to and invested in her all of their right and interest in all of the property, real and personal, mentioned and described," etc. Upon the filing of said petition due notice was given directing "all persons then and there to appear and show cause, if any they have, why the said partial distribution of said estate as prayed for in said petition should not be granted." Upon the date designated in the notice, the court made its decree that "due notice of the hearing of said petition has been given in all respects as required by section 1659 Code of Civil Procedure and as required by law," and "that all the real property described be and the same is hereby distributed to said Josephine A. Phelps * * * upon the filing of a bond," etc. Having thus acquired jurisdiction of the proceeding and the subject-matter thereof, the court had the legal power to make the decree as prayed for, and, incidentally, to make erroneous rulings and findings, which, if made, could have been corrected only on an appeal from the decree. And, until so corrected, they cannot otherwise be made available as a menace to the validity of the decree or its effect. In other words, the decree, as to the title to the interests so distributed, is conclusive upon all the heirs, legatees, or devisees whose interests were involved in the proceeding thus adjudicated (sections 1666 and 1908, Code Civ. Proc.; Est. of Vaughn, 92 Cal. 192, 28 Pac. 221; Estate of Burton, 93 Cal. 459, 29 Pac. 36; De Castro v. Barry, 18 Cal. 96, 98-99; Kearney v. Kearney, 72 Cal. 591, 15 Pac. 769), and they cannot now question its stability upon the ground that the evidence upon which it was predicated was incompetent or insufficient to sustain the findings from which it was deduced. Indeed, the decree is perfectly immune from attack by the parties whose interests were the subject of the adjudication therein and thereby affected, except upon some fraud or other sufficient matter collateral or extrinsic to the questions examined in the proceeding leading to the decree, and therefore, even in a direct attack, if it could be shown that the testimony was altogether insufficient to support the decree, or that it was the result of forged documents or perjured testimony, all the parties interested having had their day in court in the proceeding in which the decree was made, it certainly could not be successfully challenged for any of these reasons. Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 129, 25 Pac. 970, 27 Pac. 537, 13 L. R. A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159, and cases therein cited; Mulcahey v. Dow, 131 Cal. 73, 63 Pac. 158; Sohler v. Sohler, 135 Cal. 323, 328, 67 Pac. 282, 87 Am. St. Rep. 98. In Mulcahey v. Dow, supra, the rule as it is approved by all the cases in this state is thus stated: "A proceeding for the distribution of an estate of a deceased person is a proceeding in rem; and the decree of distribution binds all who have constructive notice thereof, and, if not appealed from, is conclusive as to the whole world upon all questions of heirship."

It follows that the only way in which the effect of the decree here challenged may be disturbed is by the introduction, through an appropriate proceeding, of some issue of fact sufficient in itself to justify a court of equity in taking cognizance of the matter and making an inquiry into the justness of the decree independently of any of the issues of fact necessarily included in the adjudication leading to the making of said decree. In other words, to justify any interference with the result flowing from the decree, it would be necessary to charge and prove in a proceeding having that purpose in view some fraud collateral or extrinsic to the matters or questions examined and determined in the proceeding culminating in the decree—that is, some fact or facts not only sufficient to start the machinery of a court of equity but which were not necessarily or presumptively included in the inquiry resulting in the making of the decree of distribution.

[3] As to all matters, except the act of the executor or administrator in himself purchasing the property of the estate, the rule that all presumptions must be indulged favorably to the regularity of the proceedings leading to the rendering of a judgment and in support thereof is to be applied with no less rigor to a decree of distribution than to any other kind of a judgment, and it is therefore to be presumed that the evidence upon which the decree was predicated was in all respects sufficient and competent, and that any legal objections that could have been made against it were made by the party objecting to the granting of the petition and decided by the court at the hearing. It must be presumed that the question of the adequacy of the consideration, upon which proposition much emphasis is laid by appellant, was considered and passed upon by the court, and that the price paid for the interests of the beneficiaries was adequate, fair, and just.

[4] It is true that the act of purchasing property of the estate by the executor or administrator thereof is expressly enjoined by section 1576 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but it has been uniformly held by the Supreme Court that the purchase of such property by such officer involves an act which is not void but only voidable. Estate of Richards, 154 Cal. 478, 483, 484, 98 Pac. 528; Boyd v. Blankman, 29 Cal. 20, 87 Am. Dec. 146; O'Connor v. Flynn, 57 Cal. 293; Burris v. Kennedy, 108 Cal. 341, 41 Pac. 458.

If, then, the decree cannot be attacked upon any matter which necessarily or presumptively must have been considered and determined on the hearing of the petition—that is to say, if, as is obviously true, the evidence upon which the decree was founded cannot be reviewed in a proceeding to vacate the decree—what tangible ground is apparent from anything presented or disclosed here for an assault upon the decree upon some question of fraud extrinsic to questions examined in the proceeding through which the decree was given existence? The conveyances, as shown, constitute a part of the evidence upon which the court acted, and they are therefore not subject to reconsideration in another proceeding attacking the decree. We can perceive no substantial, or, indeed, any, ground upon which the decree can be successfully attacked, and the suggestion that the minors or the incompetent may, upon becoming sui juris, set up some sort of plea that the decree was brought about in fraud of their just rights is too remote even to cast a visible shadow of a suspicion upon the soundness of the title sustained by the decree.

[5] But, conceding that the evidence upon which the court acted in making the decree could properly be considered in determining whether the title of the defendant thus confirmed is perfect or otherwise, it is to be remarked that there is nothing in this record supporting the specific objections of the vendee to said title. There is absolutely no evidence in this record disclosing that the consideration for which the other beneficiaries under the will of Timothy Guy Phelps parted with their interests in the estate of the deceased was inadequate. This proposition, as before suggested, comes solely from the suggestions of appellant himself. Nor is there any evidence here that the beneficiaries so disposing of their interests are dissatisfied with their bargain, or that they have threatened to attack the decree or manifested any intention of attempting to destroy its effect by some proceeding in a court of equity based, as it must be, if sustainable at all, upon matters of fraud which were not involved in the issues presented by the petition or which did not arise at the hearing thereof, or, as before declared, that they have any ground for so attacking it. In brief there is nothing shown here except those matters which must have been disclosed at the hearing of the petition.

It follows from the views herein expressed that, the time for an appeal from the decree having expired prior to the time at which the transactions giving rise to this litigation took place, the title of respondent to the property in controversy stands confirmed by a perfectly valid and, indeed, an impregnable decree, against the stability of which nothing has been or can be urged but a suggestion, growing out of mere chimerical speculation, and involving an objection which might as reasonably be urged against any judgment, perfectly valid on its face, that at some future time some one may challenge it on some of the grounds urged against it here, the reasons for which, it must be presumed, were considered and passed upon by the court at the hearing of the petition.

[6] The rule where the title to real property is brought into question is that if the defect therein or a doubt as to the soundness thereof is disclosed on its face—that is, on the face of the record title—the vendee need go no further, but if, as here, it depends upon some extrinsic fact not discovered by the record, he must prove this fact to justify a refusal to accept the title. Greenblatt v. Hermann, 144 N. Y. 13, 38 N. E. 966. In Phillips v. Day, 82 Cal. 24, 31, 32, 22 Pac. 976, where a vendee sought to escape the consequences of his contract to purchase land on the ground that a certain portion thereof had, previously to the making of the agreement, been dedicated to the purpose of a public street, the court approvingly quotes the following from Heilreigel v. Manning, 97 N. Y. 59: "A purchaser cannot justify his refusal to perform his contract by a mere captious objection to the title tendered him; nor is it sufficient for him, when the jurisdiction of an equity court is invoked to compel him to perform his contract, merely to raise a doubt as to the vendor's title. Before he can successfully resist performance of his contract on the ground of defect of title, there must be at least a reasonable doubt as to the vendor's title, such as affects its value, and would interfere with its sale to a reasonable purchaser, and thus render the land unmarketable." In Sohler v. Sohler, supra, the court, speaks thus: "The title conferred by a decree of distribution, after regular proceedings in probate, has always been justly recognized as a title of high and unimpeachable value, because of the nature of the proceedings and of the exclusive jurisdiction which has been vested in the probate court to pass upon the questions involved. If such a decree may at any time be vacated in equity, it must result that no title any longer stands secure." While the defendant's title was not directly conferred by or acquired from the decree itself, it was nevertheless confirmed thereby upon evidence presumptively sufficient to sustain it.

[7] Our conclusion is that the record title of the respondent to the property involved in this dispute fully measures up to the test heretofore referred to as having been formulated by the courts—that is to say, that it is, upon its face, "free from all litigation, palpable defects and grave doubts," and that it embraces both the legal and equitable titles. Or, as the test is otherwise put, the respondent's title having been confirmed by an unimpeachable decree or judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, said court having legally acquired jurisdiction to make it, the conveyance tendered by the respondent to the intending purchaser was accompanied by such proof of title "as will arm him with the recorded means of vindicating its validity in after times." We think, in other words, that, there being no possible objection to the respondent's title upon its face, a court of equity would not hesitate to decree a specific performance of the contract of sale between the owner of that title and the proposed purchaser. We perceive nothing in any of the cases cited and relied on by counsel for the appellant militating against or conflicting with the foregoing views. We shall not take the time to review them in this opinion, but we are satisfied that they are easily to be differentiated from this case.

Counsel for respondent present another view of this case which, if sound, furnishes a complete answer to some of the objections to the title raised by the appellant, viz.: That the language of the will of the deceased, properly construed, discloses that it was the intention of the testator that his estate should be sold, and that the respective interests of the beneficiaries named in the instrument should be distributed to them in the form of money. If this be true and no particular or definite time in the future is fixed by the will for the sale of the real property—that is, if the power to sell is not postponed to some future definite time or is not made to depend upon some future event or contingency—then, it is contended, these propositions follow: (1) That the will itself has ipso facto, et eo instanti, upon the death of the testator, worked a conversion of the real property into personalty—that is to say, the real property is then to be deemed personal property from the time of the testator's death—and the beneficiaries are therefore to be regarded as legatees rather than as devisees, and the provision for them considered as a bequest of money. Civ. Code, § 1338; Estate of Walkerly, 108 Cal. 652, 41 Pac. 772, 49 Am. St. Rep. 97; Bank of Ukiah v. Rice, 143 Cal. 265, 270, 76 Pac. 1020, 101 Am. St. Rep. 118; Rankin v. Rankin, 36 Ill. 293, 87 Am. Dec. 205; Gray v. Smith, 3 Watts (Pa.) 289. (2) That, conceding that the instruments by which the other beneficiaries of the estate conveyed their interests were insufficient for any reason to pass real property, they are, nevertheless, sufficient in all respects as transfers by assignment of the personalty, although in form conveyances of real property. Howell v. Mellon, 189 Pa. 169, 177, 42 Atl. 6; Snover v. Squires (N. J.) 24 Atl. 365; Walker v. Killian, 62 S. C. 482, 40 S. E. 887; Thornton v. Mulquinne, 12 Iowa, 549, 79 Am. Dec. 548; Williams v. Emberson, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 522, 55 S. W. 595. (3) That, the interests of all the beneficiaries having been merged or united in the respondent, it was within her right to take the property in its original form (Bank of Ukiah v. Rice, supra; Greenland v. Waddell, 116 N. Y. 234, 22 N. E. 367, 15 Am. St. Rep. 400), and that her petition to have the estate distributed to her in its original form constituted an election on her part to take the property in that form and worked a reconversion. Estate of Pforr, 144 Cal. 121, 129, 77 Pac. 825; Burr v. Sim, 1 Whart. (Pa.) 252, 29 Am. Dec. 48.

We think that there is much force in the contention that the language of the testament here is quite clearly indicative of an intention that the estate should be sold and that the proceeds of such sale should constitute a fund from which the interests of the several beneficiaries should be gratified, and manifestly, if that contention be tenable, the legal propositions following therefrom, as above stated, are undoubtedly sound.

But we do not conceive it to be necessary to examine this feature of the argument. We are satisfied with the other view of the case, that the decree of partial distribution confirmed in the respondent a perfect title to the real estate involved in this controversy, and that she tendered and offered to convey to the intending purchaser named in the agreement of sale such a title. She therefore fully fulfilled her part of the engagement, while on the other hand, the vendee, having refused to accept the conveyance so offered, was guilty of a breach of the agreement to which he obligated himself.

In other words and in brief, our conclusion is that challenged findings are sustained by the evidence, and that the judgment cannot therefore justly be disturbed.

The judgment is accordingly affirmed.

BROKERS (§ 64*) — COMMISSIONS — WHEN EARNED.

Where a contract for the employment of a broker to sell real estate stipulated for the payment of a sum received over a specified sum, and that, in the event of a sale, the owner would convey to the purchaser the property free and clear of incumbrances, and the failure to consummate a sale resulted from the wrongful refusal of the purchaser to accept the conveyance tendered and the broker advised the purchaser to reject the title offered, the broker could not recover commissions.

Action by Thomas W. Forsyth against Josephine A. Phelps. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

HART, J. The complaint in this action asks for judgment against the defendant for damages in the total sum of $33,915 for the alleged breach of the terms of a certain instrument in writing, executed by the defendant, whereby the latter authorized Filcher & Cox, real estate brokers, and the assignors of the plaintiff, to negotiate and consummate the sale of certain land of the defendant, situated in San Mateo county, said amount representing the difference between the net price to the defendant at which said real estate was to be sold by the brokers and the gross price at which, it is alleged, the latter agreed in writing for the defendant to sell the property to the intending purchaser. It is alleged that, before the institution of this action, Filcher & Cox assigned to the plaintiff the claim in suit. The defendant was given judgment, from which and the order denying him a new trial the plaintiff appeals.

This action grows out of precisely the same transaction as that upon which the case of French v. Phelps (Civ. No. 988) 128 Pac. 772, is founded. An opinion affirming the judgment of the trial court was this day filed in the last-mentioned case, and therein a full statement of the facts from which both actions arose is presented. Therefore a repetition of said statement in full in this opinion is not deemed essential. By reference to the facts as given in said case of French v. Phelps, supra, it will be seen that the defendant, by the writing by which she authorized Filcher & Cox to sell the land therein described, agreed that the brokers mentioned should receive, as compensation for negotiating such sale, all that they might succeed in securing for said tract of land over the sum of $687.50 per acre. She further therein stipulated that, in case of a sale, she would convey to the purchaser said property, with a perfect title, free and clear of incumbrances.

The evidence discloses that a purchaser was obtained by Filcher & Cox on the terms specified in said authorization to them to sell the property, except that the contract of sale called for a price in excess of that which was to be paid to the respondent, and that the brokers, by virtue of the authority so conferred on them by the respondent, in her behalf entered into a written contract of sale of the land with such purchaser. By the latter agreement the vendee therein named agreed to pay for the land the sum of $875 per acre, or $187.50 per acre in excess of the net price to the defendant.

It is further made to appear that the vendee, George W. Phelps, named as trustee in the contract of sale, was in fact not acting for himself alone, but for a syndicate organized for the special purpose of purchasing said land, and that he and Filcher & Cox were members of said syndicate and, between them, owned a one-half interest therein—that is, each of the three was to have and own a one-sixth interest in the profits of the deal by the syndicate. Phelps, trustee, it appears, upon the execution of the contract of sale, made a deposit of $5,000, paying the same to Filcher & Cox, the latter in turn paying said deposit for the defendant to one Chipman, her agent. Thereafter the other members of the syndicate returned to the vendee their respective proportions of the deposit so made.

Mrs. Phelps, in due time thereafter, tendered to Phelps, vendee, a deed purporting to convey to him, as trustee, a perfect title to the property, but the same was rejected upon the grounds that the title thus sought to be conveyed was defective in many particulars, which were specifically pointed out, and that the defendant could not convey a perfect title. The specific objections to the title are given in the case of French v. Phelps, supra, and they need not be repeated here. It is very clear from the terms of the agreement between Mrs. Phelps and Filcher & Cox that the latter could not claim that they were entitled to the compensation provided by that instrument except in the event that the defendant received the price which it was stipulated therein that she was to receive for her land, unless a sale was prevented by and through her fault.

We held, in the case of French v. Phelps, that the defendant tendered to the intending purchaser procured by Filcher & Cox a title to the property unembarrassed by any defects or imperfections—in other words, a perfect title. This being true, it necessarily follows that the failure to consummate the sale was not occasioned by the fault or remissness of the defendant. In other words, the defendant did not violate the terms of the agreement into which she entered with Filcher & Cox, but offered in good faith to fully meet her obligation under that instrument. The fact is that the refusal by Phelps, trustee, to accept the conveyance tendered him by the defendant was due entirely to the advice given him by the syndicate itself for which he was acting in the deal, and that Filcher & Cox, being members of said syndicate, necessarily joined in the advice so given, or, which is strictly true, admonished and approved the course of Phelps in rejecting the proffered conveyance. It is therefore plainly manifest that Filcher & Cox themselves, and not the defendant, committed a breach of the agreement.

There is absolutely no ground upon which this action can be maintained, and the judgment and order must, consequently, be affirmed. It is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thos. C. Denny, Judge.

Action by S. J. Hopkins against Roland J. White and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. H. Early, of Petaluma, for appellants. Lippitt & Lippitt and Chas. F. Fury, all of Petaluma, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to have a certain assignment of the interest of defendant Harriette Macnider in her deceased father's estate declared void. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and from the order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal.

It is alleged in the amended complaint

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

that on August 18, 1908, the defendants executed and delivered to plaintiff their promissory note for $1,679.40, and that on August 2, 1910, plaintiff obtained a judgment against defendants in an action upon said promissory note for the sum of $1,702.40, and that said judgment is now in full force; that on August 2, 1910, execution issued on said judgment against the property of defendants, and was duly served on the land hereinafter referred to and became a lien thereon on August 4, 1910; that on September 12, 1909, defendant Harriette Macnider executed and delivered to defendant White an assignment of all her property, to wit, all of her right, title, and interest in the estate of her father, John C. Haskell, deceased, by which the said Harriette directed that the same be "distributed to and fully and absolutely vested in the said R. J. White, as the same would have been distributed to and invested in me if this assignment had not been made, whether the same be real or personal property or both"; that at the time said assignment was executed the said defendant Harriette had no property other than that mentioned in said assignment, and defendant, her said husband, was and is insolvent, and that said assignment was made "with intent to delay and defraud the creditor of the said defendant, Harriette Macnider," and "was made without any consideration whatever passing from the defendant, Roland J. White, to the defendant Harriette Macnider," and that the "pretended indebtedness named and set forth in said assignment as due from said defendant Harriette Macnider to the said defendant, Roland J. White, was fictitious," and said Harriette was not at said time indebted to said defendant White "in any sum whatever." It is then alleged that subsequent to said assignment the estate of John C. Haskell, deceased, has been fully settled and distributed by the superior court of Los Angeles county, and that upon the settlement and distribution of said estate the sum of $711.58 was distributed to defendant White, and also "an undivided one-seventh interest of, in, and to all that certain real estate described in the petition for distribution and in the decree of distribution in the matter of the estate of John C. Haskell, deceased, as follows, to-wit." (Then follows a description of the real estate the subject of the decree of distribution.) The answer admits the execution of the said promissory note, but denies any indebtedness to plaintiff; admits that judgment was had on said note, but alleges that, "immediately after said judgment was rendered, they served notice in due and regular form of their intention to move said court for a new trial in said action, and that said motion has not been heard and determined by said court"; admits the execution of said assignment, but denies the averments of fraud and want of consideration in its execution, and denies the alleged insolvency of defendants Macnider, and denies that the indebtedness mentioned in said assignment was fictitious; alleges that said assignment was made for a good and valuable consideration, and that all of its terms and conditions have been fully complied with and that said defendant White is the "absolute owner of all of said property without any right or interest therein to defendant Harriette Macnider or defendant W. B. Macnider or either or both of them."

The findings of fact follow substantially the averments of the complaint; that said assignment was without any consideration from defendant White to defendant Harriette Macnider; that the pretended indebtedness set forth in said assignment was fictitious, and that said defendant Harriette was not indebted to defendant White in any sum whatever; that defendant Harriette, with full knowledge of her insolvency, made said assignment with intent to delay and defraud her creditors, and that she has remained, and still remains, in possession. It is found that defendants, the Macniders, moved for a new trial in the action on said promissory note, and that said motion has not been determined, but that "there was no stay of proceedings in the said action"; that "ever since said assignment to said defendant Roland J. White the property therein mentioned has remained and still remains in the possession and under the control of said defendant, Harriette Macnider"; that defendant White is not the owner of said property so assigned to him, but that it is the property of said Harriette Macnider.

As conclusions of law it was found that said assignment "is fraudulent and void as against this plaintiff and the said assignment should be set aside," and the property therein mentioned and subsequently distributed in said estate to defendant White "should be held and determined to be, and is the property of the said defendant Harriette Macnider so far as the plaintiff herein is concerned"; that defendant White "should account for all the property held by him under the terms of said written assignment, including the sum of $711.28"; that defendants be restrained from selling or in any way interfering with said property, "except as shall be further directed by the court"; that the undivided one-seventh interest in said real property is the property of said Harriette, "so far as this plaintiff is concerned, and should be sold for the purpose of satisfying" said judgment, and said defendant White "should pay over to plaintiff said sum of $711.28, distributed to him as found in the findings of fact, to be applied upon the said judgment in favor of plaintiff."

Judgment was entered accordingly. Substantially all of the findings are challenged for insufficiency of facts.

[1] Whatever interest defendant White acquired by the assignment was merged in the decree of distribution, and his title is referable to and he is now holding and is claiming under the decree and not under the assignment. Toland v. Earl, 129 Cal. 152, 61 Pac. 914, 79 Am. St. Rep. 100; Goad v. Montgomery, 119 Cal. 552, 51 Pac. 681, 63 Am. St. Rep. 145. The assignment was executed September 12, 1909, was duly acknowledged on September 13, 1909, and was duly recorded, in Los Angeles county, on September 30, 1909, where the land is situated, and where the Haskell estate was being settled. The decree of distribution was entered June 20, 1910. The complaint was filed October 13, 1910, more than one year after the assignment was recorded, and about four months after the entry of the decree of distribution. Plaintiff had constructive notice of the assignment, and he also had notice of the proceedings on final account and distribution in the matter of the estate of Haskell, deceased.

[2] Whether plaintiff had any remedy by which to have arrested the proceedings on distribution, so far as they related to defendant White or could, on proper showing, before the decree became final, have had it reopened, need not be now inquired into. It is very certain that the decree is final and conclusive. It is not open to collateral attack, and can be set aside by direct attack only upon "some ground of fraud or other matter collateral or extrinsic to the questions examined in the proceeding leading to the decree." French v. Phelps (No. 988, filed in this court, October 15, 1912), 128 Pac. 772, and cases there cited. In that case the attack was collateral, being as to the sufficiency of certain evidence introduced in support of the decree of distribution, and it was held that even "if it could be shown that the testimony was altogether insufficient to support the decree, or that it was the result of forged documents or perjured testimony, all the parties interested having had their day in court in the proceeding in which the decree was made, we do not see how it could be successfully challenged for any of these reasons"—(citing cases). The action here is not aimed at the decree, but is directly aimed at a certain piece of evidence, to wit, the assignment, upon which the court acted in making distribution to defendant White. The effect of the action is to question in an independent proceeding the validity of a thing done in court, to wit, the entry of a decree in distribution. Such attack is necessarily collateral. To declare in this action that this piece of evidence thus used was fraudulently contrived does not in the slightest degree impair the validity of the decree. It may be that a court of equity, under proper pleadings, would entertain an action to have White declared to be a trustee and holding the title for the benefit of his creditors, but the demand for judgment is "that the said assignment is fraudulent and void as against this plaintiff," and, being void, that White "account for all property received by him as aforesaid." He received no property by the assignment; and not until distribution and only by distribution did he acquire title freed from administration. Nor does the prayer ask that plaintiff's judgment be declared to be a lien on the property. In its judgment, however, the court "set aside, annulled, and declared to be null and void" the assignment; declared plaintiff's original judgment against the Macniders to be a lien on the property, and that plaintiff "is at liberty to proceed upon his execution * * * and to sell the real property," etc. The judgment grants relief in excess of that prayed for, and in its effect nullifies the decree of distribution without directly attacking it. Without appropriate averments in the complaint plaintiff has been given a judgment lien on property held by a title unimpeachable in this action.

We very much doubt the sufficiency of the complaint to support the findings and judgment. But, waiving the point, we are satisfied that the findings are not supported by the evidence.

[3] The evidence adduced to establish fraud and want of consideration is to be found in the testimony of the defendants who were the only witnesses to the facts relied upon as establishing the averments of the complaint. In considering their testimony these witnesses are to be treated as having been voluntarily produced by plaintiff, vouching for their competency and credibility. The rule would not estop plaintiff from calling other witnesses to dispute their statements, but this was not attempted.

[4] Some minor statements of the witnesses, apparently inconsistent with their positive statements of material facts, may be discoverable in their testimony, but these latter cannot for that reason be set aside and disbelieved. The conclusions deducible from positive statements of facts showing bona fides are not to be shaken by some comparison of inconsistent statements with each other, unless these inconsistencies tend directly to establish the issues of fraud and want of consideration and clearly dispute the evidence of good faith. An instructive discussion of the rule is found in Clark v. Krause, 2 Mackey (D. C.) 559-571. We quote: "The analogies, as well as the reason of the law, are against the ascription to the defendant of any especial obligation in giving his personal testimony on demand of the complainant to create a case for his opponent by acquiescing in the imputation of bad faith while the charge remains unsupported by the testimony of a single adverse witness, or that unfavorable inferences are to be drawn from his failure to strengthen circumstances of alleged suspicion, supposed to be inconsistent with his positive statements"—citing Lingan v. Henderson, 1 Bland. (Md.) 268; Alexander's Practice, 72; 2 Dan'l Chy. 451.

[5] Fraud may be inferred from circumstances, but it cannot be left wholly to conjecture. Kerker v. Levy, 140 App. Div. 428, 125 N. Y. Supp. 357.

The testimony of defendants was taken by deposition, and is mostly found in narrative form in the transcript. Defendant White testified: That he was engaged in practicing law in the city of San Francisco. "That prior to the 12th day of September, 1909, the witness first represented the defendant W. B. Macnider, as his attorney in the case of People v. Macnider, and in the trial of W. B. Macnider in the matter of charges that were preferred against Macnider by plaintiff in the Elks Lodge of Petaluma. That Macnider had been arrested at the instance of S. J. Hopkins, plaintiff herein, on a charge of embezzling nearly $7,000. That witness succeeded in getting Macnider dismissed at the preliminary hearing in the justice's court of Petaluma, which lasted three or four days.

* * * That defendant Macnider had appeared before the grand jury of Sonoma county on several occasions, and witness had accompanied Macnider to Santa Rosa on several occasions. That witness discussed these matters with Macnider prior to the time that Mrs. Macnider came to the office with him. That witness discussed these matters with him alone, and with her alone, and with them both together, day after day, practically half the summer. They were in witness' office almost daily for a long while; that witness expended money for and on behalf of defendant W. B. Macnider amounting to more than $300. That witness did not keep an exact account of said expenditures. Witness further testified that all of the services rendered for the defendant W. B. Macnider were also performed at the instance of Mrs. Macnider principally. * * * That Macnider spoke to witness first about the employment of witness, and subsequently Macnider and Mrs. Macnider both came to witness' office and they hired witness. * * * That witness had no written agreement with W. B. Macnider or Harriette Macnider concerning his employment or fees. * * * 'I never made a statement of account to Macnider for my services and disbursements. I came to no agreement with Mr. Macnider or Mrs. Macnider as to the total amount due for services rendered, other than the assignment which was subsequently made, which was, as agreed upon, about the right charge to cover services for a period of about six months or a year, and the costs I had expended.' * * * 'Mr. Macnider, Mr. Early, the notary public, and I were present when Mrs. Macnider executed the assignment. Mr. Early prepared it in the office of the notary public. They told me prior to the time that they received this property, or were about to receive it, prior to that time, in fact before he was arrested, or subsequent to his arrest and before his trial, they told me of this interest in the estate, which they expected. * * * Macnider never made a promise to pay me at any definite time. He and his wife told me they couldn't pay any money at that time, but even before the death of Mr. Haskell they said they had this interest in his estate, and it was on that information that they had given me that I acted for Mr. Macnider and performed the services for him and expended the costs and expenses.' * * * Mrs. Macnider told witness that she expected money from her father, and would pay. 'I don't think that she expected him to die, but she expected to receive money from her father, who was living at that time.' That, after the death of John C. Haskell, Harriette Macnider came to witness' office, and stated that Macnider was working down there, but they required what actual money he had received at that time to pay their immediate expenses, and to pay off some other indebtedness, and then she assured witness about getting money from her father, and that she would pay witness, and that, after the death of John C. Haskell, Harriette Macnider wrote witness, and told him about her father's death, and that the estate was in probate, and that she would pay witness. * * * Witness consulted with other attorneys pertaining to Macnider's case. * * * That witness consulted Mr. Early and Mr. Peart several times concerning the case and paid for it. That Mrs. Macnider knew that witness had employed other attorneys in the matter of her husband's case, and she did not object to it: in fact, advised that witness employ other attorneys. That at the present time witness is square with the Macniders, as the assignment in question was taken in full satisfaction of witness' claim for services rendered and moneys expended for Macnider. That witness did not agree to give back any portion of the property to Mrs. Macnider or Mr. Macnider or to any one else. That witness has had absolute control of the one-seventh interest of Harriette Macnider in the Haskell estate since its assignment as his property. That witness has not accounted to Harriette Macnider for moneys received as income or anything from the assigned property, and does not intend to. That witness has nothing belonging to Harriette Macnider or W. B. Macnider. That at the time of taking the assignment witness did not agree to return any of the property or to account in any way to Mrs. Macnider and does not intend to. * * * That witness at no time knew anything concerning the financial standing of Harriette Macnider or W. B. Macnider. 'I know that Hopkins claimed that Macnider owed him the money that he was alleged to have taken, and for which he was arrested and charged, and that the suit entitled Macnider v. Hopkins determined that matter or was to have determined it in the shape of an accounting. That at the time said assignment was made witness had no conversation with Harriette Macnider or W. B. Macnider relative to defeating, delaying, or defrauding any of their creditors. * * * That the property received by White under the assignment is of uncertain value. That, if witness disposes of the property for less than its estimated value, he will not look to the Macniders for the deficit. That, if it sells in excess of the estimated value, he will not account for the overplus."

Defendant Harriette Macnider testified that the ranch property of her father included some mining claims "but they had been pretty well worked out." After her father's death, her brother lived on the ranch, and after he left an old man had charge of it. "But since the death of her father the ranch has laid idle and rather neglected. She does not know of any income from the ranch since her father's death. Witness testified that she did employ Roland J. White as W. B. Macnider's attorney; that such employment was in November or December, 1908; that, previous to the time witness employed Mr. White as Mr. Macnider's attorney, Mr. White had been looking up and getting a case prepared for Macnider. At the time Mr. Hopkins and Mr. Macnider were having trouble Mr. Macnider employed White first. 'The services to which I have referred were services rendered by Mr. White as attorney at law, representing Mr. Macnider in an action in the superior court against S. J. Hopkins, for an accounting and in the proceedings wherein Macnider was charged with embezzlement. Mr. White had been representing Mr. Macnider and performed services for him three or four months before I made any arrangements with Mr. White for compensation. I made an arrangement with Mr. White in his office in San Francisco. It was not an agreement in writing. I was alone when I went to see him.' That previous to that witness saw Mr. Peart, and Mr. Peart said he thought Mr. White would take up the case and go on if witness would make arrangements about a settlement with White. * * * That after that White rendered services for Macnider. * * * That after witness talked with White he continued to represent Macnider through November, December, January, and probably February. An action was brought in Sonoma county by Mr. Hopkins against Mr. Macnider and myself upon a promissory note. Mr. White did not represent either Mr. Macnider or myself in that case (there is no evidence that White knew of this indebtedness). * * * Witness paid White $20 or $30 on account. 'I just made that one payment to Mr. White. It was for services for Mr. Macnider, and was to go on account. Mr. White had not given me any statement of his account at that time, but he had written for money several times. I have none of his letters.' * * * White told witness at the time the arrangement was made that he, White, would take witness' share in said estate as full payment for his services to Macnider and call it square.

* * * Defendant White gave witness a receipt when witness made said arrangement. Witness has not that receipt. She misplaced the receipt and cannot find it; has looked for it in all her papers. It read that the assignment made by witness to White covers all his services rendered to Macnider. Mr. Early prepared the receipt after we had signed the agreement or paper that he made out. * * * After September 12, 1909, she had not received any letters from Mr. White, and did not see him again until the day before she testified. * * * The first conversation the witness had with Mr. White, relative to his acting as Macnider's attorney, was around November, 1908. After that she saw him on an average of three or four times a month. * * * Witness was present in the office of Mr. Holton in Los Angeles, when the distribution of the estate was made."

Much of the same ground is gone over in the deposition of defendant W. B. Macnider. Of the ranch which had been distributed he testified that one of the sons of deceased was in possession and harvested the crop of 1910; that different heirs visited the ranch at different times. We quote from the transcript: "That witness saw Harriette Macnider execute the assignment in question to Roland J. White. 'Mr. Early prepared the paper. He drafted it at our house, and Mrs. Macnider signed the paper in Mr. Clark's office in Santa Cruz (where the Macniders were then living). I was present at that conversation at the house between Mr. White and Mrs. Macnider relative to the making of the assignment. Mr. Early and Mr. White went out and took a walk, while my wife and I discussed the matter of making the assignment.' That witness saw Roland J. White give Harriette Macnider a receipt the day the assignment was made. That Roland J. White did not tell witness that day the amount of his bill for services rendered by him to the witness or how much Roland J. White had expended for Mr. Macnider prior to that time. 'I had an idea of how much he had expended for me but I don't think it was discussed at that time. Mr. White never presented a bill for his services rendered.'" Macnider testified to the different matters in which White served him, to White's urging him to pay him or in some way to assure him that he would be paid. "At one time White said that he, White, would not pay out much more out of his own pocket, and witness had his wife see him and he said if witness could not get somebody to guarantee the payment he would not carry on the work. * * * I never secured White, in any way except that I had my wife, Harriette Macnider, see White and guarantee White's compensation at a time that White thought he could not carry on the cases for me any longer, which was in the fall of 1908." Speaking of the assignment witness testified: "Witness and his wife had been endeavoring to square themselves with White, and Harriette Macnider thought the best thing they could do was to assign her interest over to White in payment, and White agreed to accept the assignment in full payment."

* * * My wife made the assignment with the understanding that she assumed my obligations with him."

It appears from the deposition of the administrator of the Haskell estate that the inventory and appraised value of the real and personal property was $26,745.60, of which $24,700 was the value of the real estate; that a portion of the ranch was sold, before distribution, for $1,800 less than its appraised value; that there remained for distribution $20,583.09, of which $4,981.07 was cash on hand. There is no evidence otherwise of the value of the ranch, except in a letter received from an attorney at Los Angeles. White was led to believe that the value of the estate property was about $35,000. As to its producing an income the evidence was that but little was realized. What the actual value of the land was when the assignment or the distribution was made does not appear. It appeared that after the death of Mr. Haskell "the ranch was in the possession of the boys who lived on the ranch; that Mr. Charles Macnider lived on the ranch three or four months after their return from the north."

Respondent contends that actual fraud is shown, but his principal reliance is, first, that Mrs. Macnider's engagement was that of a guarantor, and, as it was not in writing, it was void under section 2793 of the Civil Code, and that the promise was not within any of the provisions of section 2794 of the same Code (i. e., that the creditor did not "part with value, or enter into any obligation, in consideration of the obligation, in respect to which the promise is made, in terms or under circumstances such as to render the party making the promise the principal debtor"); and, second, that the evidence established constructive fraud under section 3442 of the Civil Code, for that the transfer was made "voluntarily or without a valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent," and also under section 3439, for that the transfer was made "with intent to delay or defraud" creditors.

[3] We can discover no evidence in the record which in any just view can be said to support the claim of actual fraud, and actual fraud is always a question of fact. Civ. Code, § 1574.

[7] In a case where constructive fraud is relied on, it is necessary to allege the fraudulent intent, under section 3442. Schell v. Gamble, 153 Cal. 448, 95 Pac. 870.

[8] It is only by reason of the proviso in 128 P.—50 that section that fraud becomes established constructively or as matter of law. Cook v. Cockins, 117 Cal. 140, 48 Pac. 1025; Gray v. Brunold, 140 Cal. 615, 74 Pac. 303. Section 1573, Civil Code, provides that constructive fraud is "any such act or omission as the law specially declares to be fraudulent."

[9] The transfer of property with intent to delay or defraud creditors is declared by section 3439, Civil Code, to be void as to creditors. But the intent in such a case is a question of fact and is not to be presumed from the mere fact of the transfer, for section 3432 expressly provides that "a debtor may pay one creditor in preference to another, or may give to one creditor security for the payment of his demand in preference to another." McKee v. Title Ins. Co., 159 Cal. 206-217, 113 Pac. 140. It is only where the transfer is "made or given voluntarily, or without a valuable consideration, by a party while insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency," that the statute declares such transfer to "be fraudulent and void as to existing creditors." Section 3442, Civ. Code.

[10] Respondent devotes some attention to his claim that defendant, Mrs. Macnider, was merely a guarantor of her husband's liability. It seems to us a fair consideration of the evidence leads to the conclusion that she became a principal to whom as such, as well as to her husband, defendant White looked and had a right to look for payment. It is true that defendant Macnider, in his testimony, used the word "guarantee" in speaking of his understanding of the matter, but the testimony of Mrs. Macnider and of White, who were the parties to the engagement, shows that she employed White and agreed to pay him for his services, and did pay him. It is also true that White was first employed by Macnider and had performed some service for him before his wife came to his relief. But White refused to continue the employment under the original engagement, and his services in large part were performed after Mrs. Macnider employed him and in good faith relying on her promise. In rendering services, White parted with value, and it seems to us that Mrs. Macnider entered into the obligation with White under such circumstances as to render her a principal debtor, by virtue of her promise, and thus, even under the law of guaranty, section 2794, Civil Code, she became liable.

Is constructive fraud shown? Was the transfer made "voluntarily, or without a valuable consideration by a party while insolvent"?

[11] "A voluntary conveyance is a conveyance without any valuable consideration. * * * If there is a valuable consideration, no matter how trivial or inadequate, the conveyance is not voluntary." 8 Words and Phrases, p. 7345, and cases cited. The finding is that "the said assignment * * * was made without any consideration whatever passing from the defendant, Roland J. White, to the defendant, Harriette Macnider," and that "the said assignment was not made for a good or valuable consideration from said defendant, Roland J. White, to the defendant, Harriette Macnider." This is not a finding that the transfer was made "without a valuable consideration," and does not meet the requirements of the statute, unless all the evidence of White's services must be disregarded because they were rendered in matters concerning Macnider and not directly for Mrs. Macnider.

[12] But if, as the evidence shows, the services were rendered at the instance and request of Mrs. Macnider, and under her employment they must be regarded as rendered for her, although performed in the interest of another, and there was, therefore, a consideration passing to her. There is no finding that the assignment was wholly without consideration, and therefore voluntary. To make the transfer void as to creditors, it must also have been without a valuable consideration by a party while insolvent. There was evidence that the Macniders had no considerable means with which to pay the claim of plaintiff, except the interest of Mrs. Macnider in her father's estate. One of the actions in which White was employed was a suit for an accounting brought by Macnider against plaintiff, in which Macnider claimed that plaintiff was indebted to him. This claim was in existence at the time plaintiff held the promissory note of the Macniders, and before suit was brought on the note. There is nothing in the record to show that at the time the assignment was made the Macniders were insolvent. It does appear, however, that, as the litigation between plaintiff and Macnider finally ended, the Macniders had nothing left but the interest of Mrs. Macnider in her father's estate, and at the time of the trial of the present action they were insolvent. But aside from the alleged insolvency of the Macniders, which may be conceded, the findings are not supported by the evidence. Defendant White was engaged in the business of serving as attorney under Mrs. Macnider's employment for several months, during which time he advanced of his own money, as expenses, over $300. Of the $711 received on distribution he paid Mr. Early $300 and his account with him and Mr. Peart for services as his associates in the business is unsettled. There is no evidence that the interest assigned to him is greatly or at all in excess of a reasonable fee for his services and advances of money. His interest, acquired by the distribution, is of uncertain value. That his services constituted a valuable consideration cannot be doubted. If he was paid a sum grossly in excess of the value of his services or such a sum as would shock the conscience, it is not so made to appear, nor is it so alleged. No question of the inadequacy of the consideration is raised by the pleadings.

The judgment and order are reversed.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. A rehearing is asked on the ground that in the original opinion it was held: First, that the action was a collateral attack upon a judgment; second, that the judgment in the action grants relief in excess of that prayed for; and, third, that the findings are not supported by the evidence. Upon a re-examination of the matter we agree with the respondent that plaintiff was not precluded from attacking the assignment on the ground of fraud, although the land had been distributed to defendant White in probate proceedings. Jenner v. Murphy, 6 Cal. App. 434, 92 Pac. 405, More v. More, 133 Cal. 489, 65 Pac. 1044, and other cases now for the first time called to our attention in the case, we think sustain plaintiff's contention. We therefore withdraw from the original opinion all discussion on that branch of the case. The second point or ground was not at any time given serious consideration, and is unnecessary to the decision. The decision was rested entirely on our conclusion that the evidence is sufficient to support the findings, and upon that point nothing in the petition for a rehearing creates, in our minds, a doubt of the correctness of our conclusions.

The petition is denied.

BOND v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 995.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 15, 1912.)

1. COSTS (§ 258*)—ITEMS TAXABLE—PRINTING BRIEFS.

In view of Supreme Court rule 13 (119 Pac. xii), which specifies the items of cost taxable on appeal and by implication excludes the cost of printing briefs through failure to mention same, the cost of printing the winning party's brief could not be taxed as costs to be paid by the losing party.

2. COSTS (§ 3*)—WHEN RECOVERABLE—STATUTORY NATURE.

Costs are purely statutory, and their allowance depends upon the terms of the statute.

3. COSTS (§ 146*)—DEFINITION.

In general use, the term "costs" embraces both disbursements and specific sums allowed by statute as indemnity to the prevailing party for his expenses. In a narrower sense, the term excludes disbursements. Giving the term

4. COURTS (§ 80*) — RULES — COSTS — ITEMS TAXABLE ON APPEAL—DISCRETION.

In the absence of a statute specifying what shall constitute recoverable costs, the Supreme Court had power to exercise its discretion generally in advance of the trial of any particular case and promulgate rule 13 (119 Pac. xii), which specifies the items of cost taxable on appeal and by implication excludes the cost of printing briefs through failure to mention same.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Annie Bond against the United Railroads of San Francisco. From an order granting defendant's motion to retax costs, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 159 Cal. 270, 113 Pac. 366, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50.

Sullivan, Sullivan & Roche, of San Francisco, for appellant. W. M. Cannon and Wm. M. Abbott, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an appeal from the order of the superior court in said action granting the motion of defendant to retax the costs. It appears that plaintiff commenced an action in the superior court against defendant. The cause was tried by a jury, and plaintiff had a general verdict for the sum of $4,500. The jury also returned a verdict on certain special issues. The trial court thereafter entered judgment on the verdict for $405. Plaintiff moved for an order vacating said judgment and for a judgment in her favor for the sum of $6,900, or for $4,500, which motion, by order of the court, was denied. Plaintiff appealed from said order and judgment to the Supreme Court, which resulted in a judgment of the Supreme Court reversing the judgment of the superior court and directing that judgment be entered "upon said verdict in favor of plaintiff and against said defendant for the sum of $4,500, interest and costs." Upon the going down of the remittitur plaintiff's attorneys duly filed a memorandum of costs and disbursements, among which were the following items: "Printing appellant's points and authorities, 62 pages, $52.70. Printing appellant's closing brief, 240 pages, $240. Printing petition for modification of judgment, 7 pages, $6. Defendant moved to strike out these items on the ground "that said items and each of them were and are not necessary disbursements on the part of plaintiff"; that they are not "legally chargeable as costs" or "proper subject of charge"; that they are not "within the intent and purpose of the statute allowing costs and disbursements"; and that they "were paid voluntarily by plaintiff for her own benefit." The court made an order granting the motion, and the appeal is from this order.

The statutory provisions relating to costs are found in part 2, title 14, chapter 6, Code of Civil Procedure, sections 1021 et seq. Section 1021 provides that the compensation of attorneys rests with the parties by their agreement express or implied; "but parties to actions or proceedings are entitled to costs and disbursements, as hereinafter provided." Section 1022 provides: "Costs are allowed of course to the plaintiff upon a judgment in his favor in the following cases." Five different classes of cases are enumerated, including actions for the recovery of money or damages. Section 1025 provides: "In other actions than those mentioned in section 1022, costs may be allowed or not, and, if allowed may be apportioned between the parties, on the same or adverse sides, in the discretion of the court," where recovery is not less than $300. Section 1027 provides: "In the following cases, the costs of appeal is (are) in the discretion of the court: (1) Where a new trial is ordered; (2) when a judgment is modified." Section 1033 provides: "The party in whose favor judgment is rendered, and who claims his costs, must deliver to the clerk * * * a memorandum of the items of his costs and necessary disbursements in the action or proceeding, which memorandum must be verified, * * * stating that to the best of his knowledge and belief the items are correct, and that the disbursements have been necessarily incurred in the action or proceeding. A party dissatisfied with the costs claimed may * * * file a motion to have the same taxed by the court in which the judgment was rendered. * * *" Section 1034 provides: "Whenever costs are awarded to a party by an appellate court, if he claims such costs, he must, within thirty days after the remittitur is filed with the clerk below, deliver to such clerk a memorandum of his costs, verified as prescribed by the preceding section, and thereafter he may have an execution therefor as upon a judgment."

Rule 2, subd. 4, of the Supreme Court (119 Pac. x) reads as follows: "Thirty days after the filing of the transcript the appellant shall file with the clerk his printed points and authorities. * * * Within thirty days after the service of appellant's points and authorities the respondent shall file and serve his printed points and authorities; and within ten days after the service of respondent's points the appellant may file a reply." In directing what printing expenses should be taxable as costs, the Supreme Court, in 1904, adopted: "Rule 13. Cost of Printing. The expense of printing transcripts on appeal in civil cases, and pleadings, affidavits or other papers constituting the record in original proceedings upon which a case is heard, required by these rules to be printed, shall be allowed as costs in bills of cost in the usual mode." 119 Pac. xii. The foregoing are all of the statutory provisions and rules of the Supreme Court, called to our attention, in the matter of costs, which seem to have any direct bearing on the question. The provisions of the practice act and the early statutes are cited by counsel; but the differences between them and the Code provisions do not appear to cast any light on the subject, and no decisions directly to the point in question, arising under the earlier law, have been found.

[1] The position taken by appellant is that, the filing of a printed brief being mandatory under the rules of the Supreme Court, the cost of printing her brief became a necessary disbursement which the statute requires should be taxed as costs and paid by the losing party. It is also contended that, if rule 13 is to be construed as denying her this right, it is in contravention of the statute and therefore unauthorized and void.

[2] Costs were not recoverable at common law and are only given by statutory direction, and their allowance will depend on the terms of the statute. Bennet v. Kroth, 37 Kan. 235, 15 Pac. 221, 1 Am. St. Rep. 248; Apperson v. Mut. Ben. Life Ins. Co., 38 N. J. Law, 388. The right to recover costs is purely statutory, and, in the absence of statute, no costs could be recovered by either party. Fox v. Hale & Norcross S. M. Co., 122 Cal. 219, 54 Pac. 731. "The allowance of costs does not depend on the form or nature of the action, but depends upon the fact whether the case comes within the terms of the statute relating to costs." Sierra Union M. & M. Co. v. Wolff, 144 Cal. 430, 77 Pac. 1038. There are seventeen sections in the chapter relating to costs, in but two of which is the term "disbursements" mentioned, namely, sections 1021 and 1033. By section 1021 "parties to actions or proceedings are entitled to costs and disbursements, as hereinafter provided." All the sections following deal with "costs" and make no mention of "disbursements" or of "necessary disbursements," except in section 1033 the terms used, in directing what shall be included in the memorandum, are costs and "necessary disbursements." And it will be observed that in that same section "a party dissatisfied with the costs claimed" may "file a motion to have the same taxed by the court." And section 1034, which relates to costs on appeal, makes no mention of disbursements but is confined by its terms to "costs." It will be noticed, too, that section 1021 uses the term "disbursements," while section 1033 mentions "necessary disbursements." If it be insisted that the term

"disbursements," as used in section 1021, means expenses separate and distinct from expenses classed as "costs," the subsequent sections fail to make any provision for the payment of disbursements, and section 1021 authorized costs and disbursements only "as hereinafter provided." Section 1033 provides merely the mode of proceeding by "the party in whose favor a judgment is rendered, and who claims his costs," and by the party who is "dissatisfied with the costs claimed." It is clear to our minds that the term "disbursements" adds no strength to the statute except possibly that its use may justify the court in construing the term "costs" more liberally than it might otherwise feel authorized to do.
